The Bankers' Association have issued their call for recruits to help enslave the people of this country to the money lenders of Europe and America. The Knights of Labor propose to meet the issue squarely, and we hereby appeal to the farmers, laboring men, and legitimate business men of the United States to unite with us and use their combined influence "as citizens" to rescue the United States from the clutches of the gold-money shylocks whose "existing gold standard" (existing since 1893) has brought, in that brief time, more of misery, hunger, and ruin to the people of this country than all the wars and pestilences we have suffered since the foundation of the Republic.

To meet the organized bankers we must have an organized people. It devolves upon the Knights of Labor to take the lead in this great work. They must see to it that the entire country is aroused to the danger of the hour, and the importance of immediate action. Call red-letter meetings of your assemblies at once, and prepare to organize the people of your locality into the Knights of Labor. Where there are no assemblies in existence, any citizen who is not a banker can join with us in this contest against the gold power by means of our individual membership card. We can initiate one person at a time until ten or more persons are admitted, when a charter will be issued, and commission as organizers granted. The initiation fee for the first card for individual members will be 50 cents, and 25 cents for each renewal quarterly, this amount to be sent direct to the general secretary-treasurer. Under the system of organization of the Knights of Labor and the methods adopted, we can erect a solid wall of resistance against the encroachments which the confederated banks are making on popular rights.

Give immediate attention to every member of Congress and every delegate to the national convention of either party. Notify them that every man representing the people must stand for the people or be branded as a tool of the banks. By your immediate and earnest action you will show your full appreciation of the friends of the people in the Senate and House of Representatives and their great leaders, Senators TELLER, VEST, ALLEN, and others who are standing firmly against the onslaughts of the gold-standard element in Congress.

Let us hear from you at once as to the condition of affairs in your locality, and what action has been taken by the bankers toward bribing or coercing the public men in your vicinity to submit to the dictation of the gold-standard influence. If we can secure evidence sufficiently strong against them, we shall furnish you with information how to proceed against any bank which is actively engaged in the infamous conspiracy outlined above. In the meantime organize; organize the people as rapidly as possible. For further information address General Secretary of the Knights of Labor, 48 B street NW., Washington, D. C.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, there has been furnished me also what purports to be a very complete statement of our bonded indebtedness, and, in fact, what purports to be a transcript of the books of the Government, containing the account of our bonded indebtedness. I do not know whether it is correct or not. I have assurances, however, that it is. Anyway, it is of sufficient importance, in my judgment, that it should be read, and I ask leave to make it a part of my remarks.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator be willing to have it printed in the RECORD without being read?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly; let it be inserted without being read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SEWELL in the chair). It will be so ordered, in the absence of objection.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. ELKINS. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire to allow me to occupy the attention of the Senate for a few moments.

Mr. GALLINGER. With the understanding that I may be permitted to follow the Senator from West Virginia, I very gladly yield to him for a short time.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I want to confine myself particularly to the question of giving the power to the President to sell bonds. I have offered a substitute for the bill under discussion. The bill before the Senate reads as follows:

That the issuance of interest-bearing bonds of the United States for any purpose whatever without further authority of Congress is hereby prohibited.

There would be no objection to this bill if we could always rely upon two conditions: First, that Congress would always be in session ready to act in an emergency; and second, that Congress could or would during its sessions pass a revenue law which would yield money sufficient to maintain the public credit and pay the current expenses of the Government until a succeeding Congress.

It is impossible that Congress can meet these two conditions. It may so happen that a revenue measure such as passed the last Congress and which is now a law will fail to yield sufficient revenue to pay the current expenses of the Government. This may happen for a number of reasons. Business may be prostrated; there may be long-continued panics which would prevent a revenue law from yielding the revenue which had been estimated or contemplated. Then, again, it might be impossible to get a quorum of both Houses of Congress. There might be a state of civil or foreign war in the United States, where more than one-half of the elected members of the House of Representatives or one-half of the members of the Senate would be prisoners of war. This is an emergency, a contingency, which we can not provide against. What, then, would become of the Government if we had to rely upon Congress to provide revenue to meet the demands against the Government? I know such contingencies are not probable, but they are barely possible. Must the Government in such a case come to a dead standstill and go into bankruptcy?

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. ELKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. Do I understand the Senator from West Virginia to take the position that the President now has the power, and, if he has not, that he should have the power, to raise revenue regardless of Congress?

Mr. ELKINS. Not at all.

Mr. BUTLER. I understood the Senator to say that a particular revenue law might not raise enough revenue to meet the expenses of the Government, and therefore that the President should have the power to issue bonds at his discretion.

Mr. ELKINS. I did.

Mr. BUTLER. Then how will this authority which the Senator claims that the President has to issue bonds help him to raise revenue?

Mr. ELKINS. In reply I will state, Mr. President, that in case there is not sufficient revenue provided for under any revenue law then the Executive should have power to sell low interest-bearing short-term bonds in order to protect the integrity of the Treasury and maintain the public credit.

Mr. BUTLER. You claim that the President has that power?

Mr. ELKINS. I claim he has the power to sell bonds now.

Mr. BUTLER. To raise revenue?

Mr. ELKINS. After money is in the Treasury nobody can sort it out and tell what dollar comes from the revenues or from the sale of bonds. Money once in the Treasury, no matter from what source, the Secretary has the right to use it to pay the obligations of the Government. It is well known that the Secretary of the Treasury for the last two years has been paying out proceeds of the sale of bonds to meet current obligations.

Mr. BUTLER. How can that be done under the Constitution, when it even denies to the Senate the power to raise revenue and vests it in the legislative branch of the Government called the House of Representatives? Is it proposed to take that from the House of Representatives and give it to the President, and do you indorse such a proposition? Is that your position?

Mr. ELKINS. No, sir; that is not my position; not at all.

Mr. BUTLER. Then, does the Senator think that this present Democratic President is more patriotic than Congress, and that this one man can be trusted to meet emergencies and protect the honor and integrity as well as the property and life of the nation better than Congress?

Mr. ELKINS. No, I do not.

Mr. BUTLER. If you do, you had better nominate Cleveland for your Republican candidate for President.

Mr. ELKINS. As Republicans we think we have a better man, whom we will nominate and elect.

Mr. BUTLER. Do you intend to have your man pursue that policy, as far as your opinion goes, if he should be elected?

Mr. ELKINS. I would have him in the interest of the Government sell bonds when it happens that there is no money in the Treasury to maintain the public credit and pay the current expenses of the Government and prevent it from coming to a standstill.

Mr. BUTLER. You want him to have that authority irrespective of the wishes of Congress or the will of the people?

Mr. ELKINS. I want him to have that power explicitly, definitely, and clearly, of course with the consent of Congress. He could not have it without its consent. I would prefer, of course, always if it could be done, that Congress have the sole power to sell bonds as it has to borrow money. But if it should happen for any reason that Congress should, for want of power to agree or because it can not get a quorum, fail to provide revenue sufficient to meet the needs of the Government, then I favor the President having the power to sell bonds of the Government, preferably low interest bearing, short term bonds.

Mr. BUTLER. Is that the policy of the Republican party?

Mr. ELKINS. That is my judgment, my individual opinion.

Mr. BUTLER. And that is the policy you will try to have the Republican party establish?

Mr. ELKINS. If the Senator will listen to me, I will endeavor to make my position clear to him.

Mr. BUTLER. You intend to support a man for President, and your party will support him, who will take that position.

Mr. ELKINS. I hope he will. I do not know what he will do.

Mr. BUTLER. That is one of the very best reasons why the country should never elect him.

Mr. ELKINS. I think I can fully answer the Senator before I get through, and to do so I shall not detain the Senate long.

I have instanced cases, which might happen, where the Congress of the United States could not be in session, at least where it might so happen that half the Senators might be prisoners of war in a civil or foreign war, and if you take from the President——

Mr. BUTLER. That is a very remote contingency, but if the Senator wants to deal in such vague suppositions, let us suppose the President himself should happen to be taken prisoner of war.

Mr. ELKINS. Then, we would have a Vice-President, and we have the members of the Cabinet to succeed to the great office. We have provided for such an emergency.

Mr. BUTLER. You think that is probable enough to have this Congress turn over its most important legislative power and function to the President?

Mr. ELKINS. Not at all. I do not want this Government to be put in a worse position than an individual, but I do want the Government to have the same rights and the same privileges that an individual, firm, or corporation has. Why deny to the Government the right to borrow money under all possible conditions? If I can find an indorser and make a note acceptable to my banker I can borrow money, and perhaps save myself from bankruptcy. Why not give the Government the same power? I can not think it wise to pass this bill. It prohibits the President from selling bonds for any purpose whatever. The position which I assume from a business standpoint is entirely unanswerable. The Senator from North Carolina can not answer it.

Suppose another case. Suppose that there should occur in one branch or the other of the Congress of the United States a deadlock, such as we have now in the Senate. We can not now pass a bill without the consent of the three parties in the Senate, the Senator's party being one of them. If this deadlock should be prolonged two or three years, and there should be no money in the Treasury, how are we to carry on the Government? As I said to the Senator, I favor the power being given the President explicitly, definitely, and clearly to sell bonds of the Government, under proper conditions and restrictions, to tide over any emergency. I do not care what that emergency may be; I do not care if it is to maintain the public credit or pay current expenses. I confess I would like that power to be given to the President in case there should be a failure of revenue.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the Senator from West Virginia prefer to borrow money and pile up debt to meet the expenses of the Government? If we can not meet expenses now, when will we ever be able to pay our debts?

Mr. ELKINS. I prefer to have the Government economically administered. I do not want to increase the public debt if it can be avoided. The Republican party for thirty years has constantly reduced the public debt. It has never increased the interest-bearing debt and, if it can have its way, never will. The strange practice or doctrine of increasing the interest-bearing public debt of the country came in vogue when the Democratic and Populist parties took full possession of the Government in all of its departments.

Mr. President, I do not look upon this bill as involving the question of the administration of the Government, whether economically and wisely or extravagantly. I look upon just what the bill means and what it says, that the President of the United States shall not have power to sell bonds except with the consent of Congress. Primarily I say that is correct and that is good doctrine, but I want to bring the attention of the Senate from a business standpoint to a condition of affairs which might occur in this Government when it would be wise and in the interest of the Government and the people that the President should have the power to raise money by the sale of bonds, if Congress did not provide it, to carry on the Government and pay its current expenses or any other obligations. This is a fair proposition, and it seems to me any business man will agree to it. Every business man, firm, corporation, or individual in the United States has that power, and certain Senators would take it from the Government under certain conditions.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the Senator from West Virginia mean that he thinks the American people should ever be taxed without the consent of their representatives in Congress?

Mr. ELKINS. Surely not; no, never, I will answer the Senator. So far as this talk about the President is concerned, I will say that I am not here to attack this or any Administration or to raise any partisan question. The President of the United States is a part, a coordinate branch, of this Government.

Mr. BUTLER. Is he a part of the legislative branch?

Mr. ELKINS. Yes; he is in a certain sense. Laws can not be made without his approval. He is equal to two-thirds of both Houses together under certain conditions.

Mr. BUTLER. Unfortunately.

Mr. ELKINS. If Congress and the people can not and will not trust the Executive of this Government, then the Government will soon come to an end. No matter if we had a Populist as President to-morrow, and no matter if we had unlimited paper money, or silver money, or gold money, I would favor the proposition that the President should have power to sell bonds under proper restrictions. This bill does not raise the question as to the kind of money for which the President may sell bonds. It does not raise any of these issues about money or the currency. I want to place this question above partisanship. I want to so provide in the laws of the land that this Government can not stop, can not be starved to death, no matter what emergency may occur or what crisis may come, and no matter what kind of money may be current.

But, Mr. President, it is possible, as I have said, that a revenue law may fail to produce sufficient revenue, and Congress may not be able to get together. What are we to do under those circumstances? The very case that is now before the Senate may occur in a more intense form, where we may have a deadlock and can not pass any revenue bill at all. The Government is going into debt every day, and every business man in the country knows it. We are to inaugurate a President on the 4th of March next. He may be a Populist, a Republican, or a Democrat, but no matter to what party he may belong, he will be our President—he will be the President of the United States—and during the first ninety days of his Administration he will have to sell bonds to raise money. We do not want, nor is it expedient, that we should take the power from him to sell bonds. On the contrary, under proper restrictions and conditions, the President, no matter to what party he may belong, should have clear and explicit authority to sell bonds. Are the Populists here on the floor ready to deny the President this authority? Are the silver men ready to do it? Are the Democrats ready to tie the hands of the Executive and to pass a bill that the Government shall come to a dead standstill and repudiate its obligations? That is the question I ask the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BUTLER. I will answer that question gladly. For the relief of the Senator from West Virginia, I want to say that on the 4th day of next March, when we inaugurate a People's Party President of the United States [laughter], then, instead of continuing to borrow money, we shall have the mints thrown open to the free and unlimited coinage of silver, we shall then stop the drain of gold from the Treasury, and we will stop the bondholders from demanding gold on Government obligations, and if they do demand gold we will not borrow it to get it for them, but we will pay them, according to the letter and spirit of the contract, in coin of the same standard value as that which existed when the law of 1870 was passed. We will pay them in the money that their contracts call for; we will exercise the option of paying in silver or gold. When we do this there will be no more raids upon our Treasury, and no more bond issues. That President will send a message to Congress asking this body to repeal the resumption act, so that succeeding Presidents (if, unfortunately for the country, they should happen to be Republicans or Democrats) can not abuse the law of 1875 to issue more bonds. That President would stop the policy of contraction; would urge Congress to to increase the circulating medium as fast as population and business increase. He would advise the abolishment of national banks, and have all money issued direct by the Government, and many other good things.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from North Carolina tell me the name of the President? Let me get the name, and I will not go any further. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELKINS. I can not yield further.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the Senator want me to turn myself into a nominating convention? I will tell him the name of the next President of the United States on the 22d of July next. I will send him the news from St. Louis by telegraph.

Mr. ELKINS. We have heard something about the tailors of Tooley street getting together and running the world. I do not think the next President is going to be a Populist.

But listen to what the Senator says. He says, "We, the Populists, are going to repeal the resumption act, we are willing to starve the Government, and do divers and sundry things"; but how are you going to do all these things if you happen to have a Republican Senate here, and if you happen to have a Republican House of Representatives? You will have to get the consent of Congress to do any or all of these things.

Mr. BUTLER. The People's Party will attend to that.

Mr. ELKINS. We shall not have the People's Party in a majority in the Senate or in the other House, if you will allow me to differ with you, nor will you have the President.

Mr. BUTLER. We shall see.

Mr. ELKINS. I want to ask the Senator and all who are like disposed as he is, how they propose, in case we should have a Populist President, to carry on the Government without selling bonds? I mean in case your party should elect a President, how are you going to pay the expenses? It is impossible. The next President will inherit a bankrupt Treasury; this is inevitable. And to make matters worse, you propose to refuse him the authority to sell bonds even for the purpose of paying just debts. This will never do. The proposition is bad—bold, bald repudiation.

Mr. BUTLER. We shall try to live within our income.

Mr. ELKINS. You can not live within your income under the appropriations already made; you have not the money; and the next President of the United States will have to borrow money, no matter who he is. Why not look at the case as it is, right in the face, and say you are willing to stand before the world as repudiating just obligations and as a bankrupt, without any wish or desire to pay your debts?

We are the richest nation in the world unquestionably, and we are adding to our national wealth at the rate of $15,000,000 every twenty-four hours. But that does not count in the eyes of the world when we get into the unfortunate condition we are now in, where our Treasury is without sufficient means to pay current expenses. Europe interprets it that we are bankrupt, and Europe refuses to loan us money. There is no Populist State in the Union but wants to borrow money. There is not one of them but wants more railroads, more mines opened, more development. We are a borrowing nation. We are as yet in our infancy; and the Populists and those they represent go to New York and go to Europe with their hands wide open asking to borrow money, and yet they make it impossible to borrow it by the adoption of such measures as this.

Such bills as the one under consideration destroy confidence; they unsettle business. This Government has been for three years and six months dragging on the rocks, on the verge of bankruptcy, and nearly the whole country has been in the same condition so far as business is concerned. The people can scarcely make ends meet. I do not object to the discussion of the silver question, nor the gold question, nor the currency question. I think all these things do good in their way and are a benefit to the country; but I think, as a business man, that it is time Congress should call a halt and give the country some repose. I mean, stop useless agitation. First one thing happens and then another to disturb and unsettle confidence in the money centers of the world. The last one is that the President of the United States shall be stripped of the power to sell bonds for any purpose whatever.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. ELKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. DANIEL. I wish to ask the Senator what has become of the large supply of confidence which was to be brought to the country by the great Republican proposition to repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman law? If I remember aright, the leader of that party then said on this floor that we should have prosperity and confidence within ten days from the time of the repeal of that law.

Mr. ELKINS. I will answer the Senator.

Mr. DANIEL. What has become of that prosperity and confidence?

Mr. ELKINS. I was not one who shared in that prophecy. The Sherman Act and all of the agitation for its repeal originated largely with Mr. Cleveland and his party as the best means to draw attention from the fright that fell upon the people and the country after they realized that they had elected a free-trade President on a free-trade platform and the threatened panic that followed. All the trouble, fear, and anxiety that followed Mr. Cleveland's election was set down not to the fact that he had been elected on a free-trade platform, but to the Sherman Act. The Sherman Act had little to do with bringing on the panic that followed Mr. Cleveland's inauguration. The panic and distress that came upon the country were due mainly to the fact that the people began to realize that business would be prostrated; that labor would be without employment by mills and factories closing down.

Mr. DANIEL. If the Senator will allow me a moment further—I do not want to interrupt him—but, if he will remember, the proposition to repeal the Sherman law was made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] himself, and was repeated in this body in February, 1893.

Mr. ELKINS. That is true.

Mr. DANIEL. The Democrats were then deluded into adopting a Republican proposition, and I am afraid the Senator, with his persuasive voice, might do it again, and that is the reason I call attention to it.

Mr. ELKINS. I thank the Senator.

We all know, Mr. President, the proposition to repeal the Sherman Act was brought forward by Democrats, fostered by Democrats, and I admit helped by some Republicans. The Democratic party had, in my judgment, its purpose and plan in view when that proposition was brought forward, but I want to say that almost all the promises made to the country to follow the repeal of the Sherman Act have failed; and why? They have failed because under the Wilson-Gorman law and under its operation the business of the country has been depressed and confidence destroyed. We have not had enough revenue to carry on the Government. I did not believe, as a great many of my fellow-Republicans believed at the time, that the Sherman Act was the cause of all the evils and all the financial ills which then rested upon the country. They were due largely to threatened free-trade legislation which followed after the inauguration of Mr. Cleveland the second time.

As I said before, without any partisan feeling whatever, looking at this as a plain business proposition, I want the Government, under all conditions and circumstances, and our President, whoever he may be, to have the power during every moment of this Government's existence to borrow money by selling bonds whenever for any reason it occurs that there is no money in the Treasury. Why deny that power to the Government? I know the Constitution says Congress shall have power to borrow money, but this does not prevent Congress from conferring power on the President to sell a 3 per cent five-year bond to realize money to pay the debts of the Government when for any reason the money in the Treasury is exhausted. This is a wholesome power to prevent national dishonor and national bankruptcy, and this is the power for which I contend.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the Senator from West Virginia allow me?

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. If the Senator will pardon me for interrupting him, I should like to ask him a question. He is a lawyer and a distinguished statesman, as well as a business man, and he states this as a business proposition, and therefore, as a business man, I desire to ask him if he is a member of any corporation—railroad, banking, manufacturing, or other—which delegates the power of that corporation to its president and secretary to borrow money? He will be obliged to answer, I am sure, in the negative, because the directors meet, and by proper resolutions authorize the loan to be made or the bonds to be issued. It is possible that under the law the board of directors may not have the power to borrow this money. What do they then do? They call a meeting of the stockholders of the company and they, by resolutions, authorize the board of directors to perform such and such an act. We are simply the trustees of the people; we are elected here to represent them for a purpose; and I believe the people are too loyal not to support this Government. But pardon me for lengthening out the question to such an extent.

Mr. ELKINS. This is the same proposition in another form. Because the Senator from California is a business man, I wish to answer his question from a business standpoint. Take the case of a corporation, where the trustees or directors, if you please, have the power to borrow money. Suppose that for any reason the directors do not have a meeting for a year or two years, and the president would have to carry on the business of the corporation without them. Does the Senator from California mean to say here and now that he would take the power from the president to borrow money to save the corporation from bankruptcy and ruin when the directors did not meet? That is the proposition. What will become of his corporation? Suppose they owed $100,000, and suppose they had a good note and could get it discounted, should the power be taken from the president to get the note discounted?

Mr. PERKINS. The corporation would go into the hands of a receiver. That is just what I am contending for.

Mr. ELKINS. I do not want this Government to go into the hands of a receiver. This is what I want to prevent. I do not want any corporation with which I am connected to go into the hands of a receiver, especially because the directors will not authorize the president to get the notes of the corporation discounted, nor does the Senator from California want his corporation to go into the hands of a receiver.

Mr. PERKINS. No; I agree with my friend the Senator from West Virginia, and that is the reason why we want to obtain the power from the people to issue bonds, and not permit the president or secretary to issue them without the authority of the corporation or the people.

Mr. ELKINS. In the event that Congress fails to pass a revenue bill, and there is no money in the Treasury, what do Senators who favor this bill propose? I want to ask if they propose that the Government shall starve and die—go out of existence—simply because Congress will not trust the President to sell a few bonds to pay just debts and meet a crisis or emergency.

There are more ways to destroy this Government than by war. Congress can destroy its credit, and then the Government.

I do not know what is the reason of the apparent antagonism to the President. The President is a part of the Government. He is entitled to the respect, the support, the loyalty, and the confidence particularly of the Congress of the United States and of the people. When you embarrass the President in the matter of preserving the integrity of the Treasury, maintaining the public credit, and paying just obligations, you embarrass the Government. When you embarrass the Government you embarrass the people, because the Government is but the instrumentality of the people to perform their will. I wish to have located somewhere in the Government the power to sell bonds to pay the current expenses when Congress for any reason fails to provide sufficient revenue.

Senators talk as if this were a new proposition. England, governed by wise, able, and far-seeing statesmen, meets this question broadly. Whenever there is a shortage in the revenue for any reason, the Government has the power to sell exchequer notes at low rates of interest, running five years. Just the other day, although England is in a prosperous condition, she sold £5,000,000 of those exchequer notes to provide needed revenue. You can not find a government which has not that power, and you can not run a government long without it. When you get three parties in the Senate and have a deadlock and take from the President the power to sell bonds, you will bring the Government to a standstill. I do not know whether or not that is in the mind of the Senator from North Carolina and those who favor the bill.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator from West Virginia permit me?

Mr. ELKINS. Do you want to stop the Government? What have you against the President?

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator from West Virginia allow me to ask him to explain a little provision in the Constitution?

Mr. ELKINS. I will come to that later.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to have an explanation from the Senator.

Mr. ELKINS. I have heard that provision of the Constitution and have already referred to it.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. ELKINS. I wish the Senator from Nevada would excuse me. I am taking the time of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. He wanted me to finish my remarks, so as to proceed with his speech. I promised him not to speak longer than fifteen minutes.

Mr. STEWART. There is a little provision to borrow money——

Mr. ELKINS. I know what that is, and the Senator does too.

I trust I have made myself plain. I have not meant to appeal to party feeling in anything I have said. If the Populists come into power and we have the Senate Chamber full of greenbacks, and there is no prospect of getting gold, I say give the President power to sell bonds even for greenbacks, if necessary to carry on the Government. I would give it to him cheerfully and willingly, just as I would to a Republican President to sell bonds for gold. Why not treat the Government as well as you would an individual? I have power to sell my note for money so long as I have credit. That is one of the powers I possess under the law of the land. Why not give the Government the same power under all conditions?

This bill does not raise the question of the coinage of silver. It simply takes power from the President which, under certain conditions, he should have in the interest of the Government and the people. Every government in the world has the power. I am opposed to the bill. It is mischievous, because even now, while the deadlock continues in the Senate, every proposition to raise revenue is voted down by one side or the other. That has occurred within the last three months and the last three days. We go on making appropriations and make no provision for revenue. The President of the United States is sworn to uphold the Constitution. He is expected, in the discharge of his duty, to carry on the Government, and any President would be considered recreant if he did not do all in his power to protect the credit of the Government.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator from West Virginia pardon me for a moment? The Populist Senators stand here ready—and they have so stood every day this session—to give six votes to help pass any measure in the interest of the welfare of the American people. You propose a revenue measure which is highly protective, to give special benefits to a few people, and we say to you that if you will couple with it a measure to increase the ability of the people to pay taxes and to add to their general prosperity, to give relief to the South and West, we will join hands with you and pass the measure. But we will never agree to pile taxes upon the people for the special benefit of a favored few while the great masses of the wealth producers of this nation have no relief, but have additional burdens placed upon their shoulders.

If that is your policy, then you are responsible for nothing being done. You are the few who stand by the protected interests and refuse to do anything to relieve the Treasury or to give relief and prosperity to the people. If you will just turn your back for one moment upon the idol of protective interests and take a broad, patriotic view and propose some measure that will be fair and equitable to the American people, you will get six votes from the People's Party to help you to pass it.

Mr. ELKINS. Every time we approach the proposition to raise money each party has its own particular notions as to how it should be done. That is what I am arguing—that you can not pass a revenue bill even now. The Republican party proposes a measure which on principle has had the sanction of the Government, in one way or another, for thirty years; yes, since its foundation. It is at once opposed and called protecting a favored few. It is called legislation in the interest of individuals, and so it is. Each party can find some objection. That is just what I am complaining about. I credit the Senator from North Carolina and his party with sincerity; I credit the Democratic party with sincerity; I credit the Republican party with sincerity. But these parties can not agree on a revenue bill.

Mr. BUTLER. I am willing to compromise——

Mr. ELKINS. The Senator must excuse me. I have been interrupted too much already.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia declines to yield.

Mr. ELKINS. What I complain of is that we can not agree. Suppose the Senate fails to agree for two or three years and no revenue is provided? Is the Government to stop, languish, and die? That is the question. I do not want to bring party politics into this question. I do not want to make a financial speech. I simply desire to have the power lodged in the President, under certain conditions and restrictions, to be able to sell bonds to maintain the credit of the Government. I am greatly obliged to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] for his courtesy in allowing me to speak and take so much of his time.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator from New Hampshire pardon me for one moment? There is an old document here, more than a hundred years old, which appears to have been overlooked in this discussion. It may have some influence, and I call attention to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator simply wants to read from it and not to make a speech?

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will allow the Senator to read it.

Mr. STEWART. Section 1 of Article I of the Constitution reads as follows:

> All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

Section 8 of the same article reads as follows:

> The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. What is the title of the document the Senator reads from?

Mr. STEWART. It was formerly known as the Constitution of the United States. [Laughter.] But it appears to have been abrogated, and inasmuch as it is seriously contended that the power to borrow money is lodged in the President and ought of right to remain there, I think it well to call attention to the instrument. It may have something to do with the question.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator from Nevada allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. How does Congress borrow money?

Mr. STEWART. It can pass a law authorizing the borrowing of money.

Mr. PLATT. That is what we have done, and that is what the Senator wants to have repealed.

Mr. STEWART. We have not passed any law authorizing the borrowing of gold. There is no such law on the statute books. It is a bold usurpation, and the Senator from Connecticut knows it well. The borrowing of gold for the benefit of the gold gamblers without authority of law has brought dire distress upon this country.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, on the 15th day of the present month I introduced in the Senate a resolution as follows:

That the widespread business depression and rapid increase of the public debt demonstrates that the existing tariff does not produce sufficient revenue, and that a revision of the law is imperatively demanded in the interests of the people of the United States.

It was my purpose to make this resolution a text for some remarks on the question of the tariff, but as a subject is now before the Senate upon which I can properly speak, I propose to avail myself of the opportunity at this time.

Mr. President, there is, as I believe, one way, and one way only, to secure a return of prosperity to the people of this country, and that is by the repeal of the existing tariff law and the enactment of a law that will compel the manufacturers and importers of foreign goods to liberally contribute toward the support of our Government, which will be in the interests of all classes of the American people. Believing this, I propose to occupy a little time in discussing the tariff question, holding, as I do, that when a proper revenue bill is passed the necessity for the sale of interest-bearing bonds will no longer exist.

Mr. President, two years ago, in the month of May, 1894, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes; which bill, as finally enacted, is now the law of the land. In opposing that measure I then felt it my duty to lay before the Senate an accurate historical analysis of American tariff legislation from the day the Pilgrims placed their feet on Plymouth Rock down to that time, in order that the people of the country might be acquainted with the great fact that impartial history teaches that protective tariffs have always brought prosperity to the people of the United States, while low tariffs have invariably disturbed business, prostrated industries, and brought suffering and want to the laboring masses of our people. I endeavored to show that the history of our country for more than a hundred years had established a principle that had proved to be as invariable as the law of gravitation and as inexorable. That principle is that whenever free trade, or a tariff for revenue only, has prevailed, or there has been a threat of either, with a probability that that threat would be executed, we have had widespread business depression, lack of confidence, lack of credit, stoppage of business, lack of employment, bankruptcy, disorder, and ruin, with all their attendant evil consequences. This rule is not a matter of opinion nor of argument, but of stern, impartial, and unimpeachable history.

Having completed the historical analysis of tariff legislation in this country, I availed myself of the kind indulgence of the Senate to conclude with two contrasting pictures, the first depicting the prosperity that would immediately follow the assurance that protection was to be the established policy of the nation, the second a suggestion of the distress and ruin that would inevitably come upon the country should the measure then pending be adopted. I also ventured the prophecy that if the Wilson-Gorman bill should be enacted into law the American people would rise in their might, irrespective of former political affiliations, and elect a Congress that would reenact laws that would restore to our statute books the kind of legislation that throughout our entire history had brought employment, prosperity, and happiness to all classes of our citizens.

Mr. President, the Democratic majority gave no heed to the historical record, nor to the signs of distress everywhere apparent in consequence of the universal doubt and uncertainty that followed close upon the defeat at the polls in November, 1892, of the party that had established and maintained protection for more than thirty years. They had even then seen the literal fulfillment of the notable prophecy of Mr. Blaine, made in these words:

The business men of the country, fearing the destruction of the principles of protection, will decline to engage in business; consequently mills will shut down, and the workingmen will be thrown out of employment. The people will then see, as they have never seen before, that they can not be prosperous and have work while the principle is threatened. In the midst of their sufferings they will learn that the only way they can be prosperous and happy is to vote for the party that has built up the industries by which they have gained a livelihood; because they will then see clearly that when the manufactory is shut down there is no demand for the only thing which they have to sell, and that is their labor.

But neither the history of the past nor the fulfillment of Mr. Blaine's prediction had the slightest influence upon the leaders who controlled the legislation of that session. They were as blind to the real meaning of what was going on in the country as was President Cleveland when, in August, 1893, he wrote:

With plentecus crops, with abundant promise of remunerative production and manufacture, with unusual invitation to safe investment, and with satisfactory assurance to business enterprise, suddenly financial distrust and fear have sprung up on every side.

Numerous moneyed institutions have suspended because abundant assets were not immediately available to meet the demands of frightened depositors. Surviving corporations and individuals are content to keep in hand the money they are usually anxious to loan, and those engaged in legitimate business are surprised to find that securities they offer for loans, though heretofore satisfactory, are no longer accepted.

Values supposed to be fixed are fast becoming conjectural, and loss and failure have involved every branch of business.

Those leaders knew that the great Southern wing of the Democratic party had determined to establish the doctrine of free trade in this land and that they would be assisted by their Northern allies, as Mr. Blaine had foreseen they would be. The passage of the Wilson-Gorman bill was therefore a foregone conclusion. It was not all that the Democratic House of Representatives had intended it should be, for it was materially amended in the Senate, which led President Cleveland to say in his letter to Mr. CATCHINGS—in which he gave his reasons for allowing the bill to become a law without his signature—that there were Senators who—

Had stolen and worn the livery of Democratic tariff reform in the service of Republican protection.

And therefore, said he—

Trusts and combinations—the communism of pelf—whose machinations have prevented us from reaching the success we deserved, should not be forgotten nor forgiven.

But although the President refused to sign the bill because it was too protective, and refused to accept its results as the close of the war for tariff reform, in that same letter to Mr. CATCHINGS he said of it:

And yet, notwithstanding all its vicissitudes and all the bad treatment it received at the hands of pretended friends, it presents a vast improvement to existing conditions. It will certainly lighten many tariff burdens that now rest heavily upon the people. It is not only a barrier against the return of mad protection, but it furnishes a vantage ground from which must be waged further aggressive operations against protected monopoly and governmental favoritism.

Mr. President, with the indulgence of the Senate, I propose to show what "vast improvement to then existing conditions" has been made since the President permitted this bill to become a law; what tariff burdens have been lightened that, he claimed, then rested heavily upon the people; what a "barrier against the return of mad protection" it has proved to be, and what a splendid "vantage ground" it has furnished to free-trade Democracy from which to wage "further aggressive operations against protected monopoly and governmental favoritism."

EFFECTS UPON AGRICULTURE.

Now, Mr. President, agriculture has been fittingly termed "the mother of all industries." Because of it the civilized world "lives, and moves, and has its being." In noticing some of the "vast improvements" that President Cleveland said would follow the operations of the present tariff law let us begin with agriculture. The census of 1890 gave the number of farms in the United States as 4,564,641, comprising a total acreage of 623,218,619, of which 357,616,755 were improved and 42.6 per cent unimproved. The average size of these farms was 137 acres. The total area in farms of the 5 great States of Illinois, Ohio, New York, Pennsylvania, and Iowa was 124,668,158 acres; the total value of the land, buildings, and fences was $5,057,557,375, and their average value per acre was $40.57. These 5 States contain about 20 per cent of all the farms of the country. The farmers of these, as of their sister States, have acquired some new ideas as to what the President considers "a vast improvement," but they call it by another name. For instance, they do not think there has been any improvement in sheep husbandry; but they have known ever since they read the President's third annual message of December 6, 1883, that he had no accurate knowledge on that subject. Then he said:

I think it may be fairly assumed that a large proportion of the sheep owned by the farmers throughout the country are found in small flocks numbering from twenty-five to fifty. * * * When the number of farmers engaged in wool raising is compared with all the farmers in the country, and the small proportion they bear to our population is considered; when it is made apparent that in the case of a large part of those who own sheep the benefit of the present tariff on wool is illusory, etc.

They forgave that ignorance at the time. They have had good reason since then to regret that they were so merciful. Here are some of the reasons for their sorrow: I will give in parallel columns the free-wool value on the farm in June, 1894, and the lowest value of the same kind of wool on the farm prior to March 4, 1893, when a Democratic President and a Democratic Congress assumed control of the Administration of the country and immediately announced that wool must be placed on the free list. The farmers of this country do not consider a falling off from 25½ cents to 10 cents a pound, or from 11 cents to 2½ cents, an improvement. Certainly the old tariff on wool was anything but "illusory." The farmers know that protection did protect wool. The following table shows that there is nothing "illusory" in their belief on that point. It shows that American wool, under ten years of protection, averaged 9½ cents per pound higher than wool of the same kind and quality in the free-trade markets of the world, and that after wool was put on the free list American wool was 5½ cents per pound lower than similar wool in the markets of the world:

A comparison of the course of the American and London wool markets during the ten years from 1885 to 1894, showing that domestic wool under ten years of protection averaged 9½ cents per pound higher than foreign of the same kind and quality, and under free trade was 5½ cents per pound lower.

	Average price, 1885 to 1894.	Under protection American higher than foreign.	Price at the close of 1895, as compared with average of ten years.	Price March 1, 1896.	Under free trade American lower than foreign.
American, Ohio XX, washed.	$0.3122	$0.09½	40.74 per cent less.	$0.18½	$0.05½
Australian, Port Philip, unwashed superior.	.2170	.....	5.99 per cent more	.24	.....

There is no industry more sensitive to the effect of favorable or unfavorable tariff legislation than sheep husbandry, as is illustrated by the history of four succeeding periods. The first was under the tariff law of 1867, when the duties upon imported wool were about 12½ cents a pound, which rates furnished adequate protection. During the last four years of that period, from 1880 to 1884, the flocks increased 25 per cent.

The second period began when the tariff law of 1883 went into operation, which decreased the wool duties from 12½ to 10 cents a pound. A blunder in the wording of that law also removed the compensatory duties from manufactures of wool. Cloth made of Australian combed wool was admitted, under the commercial name of worsteds, at lower duties than were imposed upon all other cloths. The result was that American manufacturers were crippled, and while there was a nominal duty of 10 cents per pound upon wool, American woolen mills were so injured by the importation of so-called worsteds as to injure the market for wool, and the 10 cents per pound nominal duty on wool failed to prevent a decrease in the flocks. Scoured wools, under the name of waste, were also then admitted at only the duty of unwashed. An attempt was also made, aided by the Administration then in power, to remove wool duties. Under these combined discouragements the flocks decreased 18 per cent in four years, and the destruction of sheep was only arrested by the election in 1888 of a President and Congress favorable to protection upon wool.

The third period showed an increase in the flocks from General Harrison's election in 1888 until President Cleveland was inaugurated in 1893. The prospect of increased protection to wool, with suitable compensatory duties upon manufactures of wool, which were afterwards embodied in Schedule K of the law of 1890 (the McKinley law), gave a new stimulus to sheep industry, and during this period the flocks increased 13 per cent.

The fourth division covers the free-wool period of the existing tariff law. The policy of this Administration toward wool, announced by President Cleveland in his inaugural message, was enacted into law in the Wilson-Gorman tariff passed in 1894. The certainty of the removal of wool duties and the actual accomplishment of that fact was discounted in the low free-trade price of wool, and the flocks have continued to be slaughtered in countless numbers until the number of sheep estimated on hand January 1, 1896, shows a decrease of 19 per cent since 1893. There were no more sheep in the United States on January 1, 1896, than there were in 1880. Commenting on the effect of the wool schedules of the McKinley tariff on sheep husbandry, the American Economist, that earnest, ably conducted, and most reliable advocate of protection, to which I am indebted for most of the foregoing statements, recently said:

The rate of increase of American wool under protection was greater than in any other nation of the world.

During the last twelve years of the tariff law of 1867, including the year 1884, one year after that law had been repealed, but before the effect of the repeal was visible, the wool clip of the United States doubled. The clip of 1873 was 170,000,000 pounds, which had increased to 340,000,000 pounds in 1884—an increase of 100 per cent. The greatest increase in any other nation of the world in this period was Australia, where the increase was only 64 per cent. At the Cape of Good Hope the increase was 60 per cent, and in the Argentine Republic 35 per cent. In Great Britain, the only country where the climatic conditions were at all similar to those in the United States, and the only country named in this comparison where sheep have to be fed crops during the winter months, the wool clip decreased 19 per cent under free trade, while in the United States, during the same years, the wool clip increased 100 per cent, although our winters are much more severe than those of Great Britain. The difference clearly illustrates the effect of protection and free trade upon the sheep and wool industry in the North Temperate Zone.

The Chief of the Bureau of Statistics has furnished some valuable information as to the imports of wool into the United States, and it shows the countries whose farmers are gathering the golden harvest that should have been reaped by our own. The following figures, compiled from his returns, tell their own story. There is nothing "illusory" about this table:

WHERE THE WOOL CAME FROM.

From—	1894.	1895.
United Kingdom	38,576,307	109,583,124

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. By whom were those importations made?

Mr. GALLINGER. I presume largely by the manufacturers of the country.

Mr. GRAY. To be worked up into fabrics in this country?

Mr. GALLINGER. Unquestionably so, sooner or later.

Mr. GRAY. And employ American labor to do it?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me?

Mr. GALLINGER. With pleasure.

Mr. MORRILL. I understand that at the present time there are something like between two and three hundred million pounds of wool unsold in this country.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is unquestionably an enormous amount of wool in the warehouses of this country and no call for it at the present time.

Mr. MORRILL. And the statement of the manufacturers is that 64 per cent only of the manufactories are now employed.

Mr. GALLINGER. A little later in this discussion I shall endeavor to show to the Senator from Delaware that under the operation of the free-wool doctrine of the Democratic party American woolen mills are largely idle at the present time, and that in such as are not idle the hands employed aggregate but a small portion of those employed under the policy of the Republican party.

Mr. President, the wool that was imported into this country in 1894 and 1895 cost comparatively as follows:

THE MONEY THAT IT COST US.

To—	1894.	1895.
United Kingdom	$5,531,409	$17,301,043
France	736,914	2,131,842
Germany	70,582	95,484
Other Europe	1,443,532	1,861,213
South America	1,444,980	3,717,574
British North America	480,446	1,353,785
China	1,342,985	1,510,572
Other Asia and Oceanica	1,682,682	2,783,576
Other countries	529,002	2,261,070
Total	13,262,512	33,016,159

In other words, the American people in 1894 paid for imported wool $13,262,512, while in 1895, under free wool, they paid $33,616,159. And yet it was contended by the Democratic party that free wool would stimulate sheep husbandry in this country.

Here are some additional statistics that show that there was an increase of wool imports in 1895 of 115,341,405 pounds over the average importations of the preceding four years, and that this cost us in gold an increase of $16,818,883 over the average of any one of the four protection years:

Imports of wool.

Calendar year.	Pounds.	Value.
1891	139,317,571	$18,798,402
1892	167,784,490	21,191,639
1893	111,752,398	13,953,549
1894	115,730,820	15,802,512
Protection average	133,647,812	16,951,276
1895	248,989,217	33,770,159
Free trade, increase	115,341,405	16,818,883

That the protective tariff on wool was not "illusory" is evident from the following facts. The total number of sheep in the several sections of the Union and their value in the years 1892 and 1896 are given in the following table:

New England	1,241,805	621,691	$3.58	$2.18	$3,943,065	$1,360,542
Middle States	2,802,653	1,994,882	3.80	2.34	10,726,960	4,661,919
Southern States	9,152,562	7,153,615	2.07	1.45	17,548,081	10,361,282
Western States	14,027,755	9,983,336	2.90	1.96	43,635,724	19,731,972
Pacific States	7,730,849	6,893,498	2.47	1.65	18,491,047	11,323,001
Rocky Mountain States and Territories	9,962,738	11,652,461	2.37	1.52	21,776,453	17,728,359
Total for the United States	44,938,365	38,299,483	2.58	1.70	116,121,290	65,167,675

Evidently the "illusory" feature came in when the farmers of this country voted for a change that caused a decrease of 6,638,882 in their flocks, a loss of 88 cents per head in the average value of the sheep that remained, and a total loss in the value of their flocks of $51,012,615. This is one of the "vast improvements" that the Wilson-Gorman tariff bill is responsible for.

Depreciation in farm values and in live stock values are briefly summarized in the following tables. These show how absurd the claim was that "vast improvements" would result from the Democratic tariff:

Annual loss on live stock in four years has been	756,829,394
Being a total annual loss to farmers	1,485,551,773

Mr. PEFFER. For what length of time?

Mr. GALLINGER. There has been an annual loss for each of the last four years on live stock and farm values of $1,485,551,773.

Now, Mr. President, if the farmers of the country continue to lose money at the rate of nearly one and a half billion dollars a year, how long will they remain solvent and independent? This startling exhibit of the losses in the value of live stock on our farms is an illustration of the "vast improvement" that was promised by President Cleveland. Live stock that was worth nearly $2,500,000,000 on January 1, 1892, in the good times of McKinley protection, was worth $756,829,394 less money to the farmers exactly four years later, and after three years' experience with a Democratic Administration. Can we wonder that farmers in every section of the country, while studying the low value of their live stock, should determine to restore the policy of protection and prosperity by voting for Republican candidates for Congress and for the Republican candidate for the office of President?

A MATTER OF HISTORY.

Before leaving the field of agriculture it is interesting to note the fact that in the earlier days of the Republic there were Democratic statesmen who thought that the interests of American agriculture would be advanced by increasing the duties on articles of foreign growth or manufacture to a protective point. The annals of the Eighteenth Congress, first session, bear record that when the debate on the tariff bill was pending the House Committee on Agriculture, pursuant to instructions, investigated this subject, and through its chairman, Mr. Van Rensselaer, of New York, handed in a short report, which contained the following salient points:

1. Whatever increases the consumption of its products, whether home or abroad, necessarily advances the interests of agriculture.
2. He who cultivates the soil looks to a market for his surplus products, the home market being at all times preferred to the foreign when the reward is equal, the home market being less precarious, more permanent and certain, and beyond the reach of foreign hostility.
3. It favored an increase of duties on many foreign articles to promote agricultural prosperity. Manufacturers would open up a new market and a new demand would be created for domestic raw material.
4. If the manufactured articles then consumed by our people could all be made at home from the raw material furnished by ourselves, the value of our lands would be increased and agricultural profits augmented.
5. The extension of domestic manufactures, depending on the production of such raw materials as can be found in this country, must increase the demand for those materials and of course secure a new and ready market.
6. As to the articles of foreign growth to which an increase of duty should apply in order to promote the prosperity of our agriculture, the duty should embrace every "raw material" found or procured with ease, cheapness, and in abundance in the United States.
7. An increase of duty would not decrease the sale of our surplus products abroad, because those nations purchase from motives of self-interest or necessity and not from favor.
8. As to the amount of duty which should be imposed, it should be sufficient to secure the exclusive and constant demand for our raw material, competent to build up and protect those manufacturing establishments at present in the country, and which, with a reasonable encouragement, will present a constant demand for those raw materials.

James Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, then a member of the House, favored this feature of the bill, and said:

If I understand the principle of this bill, it is that a moderate additional protection shall be afforded to those manufactures the raw material of which either is or may be made abundant in this country. When this raw material is a product of agriculture it has a peculiar claim to our favor, because by that means the agricultural interest will be promoted.—Annals Congress, 18th, volume 2, page 1890.

It will be seen that in those good old Democratic days protection on raw materials was advocated; and the wisdom of the Democratic Congressmen of that era is in striking contrast with the folly or prejudices of those who passed the existing tariff law.

MANUFACTURERS AND EMPLOYEES.

Mr. President, when mills and factories are running to their full capacity and finding a ready market for all that they can produce, there is a demand and steady employment for labor, from the lowest to the highest grades, at good wages, and every line of business in the entire country is benefited. There is a home market for the products of field, garden, and orchard, for the wares of the merchant, and for all the necessaries and the luxuries of life. The fishermen along our coasts and on the Great Lakes are rewarded for their toil, as are also the farmers and market gardeners, and all who provide sustenance for man or beast. The statistics of the growth of manufacturing in this country from 1860, which was the last of fourteen years of free trade, to 1894, when the Democratic party gave protection what was intended to be its death-blow, present a remarkable array of figures, and inasmuch as men who are employed at good wages consume much more than when they are idle or working for small pay the figures are of interest to farmers as well as others.

In 1860 there were 1,312,000 wage earners employed in our diversified manufacturing industries. In 1870 the number had increased to 2,054,000, a gain of 74,000 a year. In 1880 they numbered 2,740,000, an increase of 59,000 a year. In 1890 there were 4,712,000 employees, an increase of 196,000 a year, and in 1892 there were over 5,300,000 hands at work, a further increase of more than 300,000 a year under protection. In 1860 these workers received $380,000,000 in wages, or $289 per hand. In 1890 the pay roll amounted to $2,282,000,000, equal to $485 for every man, woman, and child so employed. In 1890 the wage earners of the country, under protection, had $196 per capita more money to spend than in 1860 under free trade. During that time, aided by and as the legitimate and almost invariable result of protection, labor steadily gained on capital in the division of the earnings. In 1860 labor received $44.50 and in 1890 $54.50 out of each hundred dollars' worth of net products, while capital had $55.50 in 1860 and $45.50 in 1890. Labor advanced from $289 to $485, or 70 per cent, while capital went from $361 to $408, an advance of only 40 per cent. This shows a difference in favor of labor of 30 per cent. In 1860, under the free-trade policy, $785 of capital and $790 worth of raw material gave employment to one hand who produced $1,438 in finished goods. The value of products over cost of material was $650. Of this sum labor received $289, or about 44½ per cent, while capital had $360, or about 55½ per cent, for expenses and profits. In 1890, under the protective policy, it required $1,385 of capital and $1,095 in raw material for each hand employed. The finished product amounted to $1,988, or $893 above cost of material. Of this amount labor received $485, or about 54½ per cent, while capital had $408, or about 45¼ per cent, reversing in the interest of labor the division of net products. While the capital required to keep one hand employed had to be increased 76 per cent from 1860 under a free-trade policy to 1890 under protection, and the needed raw material was over one-third greater, the product of labor was only increased 38 per cent. The increase in earnings over the cost of material was $243 per hand. Of this increase labor received in enhanced wages $196 while capital only received $47 as its share of this gain.

THE TRIUMPH OF PROTECTION.

To understand the significance of these figures we must remember that from 1861 to 1865 the country was engaged in waging the greatest civil war of history; that it was a period of terrible waste and destruction, and that when it ended one extensive area of our country was ruined and its labor system completely destroyed. It lacked both money and credit, and had, besides its lands, only the brave hearts and the strong hands of its men on which to depend for its rehabilitation. Then, too, many of the great industries that had grown up in the North and West to supply the Army and Navy with war supplies of every kind had to be converted to other uses, while at the same time there were restored to civil life and to the ranks of industry many hundred thousand men who had followed the flag. The nation was staggering under the burden of an immense debt and a depreciated currency. It had also to deal with the vast question of reconstruction, and to bring about harmony and brotherly love between the people of the South and those of the loyal States. It was protection that enabled the country to overcome all these difficulties, to restore the credit of the Government, to meet current expenses and carry forward great national improvements, to pension the wounded and the bereaved, to bring the vast amount of paper currency to a par with gold, to reduce by large annual payments the national debt and the heavy interest charges it carried, and to do all this with so little friction and with such steadily increasing prosperity that all civilized nations, who had watched with wonder the sublime struggle, were still more amazed at the splendid statesmanship that carried the country through its myriad perplexities and made it stronger in all that constitutes national power and national prosperity.

The years 1892 and 1893 saw the culmination of this grand period of national progress. Then influences that had been long and insidiously at work to cause a reaction finally succeeded, and in the election of 1892 administrative and legislative control was wrested from the party that for more than thirty years had carried the country onward and upward. Since then the people have been realizing more and more with each passing day how grossly they were deceived, and what a fearful blunder they were led to commit.

If it be true—and all our experience proves that it is—that national prosperity stimulates industry and creates a demand for labor that must increase the wages of workingmen, it is equally true that cheaper imported competitive commodities must destroy national prosperity, and the demand for labor must decrease in proportion to the importation, because all competitive importation supplants home production, thereby reducing the rate of wages. It has been well said that—

> It does not lie within the brain of mortal man to frame any law that can determine for the whole people a fixed rate of wages without destroying personal liberty. The prosperity of every nation is measured by the prosperity of the masses, which is determined by the rate of wages they receive. Freedom, personal liberty, and national prosperity can not continue when the wage earner is poor and dependent.

But before the passage of the Wilson-Gorman bill, during all our thirty years of prosperous progress, each wage earner had in the long run secured his fair remuneration for his services and had been as independent and free and as self-respecting as any other citizen.

LABOR STRIKES.

A recent report of the United States Commissioner of Labor on labor strikes and lockouts during the period from 1881 to June 30, 1894, gives some statistics that throw a strong side light on this subject. Summarizing briefly the result of the years 1891 to 1894, we have the following results:

	Number of strikes.	Employees made idle.
1891-92, 24 months	3,016	505,735
1893-94, 18 months	2,201	747,980

Loss to employees.

	Strikes.	Lockouts.	Total.
1891-92, 24 months	$25,574,336	$3,739,722	$29,314,058
1893-94, 18 months	38,176,519	7,116,632	45,293,151

Loss to employers.

	Strikes.	Lockouts.	Total.
1891-92—24 months	$11,322,979	$2,311,968	$13,634,947
1893-94—18 months	18,963,361	1,630,904	20,594,265

During the years 1891 and 1892 the country was under an Administration favorable to protection.

During the later period, to June 30, 1894, we were afflicted with a free-trade Administration for sixteen months, and the certainty of it during theother two months.

During the free-trade year and a half there were 242,245 more employees made idle by strikes than in the two full years of protection.

During the free-trade year and a half the loss of wages to employees was $15,979,093 more than in the two full years of protection.

During the free-trade year and a half the loss to employers of labor was $6,959,318 more than in the two full years of protection. Bringing the facts down to an average monthly basis, we have the following:

Monthly averages.

	Protection, 1891-92.	Free trade, 1893-94.	Free trade increase.
Employees made idle	21,072	41,554	20,482
Wage loss of employees	$1,221,419	$2,516,286	$1,294,867
Loss to employers	$569,123	$1,144,126	$576,003

During the present free-trade Administration there were 20,482 more employees idle every month, through strikes or lockouts, than during the protection period. The loss of wages to employees was $1,294,867 a month more under Mr. Cleveland's régime, and the loss to employers was $575,003 a month more. Both employers and employees have common ground and good reason to oppose anything that will ever help to restore to power an Administration favorable to free trade.

THE BALANCE OF TRADE.

The Democratic argument in favor of free trade has been condensed into two phrases: First, "If we do not buy, we can not sell;" second, "Give our manufacturers free raw materials, and we can command the world's markets." The statistics of the United States Treasury fully refute these specious arguments. The statement of our exports and imports for 1895 may be thus summarized:

	Twelve months ended December 31—
	1894.	1895.
Domestic exports	$807,312,116	$807,775,849
Foreign imports	676,312,941	801,626,638
Favorable balance	130,999,175	6,149,211

In 1894, with four months of the free-trade tariff bill, we still had a balance of trade in our favor amounting to $130,999,175. But with a full year of the "perfidy-and-dishonor" tariff law the whole of this favorable trade balance was wiped out with the exception of a paltry $6,000,000. Note that our exports were practically the same in each year, but the wiping out was done by an increase of $125,000,000 in our imports for 1895. The following are the official free trade and protection records of imports and exports for the periods specified:

Protection and free-trade imports.

Totals	892,140,572	824,862,475
Free-trade decrease in exports		67,278,097

Thus we had as a result of one year of a free-trade tariff an increase in imports of $146,668,868 and a decrease in exports of $67,278,097, being a total loss in one year of $213,946,965.

The free-trade orators must find better arguments than the two I have quoted if they wish to convince people that they are right. Facts are against them. But the United States Treasury has an abundance of telling statistics that show how unreasonable and fallacious are these arguments. From the following table it will be seen that during the four years 1890-1893 England bought a little over two and one-half times as much from us as she sold to us, and for 1892, a year in which the McKinley bill was fully operative, she bought over twice as much as she sold us. An inspection of the table also proves that in general the less we have bought of England the more she has bought of us. From 1893 to 1895 the excess of exports was $65,000,000 less than from 1890 to 1892, proving clearly that under a policy savoring of free trade the Britisher sells us more and buys less from us. In 1895 the excess of exports was nearly $100,000,000 below the excess in 1894. So much for tariff reform.

FREE RAW MATERIAL.

Mr. President, no one feature of this free-trade tariff subject is more interesting or instructive than the gratification that the Wilson-Gorman measure has afforded to our British cousins. The passage of that act was a godsend to all the textile mills of Yorkshire, to the cutlers, the potters, and various other British manufacturers who have been drawing more gold from us of late than they have handled before in many years. At the annual meeting last February of the A. S. Henry Company, Limited, of Bradford, one of the largest of the Anglo-American shipping houses of that city, Sir Henry Mitchell, chairman of that company, said:

When the shareholders assembled twelve months ago it was at the close of a very trying and very difficult year, and the directors had to put before them business results which were considerably less than the average for a number of years past, and even less than in any year since the company was formed. He was very glad to meet the shareholders with a very much more satisfactory report and very much better results. [Hear! Hear!] As they would see from the balance sheet, the net divisible profits were about £46,000 more than they were last year, and nearly £20,000 more than the highest amount realized since the company was formed. He hoped that the results would be considered satisfactory. Then, speaking of the general prospects of trade, he said those shareholders who were at the last annual meeting would remember that he held out some hope of improved trade, and stated that the company had orders on their books of upward of £500,000 to commence the business of the year. He was now very glad to be able to say that at the present time the orders amounted to nearly £1,000,000. [Applause.] So that their prospects, at any rate, were somewhat encouraging for the new year.

It will be observed that the first year of our Democratic tariff with free wool enabled a British woolen manufacturing concern to record profits of "the highest amount realized since the company was formed." It also began the second year of our free-trade experiment with orders on hand that amounted to nearly $5,000,000. No wonder the British stockholders greeted these remarks of Sir Henry with "applause" as they compared the annual reports of 1894 and 1895, a digest of which is given in the following parallels:

A. & S. Henry Company, Limited, Bradford.

Annual report, 1894.		Annual report, 1895.
Profit	£63,910	Profit	£95,708
Dividend	5 per cent	Dividend	7 per cent
Reserve fund	£35,000	Reserve fund	£100,000
Carried forward	£910	Carried forward	£16,708

Although only a 7 per cent dividend was paid, yet the chairman explained that the company had really earned 12 per cent, but that this was one of the years when it was prudent to add a large sum to the reserve fund. Possibly he was anticipating Republican success in this country next November. This is not a manufacturing, but a mercantile company, that handles the various goods of that district, and does an enormous trade with the dry goods merchants of the United States. But others, equally capable of talking business, have testified to how British manufacturers have profited by American folly. At the thirty-fifth annual meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of the United Kingdom, held March 12 to 14, inclusive, Sir Albert K. Rollit, its president, said:

American tariff reform has (notwithstanding the adverse influence of the resurrection of the silver question) so far stimulated our exports of cotton goods as to have doubled their value in February as against January, to have increased the quantity from eleven to eighteen million yards during 1895 as against the corresponding period of 1894, and to have made this year's shipments exceed those of two years ago in both quantity and value. Similarly there have been larger linen shipments to the States for both the last month and the two months of the present year, while in woolens the advance in values has been three times and in worsteds four times more than in 1894, and in quantity quite 400 per cent. So, too, the same beneficial influence has made itself felt in great increases during both the month and year and in both quantity and values of our consignments to America of cutlery, rails, and iron and steel goods generally, and more especially of tin plates, as also in earthenware and china, and to the extent of 600 per cent in shipments of raw wool.

Let me make a quotation to show how all Yorkshire has felt the reviving influence of that tariff measure, which has nearly paralyzed the woolen industry of the United States, but has revived and made prosperous scores of mills in Bradford and the great manufacturing district of which it is the center. A recent issue of the New York Tribune contained a long letter from its very careful and critically observant London correspondent, in which the great revival of business in the Bradford district is described at length. In part the correspondent says:

After a long series of lean years the Bradford district has been blessed with a fat one.

This correspondent goes on to say:

The American tariff was changed in 1890, and the Bradford trade with the United States in men's coatings, which had amounted to $6,500,000 in 1889, dropped to $2,500,000 in 1891, and after a temporary revival during the next two years fell again to $1,300,000 in 1894. In like manner the exports of stuff goods, which had averaged $6,000,000 in 1890, sank to the low level of $2,200,000 in 1894. The old and the new industries of Bradford suffered alike from the McKinley tariff, which largely increased the duties on stuff goods and coatings. It was a period of profound gloom for the entire district. The reaction came when the duties on goods for the American market were reduced about one-half in the Wilson tariff, and when also bright mohair and similar lustrous fabrics were again fashionable for women's wear. A well-informed specialist, whose figures I take from an exhaustive industrial review of the Bradford trade published in the London Times, states that the exports of coatings to the United States rose from $1,275,626 for the year ended September 30, 1894, to $6,575,062 in 1895 at a corresponding date. This increase of nearly 600 per cent reveals the full effect of the Wilson tariff during the first year when it was in operation. The export of stuff goods during the same period ran up from $2,200,000 to $8,375,000. It was virtually quadrupled, but a portion of this increase in the export of bright fabrics may fairly be accounted for by the change of fashion. On the basis of the consular statistics for the year ended December 30, 1895, the results of the repeal of the McKinley tariff may be enlarged considerably. The export of worsted coatings to the United States was $8,561,228; that of stuff goods, $9,748,527. The entire Bradford trade with the United States during 1895 ran up from $8,215,234 to $27,745,096.

Business improved with every portion of the world, but the largest gain was in the trade with the United States; and this was mainly due to the reduction of duties on woolen and worsted goods. The point which I am now seeking to emphasize—is the fact that whatever may have been the effect of the new wool schedule upon competing American manufacturers, or the price of wool, or the cost of clothing, the reduction of duties has powerfully promoted the fortunes of the Bradford district. This has been a year of unexampled prosperity. In the worsted trade alone 120,000 operatives are employed in the West Riding of Yorkshire, and they have had uninterrupted work on full time. During the busiest portion of the last year there was a scarcity of labor, and hundreds of young women who had gone into domestic service returned to the mills. Every worsted and woolen mill in West Yorkshire has been running on full time. Some of the old properties which had been standing idle for many years started up again under the impetus of the revival of the popularity of lustrous fabrics. The entire woolen district, with Leeds and Huddersfield, brought within a radius of a dozen miles from Bradford, contains a population exceeding 900,000, and its prosperity during the last year has been shown by unmistakable signs. There has been no lack of employment; the savings of the working class have largely increased, as is proved by the returns of the savings banks; manufacturers and merchants have had the best trade known for many years, and, in the main, there has been a rising market in prices, with fortunes to be rapidly made in certain lines of goods.

Another exultant English correspondent exclaims:

Under the Republican tariff Bradford exported worsteds worth $2,200,000 to the United States. Under the Wilson tariff last year Bradford exported $8,375,000 of worsteds to the United States. Bradford has $6,175,000 in pocket that she would not have had if Professor Wilson were not a statesman. Hurrah for Bradford! Hurrah for Professor Wilson! And damn the United States!

Now, what has happened in those British mills because of free wool and the reduced duties on woolens and worsteds under the Wilson-Gorman tariff has been exactly reversed in those industries in this country by the operation of the same law. The most accurate information respecting this is to be found in the annual reports of the Massachusetts bureau of labor. As the old Bay State does at least a fourth of the woolen manufacturing of the country, the statistics compiled there for the past five years probably furnish the best obtainable information of the condition of that industry in this country. The latest compilation covers a period of five years, from 1890 to 1894, inclusive. It gives the following statistics:

Capital invested	$28,271,436	$27,835,204	$28,440,8[illegible]	$25,554,880	$24,094,195
Stock used	$19,461,008	$21,162,373	$21,300,933	$16,674,542	$13,019,911
Goods made	$31,151,139	$33,989,350	$35,673,477	$28,061,054	$22,284,958
Number of establishments	138	139	142	115	115

This exhibit represents a substantial growth of the woolen manufacturing industry from 1890 to 1892, the value of the product made increasing by $4,500,000 in 138 establishments within the two years. A contrary condition, however, was experienced with startling results in the two subsequent years, when the output of the factories decreased by nearly $13,400,000, and the factories decreased 17 in number. Taking next the employment of labor, we find it to have been as follows in the same factories:

	1890.	1891.	1892.	1893.	1894.
Average number	16,816	17,479	18,199	15,857	14,261
Smallest number	15,054	16,007	16,280	11,240	10,163
Greatest number	18,426	18,821	19,545	18,581	16,703

It naturally follows that more employment was given to labor in the woolen mills of Massachusetts in 1892 than in either of the two preceding or subsequent years, the average number employed that year being 1,833 more than in 1890, and nearly 4,000 more than in 1894. Turning next to the wages paid to labor in the woolen mills of that State, we find the amount of the average earnings to have been as follows:

Year.	Total paid.	Average yearly earnings.
1892	7,061,211	388
1894	4,887,984	343

Here again, not only was the aggregate total the largest in 1892, but the average earnings of each man were greatest in that year. A circulation of $1,400,000 more wage earnings in 1892 than in 1890 must have meant greater general prosperity in the manufacturing centers of Massachusetts, and the falling off of money circulation by nearly $2,200,000 in 1894 must have had a dampening effect on business prosperity. An increase in the average yearly earnings of $20 per employee, followed by a decrease of $45 a year, represents a very startling condition in the value of labor. Taking the reports for the five years we are enabled to make another interesting comparison of the value of the goods made in 101 different woolen establishments for each year from 1890 to 1894, showing the increase or decrease in the value and per cent as compared with the previous year. These facts are here given.

Goods made in 101 different establishments.

Year.	Value of goods.	Increase (+) or decrease (—) as compared with previous year.
		Value.	Per cent.
1891	30,170,615	+$2,791,935	+10.20
1892	31,035,734	+ 865,119	+ 2.87
1893	26,063,436	— 4,972,298	—16.02
1894	20,903,019	— 5,160,417	—19.80

It will thus be seen that in these 101 establishments the increase in the output was $2,791,935 in 1891, a gain of 10.20 per cent over 1890. In 1892 the further increase was $865,119, or 2.87 per cent. This improvement did not last, for in 1893 there was a decrease of almost $5,000,000, or 16.02 per cent, and again in 1894 a still further decrease of $5,160,417, or 19.80 per cent, in the output of the woolen mills. The condition of the woolen industry of Massachusetts is probably as good if not better than of the remaining mills of the country. Evidently the same law that carried peace, plenty, and prosperity to the woolen manufacturers of Great Britain has depressed the same business on this side of the ocean and made it unprofitable.

In New Hampshire the woolen industry is very seriously crippled. In Cheshire County there are eight woolen mills, employing in good times about 1,200 operatives. Recently the Keene Sentinel made careful inquiry of the managers of these mills, three of whom are Republicans and three Democrats, and note the result. The Sentinel of April 18, 1896, says editorially, under the caption of "Silent Looms":

No important business has been so disastrously affected by the Wilson-Gorman tariff law as the manufacture of woolens. All over the country the experience seems to be the same—inability to cope with English competition and the consequent closing of the mills in whole or in part, or, if the mills keep up their production, the profits are miserably small. Our mills in Cheshire County have suffered with the rest. Mill owners have lost profits, laborers have lost work, and storekeepers have lost trade. Hinsdale and Ashuelot have been struck the hardest blow. They were lively places a year ago. Now their principal industrial establishments are closed and the towns are quiet beyond precedent. Everybody in the two villages feels the hard times and almost everybody curses the Wilson law.

The loss in labor and wages owing to the depression in the woolen business is astonishingly large. In good times, say in the fall of 1892, the woolen mills of the county were employing 1,200 hands and paying out in wages about $36,000 a month. At present the same mills are employing not quite 400 hands and are paying in wages between $11,000 and $12,000 a month. In other words, the number of laborers employed and the aggregate amount of wages have been reduced two-thirds. These figures are compiled from statistics obtained from the manufacturers and are most of them found in the detailed statements given below.

Following is a comparison by mills of hands employed and aggregate monthly wages paid before the passage of the Wilson law and now:

	Hands employed.		Wages paid.
	Good times.	Now.	Good times.	Now.
Haile & Frost	375	30	$12,000	$1,200
Thayer	300		7,000
Dickinson	80	65	2,500	1,800
Faulkner & Colony	65	65?	6,000	6,000
Cheshire Mills	115	115§
Amidon	100		4,000
Gilsum Woolen Co	75	50	2,500	1,300
Collins	70	65	2,100	1,600
Total	1,180	390	36,100	11,900

The proprietor of another large woolen mill in New Hampshire wrote me a few days ago: "Our business has been, and is now, as poor as poor can be."

What a commentary that is upon the Democratic contention that free wool and low tariff are of advantage to the manufacturer and the laborer. Free wool has almost entirely destroyed the woolen industry of this country, and has thrown out of employment thousands upon thousands of honest and intelligent American workingmen for the benefit of foreign mills and foreign labor.

Recently the New York Press made some inquiries among New England woolen mills, with the idea of showing their condition now as compared with a year ago. Returns from 32 mills were received, and the following is the result:

Mills shut down	14
Mills on quarter time	10
Mills on eighth time	5
Mills on half time	1
Mills practically closed	2
Operators practically idle	7,500
Estimated annual wages of these operators one year ago	$3,000,000
Estimated annual wages of operators to-day	$375,000
Loss to the country in wages	$2,625,000
Loss to the country in native raw material, say	$5,000,000

Beyond a doubt these woolen mills have shut down or reduced their force with much execration of free traders. None of the shoddy mills have shut down. They are busy making the best possible product they can that will compete with the looms in the British ragshops. Free trade in raw wool is closing American woolen mills, while it promotes the industry of the European ragpicker and of the British shoddy shops.

And what is true of the woolen industry of the country is relatively true of almost every other industry. On every hand complaints are heard, and the army of the unemployed is bitter in its denunciation of so-called tariff reform. All kinds of business is suffering. A few weeks ago I received a letter from the senior member of a business firm in New Hampshire which has been engaged in manufacturing since 1813. He is a quiet, conservative man, but he writes as follows:

I assure you the business situation is serious with all of us, and unless the Congress wakes up to the real situation there will certainly be some demonstration similar to the one at Chicago. I think I understand the position of the Senators, but I am afraid they do not realize the actual situation of the business men all over the country, who have been dragging along as best they could for the past two years, not making a cent profit, but shrinking their capital and plants in order to keep doing something until the tide turns, if it ever does, and if they can hold out.

That gentleman was making a plea for the passage of the so-called Dingley bill, which had passed the House of Representatives, and the consideration of which was voted against by every Democratic Senator.

A SUMMARY OF THE SITUATION.

Mr. President, manufacturing is fearfully depressed, workmen are either out of employment or working for reduced wages, one-half the railroad mileage of the United States is in the hands of receivers, and the Government is borrowing money to pay its current expenses. In this connection a comparison between the workings of the first nineteen months of the McKinley and the Wilson-Gorman law will be instructive. During the first nineteen months of the McKinley law the receipts of the Government exceeded the expenditures $24,988,221, while during the first nineteen months of the Wilson-Gorman law the expenditures exceeded the receipts $76,257,515.

It is estimated that when the heavy payments of June, July, and August come along they will bring the total deficiency up to nearly or quite a round $100,000,000 by the end of the second year of the new law's work. There have been but three months in the nineteen in which the law has been in operation in which it did not create a deficiency, and the prospect is not cheering for anything better. It seems impossible for the new law to reach more than about $26,000,000 or $27,000,000 in its monthly receipts, thus making the deficiency from $3,000,000 to $6,000,000 a month on an average, running up some months to $9,000,000 or $10,000,000.

The public debt was reduced as follows during the four years of the Administration of President Harrison:

1890	104,540,790
1891	114,783,990
1892	25,499,790
Total reduction for the four years	365,493,170

Now note the effect of the Democratic triumph of 1892. Since then the public debt has steadily increased, the increase for 1893, 1894, and 1895 being as follows:

1894	50,004,790
1895	81,160,170
Being a total increase of	131,172,730

for the years 1893, 1894, and 1895, and the debt continues to pile up every month of the present year.

Interest-bearing bonds have been sold by the present Administration to the enormous amount of $262,000,000, which when paid, with interest added, will aggregate about $500,000,000, every dollar of which the taxpayers of the country will have to sacrifice on the altar of that miserable Democratic heresy called "tariff reform."

The following is an accurate statement of the Treasury account on May 1, 1896:

Cash in Treasury March 1, 1893	$124,128,087
Cash added by sale of bonds, premium added	293,454,272
Total	417,582,359
Cash in Treasury May 1, 1896	270,090,000
Expenditures in excess of receipts	147,482,669

History has simply repeated itself. The result of the present low tariff is precisely the same as this country has experienced from every other similar law that has been passed since the Government was organized. Under it, while our own mills are half idle and our own laborers working on part time with decreased pay, our British rivals are waxing fat over profits lugged away from this market. It is a curious condition of things, and interesting just as a study of the possibilities of human folly. We pass a tariff act to prostrate our manufacturing industries. We adopt a British system to ruin our farming industries. Then we borrow money with which to pay our running expenses, and finally we try to keep gold in the Treasury by making agreements to pay out more than we take in.

The Republican party loudly proclaimed what the result would be if the McKinley law was repealed and a tariff-for-revenue law substituted. Before that folly was consummated the two eminent Republican statesmen who are to-day more prominently before the American people than any others sounded a note of alarm, which ought to have been heeded by the American Congress. Let me quote their utterances:

Major McKinley, of Ohio, the great apostle of protection, declared as follows:

A revenue tariff encourages no home enterprise; it supplies employment to no American workingman; it takes employment from him because in the encouragement of foreign importations it diminishes the demand for American products. It is an enemy to the American shop and the American workingman, to American prosperity and American industrial independence. It embraces not a single element of patriotism. It has no national spirit or instinct. To supply the needs of the Treasury is its chief and exclusive concern; it has no other. It is a sure precursor to national poverty, national bankruptcy, and individual distress. It is the forerunner of hard times. It is without a single worthy triumph. The years in which it has been tried in the United States excite neither our respect nor pride. It has furnished no inspiring page in our history. Its record has been one of deficient revenues, gathered bonded indebtedness, and universal want among the people.

Mr. President, in the light of events those words sound like prophecy, and I commend them to the careful attention of the American people. And the great Speaker of the National House of Representatives, Mr. REED, in talking to the Democratic majority in the Fifty-third Congress used this instructive language:

I confess to you that this question of wages is to me the vital question. To insure our growth in civilization and wealth we must not only have wages as high as they are now but constantly and steadily increasing. [Loud applause on the Republican side.] No applause for this sentiment, I notice, on the Democratic side. This desire of mine for constantly increasing wages does not have its origin in love for the individual, but in love for the whole nation in that enlightened selfishness which recognizes the great truth that your fate and mine, Mr. Speaker, and the fate of your descendants and mine are so wrapped up in the fate of all others that whatever contributes to their progress gives to us all a nobler future and a higher hope.

Those two utterances embody the very essence of the tariff question, and with them this discussion may well be closed.

Mr. President, what I said in this Chamber two years ago has been literally verified, and it will be emphasized in the elections to be held this year. The people have decreed the overthrow of the Democratic party and the election of a Republican President. The blight of tariff reform will in due time pass away, and it will be demonstrated that only through a return to genuine American protection can prosperity be renewed and the country be enabled to enter upon another period of commercial and industrial success. That change is inevitable, and when it comes the gloom and distress of the present will be exchanged for the joy and the gladness that the music of the loom and the spindle brings to the heart of the American toiler. Then American capital and American labor will produce most of what we consume, and a home market will be ready for the products of the farm. Then the deficit in our revenues will give way to a surplus, and American homes will be cheered and comforted, because American skill and American genius will be employed at remunerative wages. Speed the day when the doctrines and disasters of free trade will give way to the grand Republican doctrine of protection to American capital, American labor, and American agriculture.

Mr. DANIEL and Mr. PETTIGREW addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I desire to have the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will recognize the Senator from South Dakota for that purpose.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The conference report has been printed.

Mr. DANIEL. I had wished to submit some remarks this evening, if the Senate will indulge me. I hope the Senator will not interrupt me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota desire to proceed with the conference report?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think it is important that we should do so. I understand that there will be discussion in regard to it, and it ought to be disposed of, as the conferees have not reached a full agreement.

Mr. WALTHALL. Is this a request for unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the report or is it a motion to take it up? The report was made yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that it is in order to call up the report at any time without a motion.

Mr. WALTHALL. I do not so understand the rule, sir. It is in order to present a conference report, but I think it has to be taken up by a vote of the Senate. There is no doubt about that, I presume, under the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota will state the situation of the report.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I made the report yesterday, and stated that I desired to have it printed for the purpose of calling it up to-day. I think the RECORD will so show.

Mr. WALTHALL. It has to be taken up on motion.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will listen to the ruling of the Chair on that point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the impression of the Chair that under those circumstances the report is a privileged question and can be called up at any time; that the report does not lose its privilege by having been printed.

Mr. WALTHALL. I ask the Chair to have the rule read.

Mr. PASCO. Rule XXVII covers the point.

Mr. WALTHALL. Let Rule XXVII be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Rule XXVII will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

RULE XXVII.

REPORTS OF CONFERENCE COMMITTEES.

The presentation of reports of committees of conference shall always be in order, except when the Journal is being read or a question of order or a motion to adjourn is pending, or while the Senate is dividing; and when received, the question of proceeding to the consideration of the report, if raised, shall be immediately put, and shall be determined without debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair continues under the impression that having the report printed does not make it lose its precedence. Of course the question of consideration can be raised.

Mr. PASCO. That is raised.

Mr. WALTHALL. That is the question I have raised.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will then submit the question to the Senate.

Mr. GORMAN. I trust the Senator in charge of the conference report will permit it to go over until to-morrow, in view of the fact that the Senator from Virginia desires to address the Senate.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Very well. I will allow it to go over, but I shall call it up the first thing after the routine business to-morrow morning. I give that notice.

Mr. WALTHALL. There is no unanimous consent given that the report shall be taken up at that time. I wish that understood.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I suppose it will be taken up under the rule.

Mr. WALTHALL. Yes; taken up by a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that it is in order for the Senator from Mississippi to object to the consideration of the report when it is called up. The Senator from Virginia will proceed.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, the distinguished and able Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] yesterday addressed the Senate in an elaborate speech upon the pending question. In that speech he reproached Congress, including many if not a majority of his own colleagues, upon the ground that they had not responded to the Presidential demand upon Congress to provide measures that would restore confidence and bring relief to the country. He said:

The President has repeatedly recommended such Congressional action as would restore confidence and avert possible disaster, but nothing in that line has been done.

Those remarks, sir, were made in connection with his animadversions to the depleted condition of the Treasury, and I beg leave, before passing beyond them, to point out the fact that though far from recommending to Congress any measure which would refurnish the Treasury with supplies, the President has himself in his message scouted the idea of an insufficient revenue, and has emphatically advised the country that the issues of bonds which have been made during this Administration were not based upon any such view of the subject.

THE PRESIDENT HAS ASKED FOR NOTHING BUT GOLD BONDS.

In his message addressed to this Congress at its convening last December he said:

At no time when bonds have been issued has there been any consideration of the question of paying the expenses of Government with their proceeds. There was no necessity to consider that question. At the time of each bond issue we had a safe surplus in the Treasury for ordinary operations, exclusive of the gold in our reserve. In February, 1894, when the first issue of bonds was made, such surplus amounted to over $18,000,000; in November, when the second issue was made, it amounted to more than $42,000,000, and in February, 1895, when bonds for the third time were issued, such surplus amounted to more than $100,000,000. It now amounts to $98,072,420.30.

With this statement of facts from the President of the United States I take it, sir, that the Senator from Kentucky, with his reproach to Congress for not providing revenue, can not be sustained by those who are most familiar with the subject and who have official custody of our Governmental affairs.

Mr. President, it is very obvious that the President has called upon Congress to do but one thing, and that is to authorize him to issue gold bonds. It can not be that the country has suffered from Congress refusing to the President such authority. He has experienced no difficulty in getting all the money he asked for, and in having much more than he asked for offered to the Treasury under his interpretation of present laws which are provided. Therefore, to charge upon Congress that any condition with which we have to deal is attributable to its action, and to attempt to relieve the Administration under this condition of affairs from any share therein, is obviously incorrect, and I have only to avouch its own record and its claim to demonstrate it.

THE RAINBOW PICTURES OF THE SENATOR FROM KENTUCKY.

Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky proceeded to paint a rainbow picture of the condition of the country. Instead of being in trouble, according to the logic of his view, the country was never so rich, so prosperous, or so pleasantly situated. As to the farmers, he said they are getting more for the proceeds of their crops than they ever did before in the history of agriculture. A farmer who has 50 cents in his pocket can buy more Barlow knives, more penknives, more inkstands, and more paper than he ever could in the history of this country, and the Senator from Kentucky can not, therefore, understand why the farmers are not happy. His view of that subject puts me in mind of the claim of the clown in the circus, who declared before an admiring audience that he could jump so high that he could not put a half dollar between him and the moon. "How is that?" asked one of the surprised auditors. He answered, "It did not make any difference how high I jumped; I did not have the half dollar to put there."

THE DEARTH OF MONEY.

This question is presented to the American people very much in that aspect. There is lack of money in this country to sustain the values of all of its manufactured articles and its agricultural produce. It does not go to the core of the matter, it does not suggest relief, to say that the laborer can get more bread for his dollar than ever before, or that the farmer can buy more knives with his dollar than ever before. It is a question of getting the dollar and of making the dollar so dear to the laborer, to the manufacturer, and to the agriculturist that all of their efforts to get dollars are circumvented by the margin of profit from one year to another fading away and leaving them depleted, with their industries prostrate.

THE VAST DEPRECIATION OF VALUES.

I hold in my hand a careful compilation of the statistics of this country, taken from the American, of Philadelphia, of April 4 of this year. I beg leave to insert it as a part of my remarks. It says:

[From the American, of Philadelphia, of April 4, 1896.]

THE WAGE EARNER NOT BENEFITED BY FALLING PRICES.

In 1872 the acreage of our cereal crops, corn, wheat, oats, barley, rye, and buckwheat, was 68,280,197 acres, and the farm value of our cereal crops $874,594,459, the average value of the yield per acre being $12.81. In 1895 the acreage of our cereal crops was 149,955,163 acres, the farm value $1,017,316,936, and the average value of the yield per acre $6.78, the value to our farmers of every acre of cereals harvested in 1895 being $6.03 less than in 1872. If the money yield per acre had been as great in 1895 as in 1872, if the farmers had been as fully recompensed in 1895 for their labor expended in raising cereals as they were in 1872, they would have received $900,000,000 more for their cereal crops in 1895 than they did.

In 1871-72 the yield of cotton in the United States was 1,384,084,494 pounds and the farm value $288,300,000. This, however, was a short crop. In 1872-73 the yield was 1,833,188,931 pounds and the value $301,067,500. For the year ending June 30, 1895, the yield was 5,036,964,409 pounds and the farm value $262,426,000. For the year before, an average year, the yield was 3,760,381,478 pounds and the farm value $263,857,000. The cotton crop of 1894-95 was nearly three times as large and the cotton crop of 1893-94 more than twice as large as the cotton crop of 1872-73, yet the money value was less. The cotton acreage for 1894-95 was more than twice the acreage for 1872-73, but the value of the crop was $40,000,000 less. Making all due allowance for the effect on the price of cotton of the extraordinary crop of 1894-95, the largest on record, and taking the 1893-94 crop as a basis for comparison, we are forced to the conclusion that the loss of income to our cotton planters caused by the fall in the price of cotton, and directly due to the competition with the cotton of silver-using countries engendered by the fall in the gold price of silver, has not been less than $350,000,000 annually for the two years ending June 30 last.

As shown in another column, the number of horses in the United States January 1, 1896, was 64 per cent greater than on January 1, 1873; of mules, 74 per cent greater; of milch cows, 53 per cent greater; of oxen and other cattle, 93 per cent greater; of sheep, 16 per cent greater; and of swine, 31 per cent greater; yet the total value of farm animals was 3 per cent less on January 1, 1896, than January 1, 1873. As we have shown elsewhere, if the value of farm animals per head was as great January 1, 1896, as it was January 1, 1873, the value of farm animals to-day would be between $2,600,000,000 and $2,700,000,000 instead of $1,600,000,000, and assuming the value of farm animals is realized by those raising live stock once in four years, this represents a loss to the farmers on account of the fall in live stock as compared to prices in 1872 of not less than $250,000,000 for the one year 1895.

Thus we have seen that because of the fall in prices since 1872, directly due to the demonetization of silver, the farm value of cereals was $900,000,000 less for 1895 than it would have been, the value of the cotton crop to the planter $350,000,000 less, and the loss to those raising live stock not less than $250,000,000, or a sum of $1,500,000,000 on agricultural products, representing three-fourths of the total value of farm products. In other words, if the agricultural classes had received proportionately the same reward for their labor expended in raising cereals, cotton, and live stock in 1895 as they did in 1872, the value of their products would have been about $3,150,000,000 instead of $1,650,000,000.

THE LOSSES OF AGRICULTURE.

From this carefully compiled statistical statement, which shows that the value of agricultural products of the United States, measured in money, is $1,500,000,000 less in 1895 than it was in 1872, it is evident that something has gone wrong in our affairs, for it would take more than all our currency to recoup the loss of that single year. The intrinsic qualities of corn, oats, wheat, rye, buckwheat, cotton, and farm animals have not changed. The intrinsic qualities of gold and silver are also the same. And that monetary value does not vest solely on intrinsic quality is a necessary conclusion, else why is it not the same in the same quantity of such articles to-day, yesterday, and forever?

That the "new factor" of depressed prices pointed out by Sir W. Houldsworth, a delegate of Great Britain to the Brussels International Monetary Conference of 1892, is getting in its work, that the "accursed sinking of prices" pointed out by Prof. E. Benjamin Andrews, an eminent American, who was one of our representatives to that conference, is pulling down and paralyzing our farming industries and all others dependent upon it—including factories, banks, and railroads—all this is now a painful and palpable realization.

INCREASE OF DEBTS AND DISLOCATION OF MONEY.

I attribute this changed condition chiefly, as do so many of the ablest minds in the world—which are far more competent than mine to judge—to the immense increase of public and private debts and to the dislocation of our bimetallic base of credit; and I propose once more to tax the patience of the Senate. But I say this much now for introduction, for it is my desire to develop my views on our situation in a systematic way, and to take my own time to state them as I approach the question of fallen and falling prices.

NO RELIEF TO BE HOPED FOR FROM THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

Whatever else we may expect about the condition of affairs, there is nothing to be hoped for from the Republican party in the way of any relief for the people. It may yet prove a blessing in disguise that they carried the country at the last election, for they have already had time to advertise their impotency to accomplish anything and their indisposition to endeavor to do anything that would bring relief to this situation.

Wherever we look in the direction of Government to-day there is deficiency, insufficiency, and makeshift. Deficiency of revenue, deficiency of gold, as we are told, deficiency of bonds, insufficiency of taxation, makeshift proposals for more bonds, more taxation, and more contraction of the currency are the only legislative responses. No financial system exists save a rickety, spasmodic, wheezy, panic-breeding system with the fate mark of its own death upon its forehead. No system is proposed save one that does not deserve the name; none is proposed either by the Administration or the legislative party in power unless we may call that a system which deliberately roots up and tears down what we have without the substitution of anything and without the suggestion of anything but petty palliatives for mortal wounds.

ORGANIZERS OF EMERGENCIES.

As organizers of emergencies the gold monometallists are complete successes. They have been in emergencies ever since they leaped into the saddle.

Successive emergencies follow each other like successive shocks of an earthquake. Emergencies are sandwiched between glowing prophecies of prosperity, which are made before every new issue of bonds and collapse as soon as they are taken. Every dose of medicine administered to the patient is followed by momentary calm, and then a long-protracted spasm. Our new Republican doctors came post haste, with flourish of trumpet and profusion of promise. We were told by them that the old doctors of Democracy were quacks, and that they, the new ones, knew their business. The country held its breath in December last as they wrote out their prescription. Alas, it was only Sangrado again with basin and lancet, for here are the prescriptions for an expectant people: More bonds, more taxes. To rectify the morals of the people a prohibitory tax is proposed to be imposed upon filled cheese.

The barber's pole is the only sign of relief, the razor the only remedy for depression.

THE REPUBLICAN ICONOCLASTS.

What, indeed, could we have expected other than this from the Republican party? It has been the great iconoclast of our monetary systems and institutions, and it was an evil day for the Democratic party as well as for the country when an Administration put in power by those who had opposed Republican finance for a quarter of a century joined hands with the Republicans to resist reform and construct new plans of ruin. At enormous cost to the taxpayers it provided the national banks, which, however objectionable, were admirable in the solvency secured to their currency. But when increasing population and expanding territory and expanding business needed expanding accommodations the Republican party shriveled up the banks by excessive payments of the bonded debt and provided no substitute for their retiring circulation.

The Republican party gave us also the greenback legal-tender fiat paper money, which was a stroke of genius in its way, albeit as many believe in violation of the time-honored principles of the Constitution. But at a time when this currency was needed wherewithal to pay the prodigious volume of debts and taxes it withdrew and contracted the greenback notes, shriveled up the prices of produce, land, and labor, more than doubling the debts and burdens of the people, and made the bankrupt courts the most active industries of the country. In this career of ruin its course was arrested in time to preserve three hundred and forty-six million of the greenback notes, which, by statute enactment and by Supreme Court decision, were legal and tenderable dollars. While pretending that these paper dollars were in all respects dollars, the Republican party loudly clamored against its own work, declared that it had done an unconstitutional thing, proclaimed in the presence of its own fiat money that no such thing as fiat money could exist, and made boast of superior virtue in ridiculing its own progeny.

At unprecedented usury the Republican party created a national debt payable in dollars. I make no complaint against that debt; the war necessitated it. Considering it to have been legal and honest and that it would be dishonorable to repudiate a dime of it, it has nevertheless been dealt with by the Republican party after the most approved methods of Shylock. It considered the term "dollars" to mean "coined dollars," although the Supreme Court had said that it meant either coin or paper dollars, and then, in order to make coined dollars dearer and the burden of debt greater, the Republican party stopped coining the standard silver dollars and evolved a gold reserve, providing gold only for the redemption of outstanding obligations. Meantime the Republican party had created a trade dollar composed of silver, with 420 grains of weight, whereas the standard dollar has only 412½. This would not circulate because it was not legal tender; it was less valuable than the standard dollar, though the latter had less silver in it. It lay stagnant upon the market and would not circulate; but as soon as it had been bought up by a few bankers and speculators it was paid off at par, although it contained no promise to pay anything.

Finally, in 1890, the Republicans passed the Sherman Act, a veritable Pandora's box of evils; and in 1893 it led off in the movement to repeal it, without the suggestion of a substitute. We can hope for nothing in the way of relief from a party which has such a history and from a party which has gone to the foot of the class in its first attempts at legislation.

NO RELIEF TO BE EXPECTED FROM REPUBLICAN IMITATORS.

Nor can we hope for any relief from those Democrats who, after opposing the Republican party for twenty-five years, passed like "ships that pass in the night" into imitation of Republican policies and now prescribe as a test of true Democracy the question, "Will you join with us in aping and carrying out the policies which your whole history has opposed and denounced?"

It was an evil day for Democracy and an evil day for the country when the gold fledglings of Democracy combined with the Republicans and copied their example.

Alas for the hour, when to Evelyn's bower
The lord of the manor with false vows came.

Our currency is to-day in the most distressing and confused state that it has ever been. The struggling energies of the people are more impeded in every avenue of trade and industry than they have ever been. The magnates of wealth are growing richer faster than they have ever grown before and are more potential than ever before. Poverty is a heavier load upon those who bear it than it has ever been before. Congress is paralyzed; the Presidential candidates are mute of suggestion as to any remedy that will alleviate the miseries or cheer the hopes of the people. The great protectionist of Ohio wraps himself up in the same old platitudes. Both political parties stand confronting a Presidential election, impotent of legislation and impotent of suggestion, and the Republican party, having just assumed the reins of legislation, has gone into bankruptcy with a precipitate rush that would be ludicrous if it were not appalling. As those who are in authority can not manage the business of the American people, they have shown a restless propensity to take hold of the business of other nations. Hawaii, Armenia, Cuba, and Venezuela have become the intimate and dazzling themes of American discourse, and American statesmanship interests itself in affairs in inverse proportion to our proximity from them and our relation to them.

WHAT DO WE PROPOSE?

If we were asked now, What do you propose? we would say return to the principles of the Democratic platform of 1892 upon which Grover Cleveland was nominated and elected President. That platform declared for two things:

> We hold to the use of both gold and silver as the standard money of the country, and to the coinage of both gold and silver without discriminating against either metal or charge for mintage.

The second point in the platform to which I wish to call attention is as follows:

> We recommend that the prohibitory 10 per cent tax on State bank issues be repealed.

I have heretofore shown, Mr. President, and, indeed, it was conceded at the time, that the platform meant the free coinage of both gold and silver. But it does not follow that the people would be content with that platform now. A note may be very good in its inception, but if it once has the mark of protest upon it, its negotiability is lost, and this protested paper will be no longer accepted according to its face. The people will call now for plain and explicit language, and they will also demand that whoever receive their votes for President shall be committed to the platform, that he will pay respect to the voice of their representatives, and will not impede their deliberate judgment by the powers of government and by veto messages.

FOR SOUND MONEY.

I am in favor of sound money, the soundest that the world has ever known. It should consist primarily of gold and silver, the money of civilization from remote ages, the money of America from its earliest period, the money of our Federal Constitution, the money of Democratic faith throughout the career of that great party, the money upon which rests a vast superstructure of public and private debt, and the money under which we prospered as no nation has ever prospered in history. This gold and silver should be "standard money," as demanded by the national Democratic platform of 1892, and should, in its language, be coined "without discrimination against either metal or charge for mintage." This hard, solid, sound, shining, constitutional, historic, Democratic money should be supplemented by paper money or currency redeemable in coin. The units of the whole mass should be maintained at par by having given to each of them parity of legal-tender function, and be as nearly as the art of man can make them of equal value. Being myself as much for sound money as any man in the land, I deny the right of a few people to arrogate to themselves the sole title of sound-money men, and to designate those who do not agree in their new-fangled British notions as "unsound." In appropriating to their exclusive use such phrases they are merely attempting to fill vacuous minds with vague and ambiguous words.

Why change the old Democratic shibboleth of "hard money" for the new and specious and plausible title of sound money? Under analysis they evidently mean that they will give much sound to the ear and little money to the purses of their deluded followers, who, if they permit themselves to be enticed by a catch phrase, will only show that they are grown-up children, "pleased with a rattle and tickled with a straw."

LAND AND LABOR.

The land and its products are the material sources of all wealth. Labor is the means by which they are utilized. A financial policy which continuously diminishes the market values of land and its products and increases the value of money must necessarily make the rich richer and the poor poorer. Such a policy must decrease the compensation of labor just as it diminishes its fruits. It must add to the burdens of all debtors and all taxpayers, as debts and taxes are fixed charges, and thus the masses are compelled to discharge continuously increasing burdens with continuously decreasing resources. They must therefore have losses left wherewithal to employ labor and support their families, and, in short, they are all on the road to ruin.

OUR SO-CALLED SOUND-MONEY MEN ARE FOR CONTRACTION.

The so-called, self-styled, sound-money men have been quite verbose in telling us what they are against, but very reticent and slow to reveal as to what they are for. In point of fact they are not only against the free coinage of silver, but are for retiring the three hundred and forty-six millions of greenbacks and the one hundred and thirty-six millions of coin certificates issued under the Sherman Act of 1890, all of which is legal-tender money. As a rule they also propose the continuation of the 10 per cent destroying tax on all State banks. Many believe that they will soon declare against our existing volume of silver money and attempt to reduce it to a mere token money, to be made legal tender only in small sums.

SPECIFIC DECLARATIONS OF DEMOCRATIC DOCTRINES.

I will be specific in stating not only what I am against, but what I am for. I am against gold monometallism, as Democracy has always been, and regard it as Mr. Carlisle did when he was a Representative of the people, "as great a curse as war, pestilence, or famine"—a proposition which since then he has well-nigh demonstrated. I am against withdrawing the five hundred millions of greenbacks and Sherman legal-tender notes, because that would involve a contraction of about one-third of all American money, to reducing the prices of land and commodities and wages at least 30 per cent more than they are now, would increase the burdens of debt and taxation, and would ultimately produce a panic, involving land owners, laborers, merchants, manufacturers, and agriculturists in widespread ruin. I am against the increase of the public debt by borrowing gold to discharge greenbacks and Treasury notes which are payable in silver as well as gold.

No government can have any higher ideal before its mind than the conception of what an honest, just, and intelligent citizen would do. There is not an honest, just, and intelligent citizen in the United States to-day who owes silver or gold and who would tolerate for one moment the demand of his creditor that he might designate the coin which he should exercise the privilege to pay.

I am against attempting to build up again the national banks by providing a public debt in order to accommodate them. In short, I am against the contraction of the currency of the people in any way, shape, or form.

I am for:

1. The free coinage of gold as it now exists.

2. I am for the free coinage of standard silver dollars just the same as we have issued from our mint from 1792 to 1895, and such as were freely coined from 1792 to 1873.

3. I am for retaining in circulation all existing greenback legal-tender paper money of the United States.

4. I am for repealing the Federal tax of 10 per cent on State banks—a war measure—a measure against which Democracy with one voice proclaimed, a measure which destroys and dries up the local energies of the people and helps to destroy self-help, the great help of all self-respecting and self-achieving nations.

In short, I am for a liberal supply of money to meet the wants of the most energetic, progressive, and inventive people that ever lived.

IN FAVOR OF INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT; BUT OPPOSED TO WAITING FOR IT.

Mr. President, I am also in favor of an international agreement between the great nations of the earth regulating the power of exchange between their gold and silver coins and providing for the free coinage of both metals; but I am not in favor of waiting to put out the conflagration of ruin in my own country until Queen Victoria sends us a British hose company to help to do it. When gentlemen declare the benefit of an international agreement they acknowledge how great an advantage it would be to the world to get silver money restored. But with what face can we insist that other nations whose interest is against it shall lead in the matter when the great supply-producing nation of the world, which has more to gain by it than any other, sits supinely and proclaims and advertises its helplessness to a waiting world?

The leading nation of the world, the greatest Republic that ever existed in the world, could not place itself in a more subservient attitude than by waiting hat in hand at European courts to get permission to establish a financial system to suit itself. In vain was the sword of independence drawn in 1776 if we have not acquired the purse of independence in 1896.

The first charter issued to American colonists from Great Britain—the charter of King James—to the Virginia settlers authorized them to establish a mint and coin their own money. As early as 1645 the little Virginia colony made the Spanish dollar its standard of value, and for this great nation, now in the ascendency of its power, to turn its face to the Old World and fling up its hands and say, "You have closed our mints and we can not open them any more until you give us the 'open sesame,'" is a proclamation to mankind of weakness and inanity that is absolutely appalling. And yet, Mr. President, these older nations in their commercial and in their industrial interests are feeling the necessity of the restoration of bimetallism, and they would quickly restore it if it were not for the domination of the old classes of plutocracy who are still in power.

On March 17 of the present year, just some two months ago, the following resolution was carried through the House of Commons of Great Britain with cheers:

Resolved, That this House is of opinion that the instability of the relative value of gold and silver since the action of the Latin Union in 1873 has proved injurious to the best interests of this country, and urges upon the Government the advisability of doing all in their power to secure by international agreement stable monetary par of exchange between gold and silver.

There are gentlemen of the school of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] who reproached us yesterday that we had done nothing. We have done all that we could. We passed a free-coinage bill through the Senate. We passed a seigniorage bill, which was vetoed. We elected delegates to an international conference. Now, in turn, when he and his school of thinkers and actors, say they are in favor of international agreement, I ask what have you done in order to bring it about or to accept the invitation of those who are calling to you?

WE ARE ABLE TO ACT FOR OURSELVES.

Mr. President, we are the wealthiest nation, as the Senator himself said yesterday, that ever existed on the face of the earth, and the strongest, too—for wealth, while already corroding us, has not as yet sapped the vitality and manliness of our people. It is stated by the ablest statists of Europe that there is nothing in human history to compare in this respect to the United States at the present time. While a great and devastating war raged upon our soil for four years, the working power of America has increased threefold since 1860, when we stood upon its eve. We have as much energy as Great Britain, Germany, and France collectively.

Why shall we stand back and acknowledge their precedence in the courts of the universe and say, hat in hand, "After you, master?"

Ninety per cent of our population can read and write. And that is one reason, Mr. President, why the numbers are daily increasing who are for the restoration of our constitutional money. We spend three times as much annually for schools as Great Britain and more than double as much as Great Britain, France, Germany, Austria, and Italy.

And yet, Mr. President, this enlightened nation, with its torches of enlightenment burning on every side, and with great tracts of country rising up almost solidly to restore their constitutional money, can find no greater support from the minds of those who differ from them, like the Senator from Kentucky, than a sneer of the lip and to be told that they are all crazy and should be in lunatic asylums.

Our annual accumulation of wealth is doubly what it is in Great Britain per capita. In area we are as large as Europe, and exclusive of Alaska as great as that of Great Britain and Ireland, Switzerland, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, Belgium, France, Spain, Portugal, Greece, Italy, and European Turkey, Palestine, Japan, and China proper. We are more independent of all other nations of the earth than any other people that ever existed, being able to produce more within ourselves than any other nation. Our 45 great Commonwealths form a world within themselves, and the American Congress, as their delegated representative body could, with a single vote, put the world at America's feet, and assert a commercial supremacy that would endure for ages, by boldly refusing to accept European dictation, and enacting by law an independent financial system of its own.

EUROPE'S PRIMARY INTERESTS AND OURS ARE DIFFERENT.

But we are told to wait and wait for an international agreement. Why, sir, we have been waiting for it for a quarter of a century. We are told that America could not act independently, and that we must postpone the restoration of silver until the others lead. I reply (1) that it is senseless to make a proposition for the management of our domestic concerns which must be unconditionally dependent for its sanction on the action of any others whatsoever. I reply (2) that Europe has several primary interests just as she had in the days of James Monroe, and that they are against international agreement, which pertains peculiarly to it and its institutions and its conditions. I reply (3) that Great Britain, Germany, Holland, and other nations are creditor nations and have a direct interest to oppose the liberalizing of the money systems of the world and the cheapening of what they derive from bond clipping. To make our nation dependent upon other nations would be as foolish as for an army to submit its plans to the dictation of a hostile general. (4) The prevailing systems of government in Europe are also different from ours. Great Britain with her Queen of Great Britain and Ireland and Empress of India, Germany with her imperial war Emperor, Russia with her Czar, Austria with her Emperor, and Italy with her King—all these nations are monarchies; their legislation is for the benefit of oligarchies and classes, and was pretended and claimed to be of divine right; the people do not exist for them in the sense that the American people exist for themselves; standing armies stand around the throne ready to suppress popular ebullition or popular advancement; the divine right of kings permits some liberties to flow down to the masses from the imperial reservoir in the crown, but the people are not sovereign, as they are here.

Mr. President, America can rescue herself from this difficulty the very moment she makes up her mind that it shall be done. The enunciation of her decree will make the world bow to her power and to the sovereignty of her will.

When the warning finger of this great nation was uplifted and Great Britain was told that she should not rob Venezuela after the manner that she is now plundering in Egypt and South Africa, the money changers trembled lest there might be war and coupon clipping be transiently suspended. There was no danger of war; for Great Britain is gathering more wealth from the United States than she can gather from the gold mines of South Africa or from the alluvial lands in the Valley of the Nile.

If she had dared to dictate to her colonies in the manner that she has dictated to us, they would have arisen in rebellion without waiting for a stamp act or an embargo against the port of Boston. If we choose to submit to the grinding policy of gold, let us do so; but, in the name of sense, in the name of justice, in the name of the pride and honor of our country, let us not submit on the lame and pusillanimous ground that we are not able to act for ourselves without consent by international agreement of the Old World's kings. If the text of monometallism—that we can not act for ourselves—be true, then let me say:

We have thews and sinews like our ancestors,
But wo! the while, our fathers' hearts are dead.

FORKS OF THE ROAD—SILVER OR CONTRACTION AND DEBT THE ALTERNATIVES.

Mr. President, I have thus reviewed the present situation and stated my own position. It is conceded on all hands to be deplorable, and all parties and all persons denounce it and cry out against it, and say, "We must change it! We must change it!" But how? There are two general schemes of alteration, Mr. President. The first is to restore bimetallism as it existed before 1873; the second is to move on the policy of contraction. Let everybody understand that we are at the forks of the road, and whether we move in one direction or another we move down a long lane. The contraction policy, which presents one alternative, means this:

To pay off in gold and retire the greenbacks, amounting to	$346,681,016
To pay off in gold and retire the Sherman certificates of 1890, amounting to	136,719,280
To pay off in gold and retire the silver certificates issued under the Bland-Allison Act of 1878, amounting to	344,377,504
In all	827,779,800

Or more than one-half of all our currency. In order to effect this result we would have to issue over eight hundred millions of gold bonds.

Mr. President, I can appreciate the anxiety of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] to have Congress allow the issue of any gold bonds, for if ever that were done to the extent of even a small sum it would be a declaration that Congress had put itself and the country deliberately upon the gold standard, and the rest would follow. We must turn that vast sum into a public interest-bearing burden—this vast sum of money that is now serving us as currency. Such a contraction of the currency and such a stupendous debt are terrifying to contemplate. But these are the two plans before us. We must take one or the other. We must build up and restore or we must pull down and destroy. Let not the people deceive themselves and imagine a vain thing, and let us not be parties to their deception.

OUR CURRENCIES.

We have now, Mr. President, nine different kinds of currency. Here is a statement of it from the Treasury, and here is a statement of the credit currency, showing how much of it is payable in gold, in silver, and in coin:

Statement showing the amounts of gold and silver coins and certificates, United States notes, and national-bank notes in circulation March 1, 1896.

	General stock coined or issued.	In Treasury.	Amount in circulation March 1, 1896.	Amount in circulation March 1, 1895.
Gold coin	$586,168,106	$140,874,515	$445,293,591	$468,568,100
Standard silver dollars	424,780,629	369,273,688	55,515,941	54,649,360
Subsidiary silver	78,564,547	14,820,486	63,744,061	60,940,597
Gold certificates	44,384,489	651,470	43,733,019	51,507,769
Silver certificates	344,377,504	11,831,561	332,545,943	325,816,415
Treasury notes, act of July 14, 1890	136,719,280	30,644,730	106,074,550	114,249,700
United States notes	346,681,016	106,222,443	240,458,573	261,988,258
Currency certificates, act of June 8, 1872	33,070,000	245,000	32,825,000	36,925,000
National-bank notes	217,181,917	8,630,538	208,551,379	199,889,356
Total	2,211,936,488	683,194,431	1,528,742,057	1,574,534,557

Thus it will be seen that we have—

1. Gold coin, $586,168,106, which is limited legal tender for all debts and taxes, which is freely coined at the mint into $20, $10, $5, and $2.50 pieces, which is, under certain conditions, exchangeable for gold certificates. It will be observed that no gold dollar pieces are minted.

2. The 424,780,629 standard silver dollars are legal tender for all dues and all debts except when otherwise stipulated in the contract.

3. The silver certificates issued under the Bland-Allison Act of February 28, 1878, and the act of August 4, 1886, represent silver dollars deposited in the Treasury to meet them, and are in denominations of $1, $2, $5, $10, $20, $50, $100, $500, and $1,000. These silver certificates are receivable for customs taxes and all public dues.

4. The gold certificates are issued to represent gold coin in the Treasury.

5. The United States notes, or greenbacks, first issued under the act of February 25, 1862, are legal tender for all debts and taxes under the law of their issue.

6. The Treasury notes of 1890, or the Sherman notes, as they are sometimes called, are issued under the act of July 14, 1890, for the purchase of silver bullion at the rate of 4,500,000 ounces per month. They are legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stated in the contract, and are receivable for all customs taxes and all public dues, and may be counted as part of the national-bank reserve. They are payable in coin, and it is provided in the act of their issue that the Secretary of the Treasury shall, under such regulations as he may prescribe, redeem such notes, in gold or silver coin at his discretion, it being the established policy of the United States to maintain the two metals on a par with each other on the present legal ratio or such other ratio as may be provided by law; and also provided that he shall each month coin 2,000,000 ounces of the silver bullion purchased under the operations of this act into standard silver dollars until the 1st day of July, 1891, and after that time he shall coin of the silver bullion purchased under this act as much as necessary to provide for the redemption of the Treasury notes herein provided for, and any gain or seigniorage arising from such coinage shall be accounted for and paid into the Treasury.

7. Subsidiary silver, $78,564,547, are the 50-cent, 25-cent, and 10-cent pieces, issued under the acts of 1853 and 1879. They are only nine-tenths fine, as compared to our standard silver dollars, and they are legal tender in sums not exceeding $10, and are redeemable in lawful money at the Treasury or subtreasury in sums of $20 or any multiples thereof.

8. The currency certificates are issued under the act of June 8, 1872. They are not issued in denominations of less than $5,000, and are payable on demand in greenback notes, and are used by banks for the sake of convenience, and are not in general circulation.

9. The national-bank notes are secured by United States bonds, and may be equal in amount to 90 per cent of the current market value of the bonds not exceeding par. They are not legal tender, but are receivable for public dues, except duties on imports.

It will be observed that no redemption is provided for the standard silver dollars and that the greenbacks or Sherman notes are payable in coin, silver certificates payable only in silver dollars, and that the gold certificates constitute our only currency which is payable at the Treasury Department in gold. This forty-four million of gold certificates are not a source of any embarrassment to the Treasury, as there is a gold dollar representing them all in the Treasury to pay them. The silver certificates are no source of embarrassment to the Treasury because there is a silver dollar to represent every dollar of them.

WHY IS THE TREASURY EMBARRASSED?

The $346,681,016 of greenbacks and the $136,719,280 of Sherman notes make a total of $483,400,296, and are payable in coin. The greenbacks were issued at a time when there was free coinage of silver. The Sherman notes were issued at a time when we were making standard silver money at the rate of about five millions per month; and to pay either kind of these notes in coin it is only necessary to have silver money in the Treasury wherewithal to do it. The act for the resumption of specie payment was passed on the 14th of January, 1875. It was provided therein that on and after the 1st day of January, 1879, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem in coin the United States legal-tender notes then outstanding, on their presentation for redemption at the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States in the city of New York, in sums of not less than $50. And to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and provide for the redemption in this act authorized and required, he is authorized to use any surplus revenue from time to time in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to issue, sell, and dispose of at not less than par any coin, either of the description of bonds of the United States in the act of Congress, approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt, with like qualities, privileges, and exemptions to the extent necessary to carry this act into effect, and to use the proceeds thereof for the purpose aforesaid."

WE RESUMED SPECIE PAYMENT NOT GOLD PAYMENT BY LAW.

Before the day of specie resumption came, and while the resumption act was inchoate, on the 28th day of February, 1878, there was passed the Bland-Allison Act, as it is commonly called, entitled "An act to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar and to restore its legal-tender character." It is provided therein that the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to purchase from time to time silver bullion at the market price thereof, not less than $2,000,000 worth per month nor more than $4,000,000 worth per month, and cause the same to be coined monthly, as fast as so purchased, into such dollars.

The whole tenor of this series of acts; the expression of coin in the greenback law; the expression of coin in the act providing for the resumption of specie payments; the provision for the utterance of at least two million standard silver dollars per month, and the authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to use any surplus revenue for the purpose of redeeming legal-tender notes—mind you, Mr. President, not gold but any surplus revenue of any kind—all show that Congress had not the slightest notion or conception of gold resumption, but only of specie resumption, and no gold bonds were authorized, but only coin bonds.

THE PRESIDENT SHOWS WE HAVE NO GOLD OBLIGATIONS BUT GOLD CERTIFICATES.

The President, in his message to Congress last December, shows that he evidently and clearly understood the law, for he urged Congress to authorize gold bonds, claiming that they would be a great saving to the Government, as they could be sold at a higher price; and a member of his Cabinet now contends in a public letter that had they been gold bonds the Government would have been saved $16,000,000.

The President had just as much authority to issue gold bonds as he had to issue any kind of bonds when there was silver coin in the Treasury as part of the surplus revenue wherewithal to pay outstanding coin obligations. And as he knows and declares by his messages that there is no law for the issue of gold bonds, so it should be equally plain to him that there is no law for providing gold to pay bonds as long as there is coin in the Treasury.

MALADMINISTRATION OF THE TREASURY.

The embarrassment of the Government arises from the arbitrary and obdurate assumptions of successive Administrations, which have made an artificial endless chain by which the Treasury may be raided for gold at the option of any creditor. If all the creditors of the Government, its salaried officers, its employees, its claimants, and its contractors were to act like its bondholders and money holders, and demand gold, and were the Treasury to manifest the same weakness toward them in recognizing their claims that it does toward bondholders, the Government might be overwhelmed at any day by gold demands, when in point of fact it had an abundance of surplus revenue and silver coin wherewithal to meet justly all its obligations. Let the people understand, then, that the apparent trouble in the Treasury is an artificial one, invented by the Treasury itself. If we are a "foolish purveyor" of gold for European monarchs, if we have filled the strong boxes of every autocrat who is hoarding gold as a war fund, it is simply because the Treasury has voluntarily persisted in doing so when it could have stopped it in a moment. It is a folly that the Secretary could have stopped at any moment by the scratch of his pen; it is a folly that is persisted in because Congress sits helpless and allows it to continue; it is a folly because with all the strong talk we have here we have also weakness of will and weakness of action and suppliance of disposition.

THE WAR ON PROPERTY AND VESTED RIGHTS.

Mr. President, I am by nature, by experience, and education a conservative. I am for property and vested rights. I believe in the virtues of a people who are characterized by moderation. I am against radicalism that would pull down and destroy; and the place for every conservative who would maintain the institutions of America and preserve the property of its people is in the ranks of the true bimetallists. The rights which attach to life, liberty, and property are those upon which all social order must rest. To protect them, government was founded, and that government is freest in which they are best protected and the most amply and securely enjoyed. Life and liberty can not be safely secured or freely enjoyed unless property is respected.

"You take my life when you do take the means whereby I live" is a plain proposition. That every man's house is his castle is an axiom of our free race, and it has always been ready to draw the sword and meet tyranny at the threshold. There are various methods of warring upon property. The robber band may go with a high hand and expel the tenant, but time has long since passed when this could be done in any land where the English-speaking race is in power. It was a splendid illustration of the genius of the Germanic race, from which we are in part descended, when there was a peasant in Berlin who had a little cottage that the king wished to possess in order to make a part of his park. The peasant refused the royal request, and declined all the gold that was offered him, and, when he was threatened, he sat securely at his door, and said: "There are laws, Your Majesty, in Berlin."

CONTRACTION OF THE CURRENCY MEANS CONFISCATION.

It is by the subtle agencies of taxation and currency that the modern wars against property are conducted, and the contraction of the currency is the most subtle and certain method of confiscating property that the wit of man has ever yet invented. To contract the currency of a country is to reduce the value of property, to increase the burden of debt and taxation, to destroy confidence. "Confidence," "Confidence," say the soothsayers of monometallism; but there is no confidence. How can confidence exist when there is a condition of organized depreciation of all property upon which confidence rests? The policy of contraction is to check enterprise; it is to stagnate circulation; it is to paralyze trade and manufactures and agriculture; it is to reduce wages; it is to organize failure, bankruptcy, and ruin; and at the end of the process it is inevitable that the rich shall be richer, the poor poorer, and society at the mercy of its money kings.

HOW CONTRACTION OF THE CURRENCY WORKS.

This consequence of the contraction of the currency results from economic laws which are as fixed and certain in their operation as the precession of the equinoxes or the law of gravitation. The whole value of the property of a country is measured by the whole sum of the currency which may be used in its purchase and exchange, and the particles of property bear the same ratio to the particles of the currency which express their price or valuation as the mass of property bears to the whole mass of currency. It results from this principle that as the mass of currency is diminished in amount the mass of property diminishes proportionately in value as expressed in money. It follows that a very small diminution of the volume of the currency produces a very large diminution in the monetary value of property. Thus, if we were to destroy all money, it is evident that we would destroy the monetary value of all property, for there would be no money into which any part of it might be converted and exchanged. No price could be fixed, because no price could be paid. So, if we were to destroy half of the money, half of the monetary value of the property would be destroyed likewise, as the demand for the money would remain as great, with only half of the supply to meet it. So, if we were to destroy 10 per cent of the money, 10 per cent of the monetary value of property would pass away with it. Now, the value of all the property of the country is many times greater than the aggregate value of all its money, and the reduction of property value in money is just so many times greater than the amount of the reduction of the money in which the assessment or valuation is made.

HOW CONTRACTION OF CURRENCY INCREASES THE BURDEN OF DEBT AND TAXATION.

With diminishing currency and diminishing values of property, it is quite evident that the burden of debt and taxation is increased. The debt remains a fixed figure. There is a less supply of money from which the fund must be derived to pay it; there is a less aggregate value of property from which the fixed debt must be liquidated. The creditor's demand draws with the same power, and, indeed, with increasing power, since interest accumulates day by day, while the supply of funds on which the demand is made diminishes, and the supply of property from which the funds must be extracted also diminishes. Hence, a larger proportion of the debtor's property must now be taken to pay the debt. Just so with taxation. Public expenses, such as fixed salaries, contracts to supply armies and build navies, to conduct schools, and construct roads and make other improvements, and interest on public obligations, all these items in the continuous budgets remain at a stationary figure, and the funds to meet them must be derived from declining values of land, of personalty, and of business. The assessments made for taxation before the contraction of the currency took place remain, while the subjects of taxation are shrinking in value. The taxpayer must now pay a sum which no longer represents the value on which it was based. The burden is increased, the power to bear it is lessened. As soon as the reassessment comes the diminished value of property is such that taxes must be increased in order to discharge the fixed obligations.

HOW CONTRACTION OF THE CURRENCY IMPAIRS CREDIT.

Credit must necessarily be impaired under these circumstances. We may say of it, as has been said of interest, that interest follows the debt as the shadow the substance, and credit follows property and ability to accomplish as the shadow the substance. He who has trusted another to pay money must place reliance upon the other's property to make good his realization. That reliance is simply the creditor's faith that the means will be forthcoming to meet the outstanding obligation. This faith must weaken as the creditor sees the property declining in value. The trust and the security for its performance are parted. The creditor makes haste to collect lest he lose. Other creditors in simular cases do likewise. Debtors with depreciating properties are pressed, their holdings are thrown upon the market, and the weakened conditions are stimulated and precipitated by the steps taken to forestall and prevent loss.

HOW CONTRACTION OF THE CURRENCY STAGNATES IT.

With a weakened credit all enterprise must feel the checkrein of hesitation, doubt, and distrust. The circulating medium now secretes and hoards and hides itself in banks and safes and stockings. He who has money fears either to loan it upon or invest it in property which is declining in value. Self-interest stays his hand, and he refuses to buy, for he says to himself: "To-morrow I can buy cheaper." Banks of undoubted solvency find funds accumulating in their vaults and staying there, because money is constantly increasing in purchasing power, just in proportion as property is losing in selling power. The unjust steward who hoards his talent in a napkin becomes the only prudent financier, for if he loans or buys he may lose, while in the napkin the talent is growing daily in its power to command whatever property the owner desires. Seeing money heaped up in banks, the superficial observer cries out: "Money is plentiful; see how much of it is piled up here!" He forgets that it is stagnated, piled up, and heaped together for the very reason that there is no temptation to invest it or circulate it in loans upon declining values; he forgets that if there were more of it values would rise and not decline, and it would then pour out in volume, tempted to turn itself into property in order to get the benefit of rising prices: he forgets that if there was more of it it would be fulfilling the mission which its very name, "circulating medium," implies it was destined to perform. It would be circulating from the owner to the farmer and the landowner, and from them to the laborer and to the merchant, from them to the manufacturer, from the manufacturer to the lumberman, the miner, the quarryman, the mechanic, and from them again and again to all the sons of toil, in office and countingroom, and field and workshop, round and round, in the healthy activities of all the children of men.

HOW CONTRACTION OF THE CURRENCY INJURES THE MERCHANT.

The falling prices that follow every contraction and stagnation of the currency cramp and paralyze commerce, manufacture, and agriculture. The merchant buys or rents a storehouse, hires a coterie of clerks and helpers, buys a stock of goods for cash, or more generally on credit, advertises it for sale, sends out his commercial travelers, and is ready for business. Then comes contraction of the currency. His taxes remain at a fixed figure, the charges for rent, for gas, and for water remain at a fixed figure. So his advertising expenses, his laborers and the wages he pays; so his outstanding notes and obligations; but the goods fall in value. Every merchant's goods fall in price also. There is a letdown in the very base of his operations. Profits vanish; all hope of them vanish. To get out even is now his forlorn hope. Another merchant sells his goods out at auction at sacrificial prices. The bank or the wholesale dealer who has trusted him presses for the payment of all notes given. The merchant's goods must go upon the falling market. Buckle and tongue will not meet. The merchant fails.

HOW CONTRACTION INJURES THE MANUFACTURER.

The manufacturer depends upon the merchant. What use to make goods if a merchant can not buy at a profit to the maker? What use for the merchant to buy if he can not sell at a profit to himself? The contagion of the paralysis passes from the merchant to the manufacturer. He reduces wages; he cuts close and pays lesser prices for his raw material. But as the contraction of the currency continues prices of all products go lower and lower; the prices paid for this year will leave no margin of profit for the next year. The manufacturer gets desperate; his factory closes; his machinery rusts; his plant decays; his enterprise fails.

HOW CONTRACTION INJURES THE WAGE EARNER.

Meanwhile wages decline. The demand for labor decreases as enterprise decreases, and wages decrease as demand for labor decreases. The laborers can not be paid at the old rates when property declines; idle laborers can get no work, or must take any job they can get at any price that will hold soul and body together. The mechanic's wife stares starvation in the face; his children can not keep up decent appearance in the public schools, or find work for their fingers. There are strikes and lockouts; then come the tramp of soldiery and menacing steel. The capitalist, if he is oblivious of this, sits back in his easy chair and says: "We must have a big army and a strong Government"; the days of Jeffersonian Democracy have gone by, and Macaulay's letter to Randall was a true foreshadowing of our future; the old idea that a President should never fill the chair but twice belongs to a time of inexperience and adolescence. Suicides increase, burglaries increase, failures increase. Money now buys more than it ever would before; the usurer thrives; the demagogue stands out before the poor man, and with subtle flattery for his vanity tells him that he wants the poor man to have as good a dollar as the rich man, and the best money in the world. The poor man meantime, who has few dollars of any kind and little or no work of any kind, looks up with a dubious scowl upon his face and marvels much at this expression of disinterested benevolence. But money is getting dearer and dearer; it buys more and more; and the self-complacent capitalist, who is getting richer and richer on other men's ruin, declares that times are prosperous, and that the discontent is all due to the agitation of the silver question!

HOW CONTRACTION PRODUCES WANT OF CONFIDENCE.

Want of confidence is now loudly proclaimed to be the cause of the disturbances by the superficial observers who witness the panorama before them, and who can see plainly that want of confidence is an attendant circumstance. They have mistaken an effect for a cause. "Restore confidence" is at once the panacea prescribed as a sure cure for the evil. The unthinking and the crafty are alike fond of this vague phrase—for it conceals the lack of ideas of the one class, and the subtle designs of the other class. Want of confidence has existed with all the monetary panics that ever visited the earth. "To restore confidence" has been the desire of every person who ever prescribed for the infirmities of society. But want of confidence is always an effect before it becomes a cause; and the want of confidence that comes after every contraction of the currency is always the effect of the declining values produced by that contraction, and it can never be cured while the cause is operative. To restore confidence without removing the cause is impossible; and he who clamors for confidence while contraction is undermining the property on which it is based might as well cry out against buildings falling down when the foundations are crumbling beneath them.

HOW CONTRACTION RUINS THE FARMER.

What has become of the farmer in this process of stagnation and contraction? He is at the bottom of the list. He comes last. He does more for the Government and receives less from the Government than any other portion of its constituents. Feeding the world, he is driven by the world to the point of starvation. It is he who furnishes the bounteous crops, but not he who enjoys the benefit thereof. In 1872 his land produced $12 worth per acre—now but half that sum. This is largely the fruit of contraction. He works as hard as those who work hardest to get their daily bread; but he is not classed among the laboring men and wage earners who share the benefits of the protective policies of taxation. He must be a business man of knowledge, alertness, and application of method and sagacity; but he is not classed as a business man by the dealers of the exchange. The Republican party aroused the indignation of the people in 1890, when it summoned the manufacturers to Washington and allowed them to fix the taxes that the masses had to pay, and from which they derived the benefit. And now our monometic leaders go to New York and call upon the money-changers to arrange the money system without even mentioning the farmer as one who may be properly consulted. But the land and its products are the material resources of all wealth. They have ever been, and they must ever be. And to-day, with the manipulators of their products and the manipulators of the exchanges arranging schedules of taxation and establishing money systems for themselves, those who produce the basis of all their wealth are mere political castaways in the councils of the politicians who govern them.

Mr. President, at this stage I will yield at the suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH].

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] if he will allow the pending bill to be laid aside temporarily to take up a House bill which will lead to no discussion?

Mr. BUTLER. Before that, Mr. President, I wish to ask unanimous consent that an hour shall be fixed when the vote shall be taken on the pending bill, and I suggest, if it meets the approval of the Senate, that the final vote be taken upon the bill and all amendments of which notice has been given to-morrow evening at 5 o'clock.

Mr. HILL. Let me ask the Senator a question. Does the Senator know how many Senators desire to speak upon this subject?

Mr. BUTLER. I know how many have given notice to the Chair of their intention to speak.

Mr. HILL. How many are those?

Mr. BUTLER. I think there are four on the list.

Mr. HILL. There may be others who desire to speak.

Mr. BUTLER. I would ask the Chair how many have given notice of their intention to speak?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Three Senators have given notice of their intention to speak on the pending bill.

Mr. HILL. There are likely to be others.

Mr. BUTLER. Then, in order that everybody may have time, I will change the request, and ask that the final vote on this bill be taken at 5 o'clock on Friday evening. That will give one more day.

Mr. CHANDLER. I would not object to fixing the time of voting on this bill at the close of the recess of Congress, say, on the first Monday of December next. Congress will then be in session; and I am anxious that the act which the Senator proposes to repeal should remain on the statute books during the summer. So I object to any other time than the first Monday in December next. I will agree cheerfully, Mr. President, to that time.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to inquire of the Senator from New Hampshire if he is perfectly certain that the next bond issue can be negotiated before that time, so that his friends will all be safe from the operation of this bill?

Mr. BUTLER. I do not think the Senator from New Hampshire is serious in his suggestion, and therefore I make one more offer. I do not desire to cut off discussion, but certainly, unless there is a desire to kill the bill by talking it to death, nobody can object to the proposition which I now make.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator will allow me to say——

Mr. BUTLER. Let me get through with this statement.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator will allow me to remark——

Mr. BUTLER. No; I do not yield.

Mr. CHANDLER. Go ahead, then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina declines to yield.

Mr. BUTLER. The request I now make is that the Senate shall agree to take a final vote upon this bill and all amendments thereto next Monday evening at 5 o'clock. That is one week from the time we first asked for a unanimous-consent agreement that a vote should be taken. That certainly gives plenty of time.

Mr. PLATT. The experience of the Senate has been such that I shall object to any agreement fixing a time for a final vote upon any bill unless it be understood that all parliamentary motions in reference to the bill are in order at the time agreed upon.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is all right.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

Mr. BUTLER (at 5 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.). I still hold the floor, I believe. I move that at 6 o'clock the Senate take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock and 55 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HILL. With the consent of the Senator——

Mr. STEWART. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. TELLER. It is too late.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll; and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Chilton,	Martin,	Sewell,
Allen,	Cockrell,	Mitchell, Oreg.	Shoup,
Allison,	Cullom,	Morgan,	Squire,
Bacon,	Dubois,	Nelson,	Stewart,
Bate,	Elkins,	Pasco,	Teller,
Berry,	Gallinger,	Peffer,	Tillman,
Brown,	Gear,	Perkins,	Turpie,
Burrows,	Gibson,	Pettigrew,	Vest,
Butler,	Gorman,	Platt,	Warren.
Cannon,	Hale,	Proctor,
Carter,	Harris,	Pugh,
Chandler,	Hawley,	Roach,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. 710) granting a pension to Ada J. Schwatka, widow of the late Lieut. Frederick Schwatka;

A bill (S. 1659) to amend the laws of the District of Columbia as to married women, to make parents the natural guardians of their minor children, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 2221) for the relief of settlers on the Northern Pacific Railroad indemnity lands;

A bill (S. 2499) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Washington and Great Falls Electric Railway Company;

A bill (H. R. 1436) relating to commutations of homestead entries, and to confirm such entries when commutation proofs were received by local land officers prematurely;

A bill (H. R. 1734) to increase the pension of Ann Catherine Hull;

A bill (H. R. 5675) authorizing the construction of a wagon and motor bridge over the Missouri River at St. Charles, Mo.; and

A bill (H. R. 6248) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes.

ALCOHOL IN THE ARTS.

The bill (H. R. 3282) to repeal section 61 of an act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, which became a law August 28, 1894, was read twice by its title.

Mr. ALDRICH. This bill has the unanimous approval of the Finance Committee of the Senate, and in its present form I think it is satisfactory to everybody in the Senate. It will lead to no discussion.

Mr. STEWART. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Is my motion pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SEWELL in the chair). The motion of the Senator from North Carolina is pending.

Mr. ALDRICH. Do I understand the Senator from Nevada to object to the bill if it will not lead to any discussion? I do not ask to displace the unfinished business.

Mr. STEWART. The motion for a recess is pending.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am willing that a vote shall be taken upon that motion.

Mr. STEWART. I want the motion for a recess agreed to first.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no objection to that.

Mr. STEWART. We do not know about the other matter.

PROPOSED RECESS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. HILL. What is the distinct motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That the Senate take a recess from 6 o'clock this evening until 11.55 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. HILL. On that question I desire to say a word. A motion that at a certain hour we take a recess is debatable.

I simply desire to say that I can not let the remarks of the Senator from North Carolina go unchallenged. Scarcely had the bill been moved when the Senator from North Carolina began to make the statement that the bill was to be opposed by dilatory tactics. I have already explained the reasons why, on the evening when it was proposed to take up the bill, I opposed its consideration at that time. I shall not renew that portion of the discussion. On the next day, without any dilatory tactics of any sort, a vote was permitted to be taken and was taken to proceed with the bill. It was carried. I immediately proceeded to discuss the bill. I gave way to interruptions, and the interruptions from the friends of the bill took nearly half my time. I freely allowed several Senators to make speeches in favor of the bill during my time. That was followed by a speech in favor of the bill, and the next day was Saturday last. Friday evening a suggestion was made that we should take a vote on Monday at 5 o'clock, to which I did not object, but an objection came from one of the friends of the bill. The bill went over to Saturday. On Saturday the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] took the whole afternoon in favor of the bill, and not an opponent of the bill had an opportunity to say a word.

Then this week came on. We have had tariff speeches, and properly so, because the tariff is mixed up with this question. We have listened for the last two hours to a very eloquent and able speech in favor of the bill, or rather in favor of free silver, by the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], to whom we are all delighted to listen. Three or four Senators have given notice that they desire to speak on the bill. I do not know how long they are going to speak. They have just as much right to take an afternoon as had the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN]. They have just as much right to speak one, two, or three hours.

To-morrow there will come in a very important conference report. How long will it take? Who knows? No one can tell. It is a privileged question. It is to be discussed. My attention has been called to a conference report which is going to lead to extensive debate. Now, to ask at such a time, when three or four Senators (some of whom are for the bill and some against it) have given notice that they desire to speak, to fix in advance an hour when the final vote shall be taken can not be done.

Mr. STEWART. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada will state his point of order.

Mr. STEWART. It is that debate is not in order pending a motion to take a recess.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is obliged——

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to speak to the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is obliged to hold that the point of order is well taken. The Chair decides that the motion is not debatable.

Mr. HILL. A motion to take a recess at a time in advance is debatable, with all due respect to the Chair.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to call attention to the point made by the Senator from New York, that while a motion to take a recess to a certain hour or day is not debatable, a motion that a recess shall be taken at a certain hour in the future would seem to be debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that the rules were changed at a late date in relation to recess. The rules provide that—

Motions relating to adjournment, to take a recess, to proceed to the consideration of executive business, to lay on the table, shall be decided without debate.

"Motions relating to adjournment, to take a recess."

Mr. CHANDLER. The only point, if the Chair please, is that this is a motion to take a recess at some time in the future. While the rule is to be construed strictly, possibly to exclude debate, a motion that at some time in the future a recess shall be taken to some other time must be debatable.

Mr. NELSON. I move that the Senate adjourn. That motion is in order.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, May 28, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nomination confirmed by the Senate May 19, 1896.

COMMISSIONER OF PENSIONS.

Dominic I. Murphy, of Philadelphia, Pa., to be Commissioner of Pensions.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate May 27, 1896.

FIRST DEPUTY COMMISSIONER OF PENSIONS.

Napoleon J. T. Dana, of Portsmouth, N. H., to be First Deputy Commissioner of Pensions.

SECRETARY OF LEGATION.

William Franklin Sands, of the District of Columbia, to be second secretary of the legation of the United States at Tokyo, Japan.

PROMOTIONS IN THE NAVY.

Lieut. Samuel C. Lemly, of the United States Navy, a citizen of the State of North Carolina, to be Judge-Advocate-General of the Navy.

P. A. Engineer Albert B. Willits, to be a chief engineer in the Navy.

Asst. Engineer William W. Bush, to be a passed assistant engineer.

Surg. William G. Farwell, to be a medical inspector.

P. A. Surg. James D. Gatewood, to be a surgeon.

Surg. John C. Wise, to be a medical inspector.

P. A. Surg. Oliver Diehl, to be a surgeon.

APPOINTMENTS IN THE NAVY.

William M. Wheeler, a citizen of New York, and Robert S. Blakeman, a citizen of Connecticut, to be assistant surgeons.

POSTMASTERS.

Bernard Monnich, to be postmaster at Hooper, in the county of Dodge and State of Nebraska.

W. S. Cornutt, to be postmaster at Culbertson, in the county of Hitchcock and State of Nebraska.

Adrian P. Jordan, to be postmaster at Leesburg, in the county of Lake and State of Florida.

John C. Neltnor, to be postmaster at West Chicago, in the county of Dupage and State of Illinois.

Mary A. Herrington, to be postmaster at Geneva, in the county of Kane and State of Illinois.

Edward H. Chase, to be postmaster at Dexter, in the county of Penobscot and State of Maine.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 27, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the Journal will be approved.

Mr. KEM. I object to the approval of the Journal, and raise the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the approval of the Journal.

The question was taken; and the Speaker decided that the motion had been adopted.

Mr. KEM. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KEM] makes the objection that there is no quorum present. [After counting the House.] A quorum being present, the point is overruled, and the Journal is approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6248) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7664) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, and had still further insisted upon its amendments numbered 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 12, 13, 15, 16, 17, 22, 23, 24, 25, 28, 32, 61, 91, 92, 93, 94, 96, 97, 109, 111, 112, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 140, 141, 146, 147, 161, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, asked a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ALLISON, Mr. HALE, and Mr. GORMAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 6256) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to furnish to George F. Fuller Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Manistique, Mich., a condemned cannon; and

A bill (H. R. 2777) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to donate condemned cannon and condemned cannon balls to certain posts of the Grand Army of the Republic.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7542) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, and had further insisted upon its amendments numbered 2, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 51, 52, and 53, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had asked a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. QUAY, and Mr. GORMAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring). That the President be requested to return to the House of Representatives the bill (H. R. 5731) to regulate the practice of medicine and surgery, to license physicians and surgeons, and to punish persons violating the provisions thereof in the District of Columbia.

RETURN OF BILL FROM THE PRESIDENT.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON, the following resolution was read, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to return to the House of Representatives the bill (H. R. 5731) entitled "An act to regulate the practice of surgery, to license physicians and surgeons, and to punish persons violating the provisions thereof in the District of Columbia."

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ENROLLMENT OF LEGISLATIVE BILL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following concurrent resolution, submitted by Mr. DOCKERY:

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States (the Senate concurring), That the enrolling clerk of the House, in enrolling the bill (H. R. 6248) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to insert in section 24, after the words "ninety-six," in said bill, the following: "except as in said sections otherwise specially provided."

Mr. DOCKERY. I move the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. DOCKERY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. There is a privileged report pending, submitted last evening by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

Mr. COLSON. Mr. Speaker, before that is taken up I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2568) authorizing the construction of a road from the Mill Springs National Cemetery, in Pulaski County, Ky., to the town of Somerset, in said county.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. KEM. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KEM].

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD INDEMNITY LANDS.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call up the privileged report which was under consideration when the House adjourned last evening.

I will be glad to have the attention of my colleague on the committee [Mr. MCRAE], the gentleman from Arkansas, who on last evening objected to the conference report. I think the gentleman has hardly made use of his usual care and accuracy in examining points of law in connection with these land matters as applicable especially to the pending bill. His argument was based on two errors of law.

In the first place, the original act of 1864 making the land grant to the Northern Pacific road gave rights to actual settlers both for preemption and for homestead purposes, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office held that that land was under a different rule from the public lands located outside of that grant, so far as homesteads were concerned. But in 1880 an act was passed placing the rights of homestead settlers generally on the same footing as those enjoyed by preemptors, and I call the attention of the House to section 3 of the act of March 14, 1880, which provides:

That any settlers who have settled or shall hereafter settle on any of the public lands of the United States, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, with the intention of claiming the same under the homestead laws, shall be allowed the same time to file his homestead application and protect his right of entry in the United States Land Office that is now allowed to settlers under the preemption laws to put their claims on record; and his rights shall relate back to the date of settlement the same as if he settled under the preemption laws.

My colleague has evidently overlooked this statute, and the Senate bill was drawn for the purpose of giving to the settlers who had taken possession before filing the same right accorded to them under this act of 1880.

Mr. MCRAE. The gentleman from Iowa is wrong in his construction of the act of 1880 and in his attempt to apply it to these settlers.

The gentleman should tell us, while on that point, what time was allowed under the preemption law for filing or entering——

Mr. LACEY. Three months.

Mr. MCRAE. Thirty days in one class and three months in the other.

Mr. LACEY (continuing). Three months; and, in addition, let me say to my colleague that it has been held by the Department that the three months simply gives an exclusive right for that period, and if for these three months the party still remains in possession and no filing has been made adverse his rights still remain. In short, his rights are good as against everybody in the world except somebody who files after the three months and before the settler has made his filing. So that this bill in the Senate was drawn to cover that class of cases. And that was one of the difficulties about the act of 1890 which was passed to relieve these settlers. It did not take care of this particular class of settlers. The Senate bill has this feature better than the House bill in that respect, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TOWNE] was entirely satisfied to accept this modification as prepared by the committee of conference, and which is taken in part at least from the Senate bill. Without that a number of these people would be cut out. This bill will grant relief to about 189 or 190 families who have not taken the benefits of the act of 1890.

Mr. Speaker, I think the bill as presented by the conference report protects the rights of all these settlers. It does not give rights to squatters, as my colleague on the committee [Mr. MCRAE] seems to think; for the bill in express terms says that to acquire rights under it a person must have settled with a view to taking under the homestead law. Squatters do not do that. So that the only persons covered by the provision to which the gentleman objects are persons who in good faith have entered upon the public lands within this particular territory adjacent to the Northern Pacific Railroad line with the purpose of taking under the homestead law, and who by a change of the ruling in the Interior Department were subsequently prevented from completing their filing.

Mr. TOWNE. And they must make that showing.

Mr. LACEY. And they must make that showing before they get the benefit of this act.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. MCRAE. I should like to say a word or two in reply to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LACEY. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. MCRAE. Only about three minutes.

Mr. LACEY. I withhold for the present the call for the previous question and yield three minutes to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, should undertake to make this House believe that this bill was framed and presented for the purpose of securing the rights which were reserved to settlers by the act making the grant to the Northern Pacific Railroad. The rights of all settlers on lands withdrawn for railroad purposes were protected, but even they were required to file proper notice within reasonable time. Why, sir, the very bill under consideration provides for relief to "those persons, their heirs, or legal representatives, who, between the dates of the 15th of August, A. D. 1887, and January 1, 1889, settled upon" land within the second indemnity belt of the Northern Pacific Railroad grant. It has no relation to the grant of 1864, nor to the settlers who may have been on lands prior to that act; and I hope the House will not be misled by any statement of that kind.

There is no pretense on the part of the friends of this bill that it would aid any settler who entered or made settlement prior to the Northern Pacific grant. By its very terms it is limited to settlements made between August 15, 1887, and January 1, 1889, upon land which has been since determined not to be subject to homestead.

The act of May 14, 1880, does not apply to settlements upon lands not subject to homestead entry. The point I insist upon is that this bill makes it possible to benefit those who never made filing or entry at all, and that we should not give such a preference over other citizens who want land.

Why are we told that these rights relate back to 1864, and also that the bill as now framed does not benefit squatters, when the mover of the bill has only asked relief for those who had "made filing or entry of the same" between said dates? I have said from the start, in committee and here, that every man who was induced to make a filing by any erroneous Department ruling should have his rights fully protected and his time and improvements allowed. I am informed that the object of the conference bill was to protect those who had made filing or entry, but had been denied the right to make final proof; and there was no pretense until yesterday that a settler who had never made a filing or entry was to be given the benefit of the bill. It was expressly so limited in the bill introduced by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TOWNE], but we are now told that we should broaden it so as to reach those who did nothing except to go upon the land. I tell you, gentlemen, if you pass this bill you will find squatters upon public lands all over the country knocking at your doors and demanding that you give them the same rights granted by this bill. Why should not settlers who have occupied public lands as squatters for years and been "entered out" have just as much right as these settlers who have done nothing except to come to Congress and demand the right to purchase other land at $1.25 an acre—a right denied to other American citizens? Squatters in other parts of the country ought to have the same rights as these people, and it will be hard for you to refuse them when you have made this precedent.

Limit the benefits of this bill, as I propose and as the gentleman from Minnesota proposed in the beginning, to those who have made filings or entry, and you do no great injustice; but if you pass the bill in its present form you establish a precedent that will open the door to every man who has lived on public lands for similar relief. You do injustice to the rights of the thousands of homeless people of this country who desire to enter public lands for the purpose of building homes upon them. It is admitted that the settlers in question decline to take the benefits of the act of October 1, 1890, because it required a residence of three months. That shows conclusively to my mind that they do not mean to take the lands for homes, but for the purpose of selling them—for speculation. This bill removes all limitations as to time when these entries can be made, and allows legal representatives—a thing unheard of in the homestead law—to make the entries.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, the men who took possession of these lands for the purpose of entering them under the homestead law did so upon the invitation of the Government; they did so upon the ruling of the Interior Department which held the lands subject to homestead entry. They did all that the law required, and although it turned out afterwards that the land was not subject to homestead entry, yet as they had occupied it and had complied with the law in all respects, this bill proposes to put them on other lands simply upon the same footing which they occupied upon the lands in question. I now call for the previous question.

The question being taken on ordering the previous question, there were on a division (called for by Mr. MCRAE)—ayes 79, noes 28.

Mr. MCRAE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered; there being—ayes 21, noes 128 (less than one-fifth voting in the affirmative).

So the previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the report of the committee was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the enrolling clerk of the House in enrolling H. R. 6248, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to insert in section 24, after the words "ninety-six," the following, "except as in said sections otherwise specially provided."

PATENTS TO UNION PACIFIC LANDS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate concurrent resolution No. 38.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the resolution.

Mr. KEM. Is that by unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the title of the resolution, and then the Chair will put the question to the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Concurrent resolution.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to rescind his orders to the Commissioner of the General Land Office suspending work upon the Union Pacific Railroad Company land lists now on file, embracing lands along the Union Pacific main line in western Nebraska, northern Colorado, Wyoming, and Utah, and shall cause work thereon to be resumed and patents to issue to the Union Pacific Railway Company without delay to all lands described in the several lists now on file in the United States Land Office upon which title is due to the Union Pacific Railway Company, in order to complete, through the Union Pacific Railway Company, good and sufficient title to the purchasers and present owners of such lands: Provided, That no patents shall be issued for any lands which have not been sold by said company prior to the passage of this resolution.

With the following amendment, recommended by the Committee on Public Lands:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to resume work upon and to issue patents to the Union Pacific Railway Company without delay to all lands which have been sold by said company to bona fide purchasers: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as waiving any right that the United States may have to declare a forfeiture as to the lands which have not been so sold by said company."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. KEM. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KEM] objects.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, my question of personal privilege is that my constituents are entitled to know, and the country is entitled to know, why, at this time, it is impossible to provide relief for something like 25,000 people living along the line of the Union Pacific Railway whose property is jeopardized by reason of the fact that they have not a perfect title to their lands.

Mr. KEM. I raise the point, Mr. Speaker, that that is not a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is not a question of personal privilege.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I hold that it is a question of personal privilege that my constituents and the constituents of the gentleman from the Sixth district of Nebraska, in which there are over 900,000 acres of land, owned by farmers who are threatened with financial ruin—if this resolution to afford them relief does not pass, then these 5,000 people interested in it should know who is responsible. If this resolution does not pass——

Mr. KEM. I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming must be in order.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 1436) relating to commutations of homestead entries, and to confirm such entries when commutation proofs were received by local officers prematurely;

A bill (H. R. 1734) to increase the pension of Ann Catherine Hull;

A bill (H. R. 5675) authorizing the construction of a wagon and motor bridge over the Missouri River at St. Charles, Mo.;

A bill (S. 1659) to amend the laws of the District of Columbia as to married women, to make parents the natural guardians of their minor children, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 710) granting a pension to Ada J. Schwatka, widow of the late Lieut. Frederick Schwatka;

A bill (S. 2221) for the relief of settlers on the Northern Pacific Railroad indemnity lands;

A bill (S. 2499) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Washington and Great Falls Electric Railway Company"; and

A bill (H. R. 6248) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a conference report.

Mr. CANNON. I shall have to raise the question of consideration on that report.

Mr. POWERS. It will not take more than a minute.

Mr. CANNON. I want to dispose of the deficiency bill.

Mr. POWERS. It will not take a minute.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will present the conference report.

Mr. DINGLEY. I hope the gentleman from Vermont will withdraw the report. The deficiency bill ought to be gotten into conference.

Mr. POWERS. I withdraw it.

Mr. KEM. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KEM. I desire to be informed by the Chair if remarks made by gentlemen upon the floor out of order are entitled to go into the RECORD when objection is made.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the RECORD is not made up yet, and the gentleman is not charged with any duty in connection with it until to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is obliged to say that the question of what goes into the RECORD is somewhat of a disputed point. Whatever is presented as a question of privilege and as a part of the proceedings of the House ought to go into the RECORD, but what is said after the question has been ruled upon by the Chair the Chair thinks ought not to go into the RECORD.

Mr. KEM. Then I ask that that part be stricken out.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, what difference does it make. The newspapers have got it if it is of enough importance. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will endeavor to do his duty in that regard.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the motion that the House disagree to amendment numbered 233 on the general deficiency bill.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the gentleman from Illinois, I will state that that single amendment covers 75 pages of printed matter. The bill as amended by the Senate has been printed, and gentlemen can send for that bill and know exactly what is under consideration. I make this statement in order to save the necessity of reading the amendment, which covers 75 pages of printed matter.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman's motion will cover this amendment 233.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like very much to hear what these gentlemen are saying.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point that he can not hear what is being said.

Mr. CANNON. I can say to the House, if they will send and get the House print of the deficiency bill covering the Senate amendments that came here yesterday, and which they can get at the document room, they will find that amendment No. 233 of the Senate commences on page 139 of the bill, and that it includes all that follows, to the end of the bill, on page 214, covering, in round numbers, 700 items in one amendment.

Mr. MAHON. Do you know the exact amount?

Mr. CANNON. I have the amount here. The deficiency bill as it passed the House covered $4,798,590.45. Gentlemen will recollect that early in the session we passed an urgent deficiency bill that covered, in round numbers, $6,000,000. That and this bill as it passed the House would make about $11,000,000. The Senate has added to this bill $6,266,000, an extraordinary addition; and when I state that, substantially, the general deficiency bill as it passed the House cared for the public service under the rules of the House I am strictly within the limit of correct statement. This bill makes appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and prior years.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the gentleman will pardon me, do I understand that the Senate has sent in one amendment seventy-five pages of claims to the House?

Mr. CANNON. Precisely.

A MEMBER. Seventy-eight pages.

Mr. DINGLEY. Seventy-eight pages of claims in one omnibus provision, and expect this House, without any investigation, to immediately adopt a proposition of that kind?

Mr. CANNON. Covering over seven hundred items.

Mr. SAYERS. If the gentleman will allow me, it not only contains the French spoliation claims and the Bowman Act war claims, but it also contains the claims of Charles P. Chouteau, amounting to over $174,000, and other claims amounting to $11,000, that have nothing to do with these other classes of claims.

Mr. DINGLEY. All in one omnibus amendment?

Mr. HOPKINS. One moment. As I understand about that Chouteau claim, the Committee on War Claims of this Congress have rejected that claim.

Mr. SAYERS. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. ADAMS. I will ask the gentleman if these claims have not been adjudicated in the Court of Claims? When statements are made here that these claims have not been investigated it is not a correct statement, for they have been investigated in the court.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me, and I may be permitted to have quiet and proceed in my own time, I think I can cover the statement.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The House will please be in order.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, this is the most extraordinary set of amendments ever proposed by the Senate of the United States in twenty years, during my service in the House of Representatives, to the general deficiency or any other appropriation bill. Now, that we may see just a minute wherein it is extraordinary, I ask the attention of the House. Gentlemen understand that it is necessary for the House and the Senate to make rules, to create committees, and make provision for doing public legislation, and to make provision touching legislation covering the claims of the private citizen. For that reason the House is divided into fifty-odd committees, and the jurisdiction of each committee is fixed by the rules of the House. You have the Committee on Appropriations. You jealously by the rules limit the jurisdiction of that committee to recommending provisions that will carry on the Government from year to year in pursuance of existing law. That is as far as we can go. It is as far as we should go on general appropriation bills.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Is it not entirely within the province of the Committee on Appropriations in the deficiency bill to make an appropriation to pay claims found due against the United States?

Mr. CANNON. It has been held universally that we can not.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Did you not put them in this very deficiency bill?

Mr. CANNON. Not at all.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I can show them to you by the dozen.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman has been long enough in his service in Congress to know that touching these extraordinary amendments he and I, knowing what the rules are and the distinction between audited claims under the rules and those not audited, we can not deceive each other, and I know I do not and he ought not to mislead the House.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. There are thousands of dollars of appropriation in this bill for the payment of simple findings of the Departments, while every one of these claims to which the gentleman objects are findings of the Court of Claims.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, Mr. Speaker, it is a sorry case indeed which requires the eminent gentleman from New Hampshire to come and seek to muddy the water in favor of these claims before I can even get a chance to state the proposition. I have not stated it, but if gentlemen will give me their attention I will state the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations, and how that jurisdiction has been exercised, and just what it is that the Senate of the United States seek to have us do in one of these amendments that they send over here in these closing days of the session. If you will look at Rule XI, you will find that all claims under the Bowman Act and all claims under the French spoliation act are to be referred to the Committee on War Claims or the Committee on Claims, and these matters that are placed in this general appropriation bill by Senate amendment were referred in House and Senate to the proper claims committees. Much has been said about the Appropriations Committee usurping the jurisdiction of other committees. I call the House to bear me witness that we have tried zealously to conform to the rules, and when general appropriation bills are sought to be made the vehicles to carry through, out of order, the business of other committees, it is not a safe or wise procedure, and I stand to protest against it. Let me call attention for a minute to the rule which governs the jurisdiction of the House Appropriations Committee:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law or changing existing law.

More; let me read the next clause, that you may see how sweepingly the House has provided for this class of amendments:

No bill for the payment or adjudication of any private claim against the Government shall be referred, except by unanimous consent, to any other than the following-named committees: Pensions, Invalid Pensions, Claims, War Claims, Private Land Claims, and the Committee on Accounts.

Now, this deficiency bill, strictly within the rules of the House, was passed by the House. "But," says the gentleman from New Hampshire, "it covers claims that have been audited by the Treasury Department." Yes; but the statute of the United States makes the proper officers of the Treasury Department a court to do what? To pass on legal claims against this Government arising under appropriation or positive provision of law, where the money has not been appropriated; and these audited claims that come here from time to time, certified by the Department under the law, are the judgments of that court, and have always been referred under the rules to the Committee on Appropriations, and have always been appropriated for just as we appropriate for the payment of judgments of the United States courts. But it may be asked wherein do the Senate rules differ from the rules of the House in this respect? Not at all. They have substantially the same rules there that we have. Yet that coordinate branch of Congress have made this and other amendments to the general deficiency bill and sent them with their compliments to us. It is not for me to criticise the coordinate branch. I belong to this branch of the Congress, and my duties lead me to insist upon legislation and appropriation, safe legislation and appropriation, under the rules and usages of the House, and if we have to resist the encroachments of another body out of order, let us perform our function. It is not the first time the House of Representatives has had to take care of itself and the other departments of the Government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what does this amendment consist of? It consists of these 700 items, part of them called the French spoliation claims. I am not going to discuss their legality or equity. It may be that they ought to be paid. It may be that a portion of them ought to be paid and another portion ought not to be paid. It may be that the claimant, or the descendants of the claimant, ought to be paid, and that the insurance company which took the risk and got the premium and met with the loss ought not to be paid. It may be that the assignee in bankruptcy who, three generations ago, acquired some of these claims for a song ought not to be paid. I do not know. I am not going to discuss that now. But all these questions are involved in appropriations for the payment of French spoliation claims, and the bare statement of the proposition shows the wisdom of the rule of the House that appropriations upon general appropriation bills shall be in pursuance of existing law. "But," says somebody, "has not the Court of Claims passed upon them?" Let us see. I hold in my hand volume 23 of the acts of 1885, when there was legislation touching the French spoliation claims. It referred them to the Court of Claims. For what purpose?

And they [the court] shall decide upon the validity of such claims according to the rules of law, municipal and international, and the treaties of the United States applicable to the same, and shall report all such conclusions of fact and law as in their judgment may affect the liability of the United States therefor.

Report to whom? To Congress. What else?

Such finding and report of the court shall be taken to be merely advisory as to the law and facts found, and shall not conclude either the claimant or Congress; and all claims not finally presented within two years shall be barred.

Now listen:

And nothing in this act shall be construed as committing the United States to the payment of any such claims.

Congress by law made the Court of Claims like unto a committee to examine these claims and report back its findings; but the reservation is expressly made that nothing in the proceeding shall commit the United States to the payment of the claims. It is merely advisory. That is the condition of these claims covered by this one amendment, embracing something like 100 pages. And yet are we to understand that in these the last days of this session these claims are to be taken by a Cæsarian operation from the committee of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and from the Claims Committee of the Senate, and when the child is taken forcibly from its legitimate mother, legitimate under law and rule, it is to be placed here as an illegitimate child on a general appropriation bill, designed legitimately to carry on the service of the Government for this fiscal year?

Mr. ADAMS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMS. Has not Congress acknowledged the legitimacy of this "child" by appropriating money in 1890 to pay all the claims that had then been reported to Congress by the Court of Claims?

Mr. CANNON. What does that prove?

Mr. ADAMS. That these are legitimate claims; and even assuming the gentleman's position that the Court of Claims in this matter acts the part of a committee, Congress has acknowledged the legitimacy of these claims by paying a part of them.

Mr. CANNON. I am not speaking of the merits of these claims. Some of these claims are made payable to the descendants of the men who are supposed to have been originally entitled; others are payable to the collateral representatives; others to assignees in bankruptcy; others to insurance companies that reaped their profit in the war premiums, and claim to be subrogated to the rights of the original claimants.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Does not the gentleman think that if Congress goes on refusing to pay the debts of the country all those debts will after a while be due to "heirs" and "collateral representatives"? [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman makes that inquiry; let me answer him. If the Court of Claims or any other court is to be invested with jurisdiction to render judgment, let us invest it with that jurisdiction, and then appropriate to meet the judgments. But because Congress fails to so invest it with jurisdiction, and honorable gentlemen like my friend from Ohio, when he asks a question of that kind in apology—if it is to be followed to its legitimate conclusion—for this class of legislation coming as an amendment on a general appropriation bill, he does not, in my judgment, perform his duty as a conservative legislator as well as he does almost invariably at other times.

But that is not all. There is a lot of claims here under the Bowman Act amounting in round numbers to half a million dollars. This amendment covers altogether claims amounting to about $2,000,000 or a little less in round numbers. Now, what is the Bowman Act? It was enacted in 1883. Let us see what jurisdiction it confers:

That whenever a claim or matter is pending before any committee of the Senate or House of Representatives, or before either House of Congress, which involves the investigation and determination of facts, the committee or House—may cause the same, with the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, to be transmitted to the Court of Claims of the United States, and the same shall there be proceeded in under such rules as the court may adopt. When the facts shall have been found the court shall not enter judgment thereon, but shall report the same to the committee or to the House by which the case was transmitted for its consideration.

Gentlemen talk about these being "judgments" of the Court of Claims. The Court is prohibited from rendering judgment in these cases. Upon the request of a committee or of the House or of a Department the Court makes the investigation and returns answer as to its finding of facts, for the consideration of the Department or of Congress.

Mr. DOCKERY. Do I understand the gentleman from Illinois to say that claims of this character are carried in the Senate amendment?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly. The Senate amendment includes claims under the Bowman Act, claims arising in the Indian service, war claims, and claims touching the construction of ships or gunboats during the war—a generation ago. In fact, I may say in passing, that these claims come substantially within the following description: As early as 1864 legal claimants had a status afforded them by the Fourth of July claims act, including these claims. And that tribunal investigated and passed upon claims to the amount of six millions and a half of dollars, which have been reported by the Committee on Claims year by year and appropriated for. Then, under the Southern Claims Commission act, claims to the amount of nearly $5,000,000 were investigated and paid. Nearly all the claims embraced in the present amendment have had their day in court and been rejected. But they come, and they can come. Like hope, they "spring eternal." Under the Bowman Act these claims are referred for a finding of fact to the Court of Claims. The Court of Claims finds the facts and reports them back for our consideration.

Mr. DOCKERY. Have they been considered?

Mr. CANNON. Have they been considered on the report of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, claim by claim? No.

Mr. GIBSON. Every one of these claims has been reported by the War Claims Committee. Every one of them has been investigated and recommended for payment.

Mr. CANNON. Every one of these claims, the gentleman says, has been reported by the War Claims Committee. Let that committee perform its functions just as it did in respect to the $12,000,000 that was appropriated for similar claims under the Fourth of July act and the act creating the Southern Claims Commission.

Mr. QUIGG. Does the action of the Court of Claims in reporting its finding of facts establish legally a debt?

Mr. CANNON. No, sir.

Mr. QUIGG. It simply brings the case to Congress?

Mr. CANNON. Precisely.

Mr. DOCKERY. For consideration.

Mr. CANNON. For consideration only. The act of Congress expressly provided in the one case that it should not commit Congress to the payment of the French spoliation claims; and in the other that the reports shall be merely advisory; that they should report their findings. In other words, that the Court of Claims should not enter judgment, but leave the whole matter open, upon the findings submitted by them, for the consideration of Congress.

Now, if I have been able to place this matter before the House so that they can understand it, let me take another step forward.

Mr. KNOX. Let me ask the gentleman from Illinois whether there are not precedents for putting appropriations on the general appropriation bills simply on the findings of the Court of Claims?

Mr. CANNON. I do not recollect any except in the Fiftieth Congress; in which, my recollection is, by order of the House in the first instance, before the Committee on Appropriations was appointed, the French spoliation people got their work in, by a resolution which amounted to a rule, directing the Appropriations Committee afterwards—after it was appointed—to report to the House an item covering these claims. And I am informed, as my recollection is refreshed, that notwithstanding that order, the House Committee on Appropriations should report on a general appropriation bill these claims, afterwards, when considered in the House, they were ruled out by a majority of the House and did not go upon the bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is correct.

Mr. CANNON. The objection was sustained on a yea-and-nay vote in the House.

In the Fifty-first Congress—and I want to be exactly fair—the Senate of the United States, against its own rules, put the French spoliation claims on the deficiency bill in the closing hours of the session; and I recollect when that deficiency bill came over here, after midnight, with a House that was completely tired out, and with barely a quorum in attendance (having to wake members as they reclined on the lounges around the Halls and in the committee rooms), the matter was considered, and the House agreed with the Senate under those circumstances. And, if I recollect aright, the last night of the last day between 2 and 3 o'clock in the morning, this proceeding took place.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a word in conclusion. Gentlemen were present in the House on yesterday when this bill came over from the Senate. It had not then been printed. These 700 items, aggregating in round numbers some $2,000,000, were placed on the bill. I happen to be chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I am chairman of the subcommittee that prepared this deficiency bill; and I never had read one item of these 700, aggregating $2,000,000, and my eyes met them for the first time this morning when I sent after this bill, in which I discovered these amendments. Not only the war claims, not only the French spoliation claims, but the Indian claims, the damages to shipmasters, as is alleged—claims originating over a generation ago, barred by the statutes, turned down in the courts—I find them like birds of evil omen, some of them, trooping together to fasten on this general deficiency bill that must pass or the Government stop.

Mr. DOCKERY. Does the gentleman mean to say that these claims are all grouped in one amendment of the Senate?

Mr. CANNON. I do.

Mr. NORTHWAY. All in one.

Mr. DOCKERY. In other words, that they are all pooled?

Mr. NORTHWAY. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely so. They are all grouped together in the one amendment, covering some hundred pages of the bill, 700 different items, running along item after item, from $150,000 down, and aggregating about $2,000,000.

Now, can anybody claim that the Committee on Appropriations can, in these the closing hours of this session, turn itself into a claims committee, and even read a sentence touching the merits of each one of these various claims? It can not be done.

"Ah! But," says somebody, "they may claim that these represent a judgment of the court and the adjudication of a claim." I deny it. The court never was given jurisdiction to render a judgment. That court was merely made a commission, or a committee if you please, to investigate and report its findings to the House of Representatives, and it is of no higher weight or sanctity than the reports of any other committee of the House. Each one of these cases, if it has merit, must stand upon its own merit. I think I am safe in guessing that a dozen volumes, of 500 pages each, closely printed, would not understandingly and conclusively discuss these 700 claims.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. LACEY. Can you give some suggestion as to the ground on which they claim that we ought to pay the insurance companies in these French spoliation claims? Is there any reasonable suggestion as to the validity of their claims?

Mr. CANNON. Well, the gentleman understands the doctrine of subrogation. The insurance company took a risk on a vessel a hundred years ago, at a very high premium; the vessel was captured, the insurance company makes a loss; but in footing up their whole business they make a great profit. Now, the insurance company pays in part or altogether, as the case may be. This proposition would subrogate the insurance company to the rights of the man who lost the vessel. So you may take the case where an assignee in bankruptcy sells a man out, and the claim goes for a bagatelle, a cent on the dollar. It is insisted that they should be paid in full. It may be that they ought to be. I am not discussing the merits of these claims. I say that the Private Calendars of the House and Senate have been stripped, against the rules of both bodies, and literally written upon this bill in the closing hours of the session.

Mr. GROUT. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt, there are no insurance cases in this French spoliation list.

Mr. CANNON. Can the gentleman speak from his own knowledge?

Mr. GROUT. Well, from what I believe to be reliable information, there is no insurance company provided for in this list of French spoliation claims.

Mr. CANNON. I heard that in the Fifty-first Congress; and yet the insurance companies abounded all through that appropriation, and that is just what I complain of. My colleague from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] is an able and well-equipped legislator, vigilant in the performance of his public duties. He and I serve upon the same committee. He rises in his place and says that he is credibly informed that there are no insurance claims in these 700 items. I reply that I am credibly informed that there are insurance claims in there. Now, the bare statement of the proposition, when two as smart men as my colleague and I disagree upon our information, ought to be sufficient to show the inconsistency of this method of legislation. [Laughter.] Is the whole House, that has not been charged with the preparation of this bill, to open its mouth like a chicken and gulp it down, whatever it may be composed of?

Mr. GROUT. The gentleman is now speaking of insurance claims. When I interrupted the gentleman he was speaking about insurance companies. I do not say that there may not be in this list of French spoliation claims some cases of individual underwriters.

Mr. LACEY. Look at page 146 and page 148.

Mr. GROUT. I do not say that may not be so. I say there is not the case of any insurance company in this list of claims.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman from Vermont will allow me to call attention to the matter referred to by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY]——

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Vermont has not taken the floor. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] in a minute. I want to say that I have not yet read these 100 pages. My colleague on the committee [Mr. NORTHWAY] calls my attention to the fact that one paragraph of these 100 pages prohibits the payment of these appropriations to insurance companies. I have not carefully read the items—I had no time to read—but was informed, and am still informed, that, as the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GROUT] has admitted, there are claims in favor of individuals which are substantially and equitably insurance claims—claims owned by others than the original losers or their heirs—included in the bill.

Mr. QUIGG. Does the gentleman mean that if we pay these items we shall be paying a lot of speculators instead of heirs of original sufferers?

Mr. CANNON. I am so informed.

Mr. MAHON. That is not in the bill.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman says it is not in the bill. Let anyone rise in his place in this House who has read this amendment, which the gentleman moves that the House concur in, since it was printed this morning.

Mr. MAHON. Every item in that amendment is an honest debt, no difference to whom it belongs.

Mr. CANNON. Has the gentleman read it?

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. This morning?

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. From beginning to end?

Mr. MAHON. I have looked over it.

Mr. CANNON. I have found one who says he has read it. Let No. 2 stand up.

Mr. ADAMS. Why should we read all the items? It is nothing but a list of claims which have been passed upon by the Court of Claims.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not intend to stand up to be shot at by a gentleman so utterly furious as the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The gentleman knows I had no intention to treat him with rudeness. It had passed from my mind that he desired to be recognized. I will now yield to him for a question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I wanted to call the gentleman's attention to this fact: It was stated by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] that on page 148 he had found the name of an insurance company. I simply want to say that the Real Estate Insurance and Trust Company of Philadelphia, which was formed probably seventy-five years after the French spoliation claims were created, is the administrator, under the law of Pennsylvania, of an estate. I think that law under which that company can be the administrator is a bad one. We have the same law in Ohio. That company, under that statute, is the administrator of one James Campbell, deceased, and as the administrator of James Campbell that company is prosecuting this claim, but not as an insurance company, because there was no such thing. This company was not in existence when these claims were incurred.

Mr. ADAMS. It is not a fire-insurance company. These wild statements will all be answered in time.

Mr. CANNON. Is the gentleman from Ohio through with his question?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER (to Mr. GROSVENOR). I should like to ask the gentleman from Ohio if the James Campbell mentioned on page 148 is the same gentleman who is mentioned on page 149 in connection with the Real Estate Title Insurance and Trust Company of Philadelphia, administrator?

Mr. GROSVENOR. In one case it is the Real Estate Insurance and Trust Company of Philadelphia, administrator of James Campbell, deceased, and in the other case it is the administrator de bonis non. They appear to be two different claims. I want to say that I made an investigation, that I might satisfy myself that there was no insurance-company claim allowed in this bill, and then, when the gentleman from Iowa pointed this out, I thought it was fair to make an explanation.

Mr. QUIGG. But the gentleman from New Jersey claims that this party had two administrators.

Mr. GROSVENOR. One is the administrator and the other is the administrator de bonis non. There is nothing incompatible in that.

Mr. CANNON. Has the gentleman from Ohio concluded his question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes, for the present; and I hope the gentleman will stay on the earth on this question, so that we may have chance to ask him other questions.

Mr. CANNON. I will stay on the earth; let no man get in the dirt on this proposition. If you turn to page 214 you will find this:

> The payment to the assigns in each case being at the request of the original claimants as found by the Court of Claims.

That, I suppose, would include all classes of claims.

Mr. SAYERS. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the claim found on page 212. That item is for $174,000 or more. That is an independent claim.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. SAYERS. Has the gentleman any information respecting that claim? If so, I would be glad if he would inform the House.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know anything about it, and I do not know that anybody else knows anything about it. I know that it is for $174,000, and I know it had its origin, as it appears, in 1864. That is all. Does anybody know anything about it?

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to know of the gentleman, because it seems important to have some committee action, whether these 700 claims incorporated in one amendment were ever considered by the Senate Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. CANNON. I understand not.

Mr. DOCKERY. Then this amendment was put on in the open Senate?

Mr. CANNON. That is the way I read the RECORD.

Mr. DOCKERY. Without the action of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Still, did not the Senate put it upon the bill on the report of the Committee on Claims, the report being made by Mr. BURROWS of Michigan?

Mr. CANNON. I understand the fact to be that these claims were put on in the Senate. The claims were not reported, and can not be, to the Committee on Appropriations under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman, I know, wants to be entirely fair.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If he will recur to the RECORD a minute he will find that Senator BURROWS of Michigan stated in the open Senate that he reported these claims from the Committee on Claims, and reported them favorably. I am referring to the war claims. Now, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. Has Mr. BURROWS reported 700 claims?

Mr. RICHARDSON. He stated that he reported 348 of them.

Mr. CANNON. Let me answer the gentleman and say, so far as I know, Mr. BURROWS has not information touching these 700 items, and I speak respectfully, for he is an eminent man and statesman; and they have not been argued in the Senate or House, and this House has no knowledge touching their merits.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. CANNON. In a minute. Let me state one thing further.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I hope the gentleman will allow me to recur to his statement.

Mr. CANNON. In a minute. There are a lot of things floating around loose to convince our minds. I hold in my hand a letter to Mr. HENRY, a Representative from Indiana. He brought it over to me a minute ago, and said that I was at liberty to use it. I did not intend to do so, and I will not now read the man's name, because I do not care to do such a thing unless some gentleman should demand it.

DEAR MR. HENRY—

Mr. HENRY, I believe, says he does not know this gentleman—

DEAR MR. HENRY: Senate amendment to general deficiency bill to pay Court of Claims findings is O. K.

The cases thereon were tried while I was one of the Attorney-General's assistants, and I know the findings to be correct.

The Democrats have neglected this appropriation, and by putting same on the deficiency bill now it can be charged to them, and properly so.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. What of it?

Mr. CANNON. Any action of the committee about that?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The man says he has helped try these cases and knows they are O. K.

Mr. CANNON. Does my friend know who the man is?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I do not care who he is. He is giving a statement of fact.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman want the man's name made public?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I do not care.

Mr. CANNON. Was the gentleman concerned in the trial of these cases?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Myself? No, sir.

Mr. CANNON. How do you know they are correct?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Because I have studied them.

Mr. CANNON. Studied all of these 700 items?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I know that the Court of Claims is accustomed to being right, and I am willing to bear my testimony to that effect at all times.

Mr. CANNON. The Court of Claims under the law had no power to render judgment in these cases, and has not done so. Now, I have said enough about this matter.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. CANNON. With pleasure.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I thought the gentleman was going to yield to me.

Mr. CANNON. In a minute.

Mr. GROSVENOR. In reply to the question of the gentleman from Illinois whether we know these claims to be correct, I want to quote an authority to show that they are correct.

Mr. CANNON. Very well.

Mr. GROSVENOR (reading)—

Now, one word—

That is pretty familiar language—

Now, one word in respect to the French spoliation claims—

Mr. CANNON. These claims?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The same class of claims; French spoliation claims.

Mr. CANNON. These identical claims?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The same class.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman now is about to misrepresent somebody, I do not know whom. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR (reading)—

In a previous Congress I voted for these claims. After some careful examination on my part and listening to the arguments with regard to them, I came to the conclusion that at least a certain amount of them were just and should be paid.

Mr. CANNON. What claims does that refer to?

Mr. GROSVENOR. French spoliation claims.

Mr. CANNON. I have suspicion that I know, perhaps, whose language the gentleman is reading. Were not those claims under the Bowman Act?

Mr. GROSVENOR. This extract begins, "Now, one word in respect to the French spoliation claims." The authority whom I am quoting is one JOSEPH G. CANNON, an honored Representative from the State of Illinois. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. My recollection is that those were some claims under the Bowman Act.

Mr. GROSVENOR. No; they were French spoliation claims. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Very well. Were they the claims that are in this amendment—these particular claims? If the gentleman quotes me correctly, I said there that I had investigated the particular claims there referred to and that I believed some of them were just and ought to be paid. I have no occasion to modify that language. I suppose that some of these claims are just, but which one of the 700 is just I do not know and I do not believe any member of this House knows. I believe that God Almighty alone knows now. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman how many members of this House know of their own knowledge, derived from personal investigation, that one bill in ten or one item in one hundred that is passed here is correct? Members have to take somebody's word, and to assume that he is honest.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; and therefore we organize the House, create committees, form rules, and adopt methods of procedure for the transaction of the public business, so that when a matter comes here the House may know that the committee that reports it has investigated it and is responsible for it. All those safeguards are given; they are all absent here. No committee of this House vouches for these claims. By force they are put upon a bill that I happen to have charge of, wrongfully, by a Senate amendment, and I know nothing of them and can know nothing of them. Therefore I am against this method of legislation. They have brought the Bowman Act claims and the Indian claims and the French spoliation claims and put them on here, not upon their separate individual merits—oh, no; but out of order, in one amendment, 700 items, $2,000,000 in amount. They have married these claims one to another. If there is to be issue of that marriage, I want to make prophecy to the gentlemen of this House that it will be deformed, it will be corrupting in its action, and it will plague its ancestors. [Laughter.]

Mr. MERCER. It is polygamy, is it not? [Laughter.]

Mr. WELLINGTON. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. What is there against the claims presented on page 190, beginning with "Maryland," on the nineteenth line, down to line 13, on page 194?

Mr. CANNON. God knows. I never saw them until this morning. I have not yet seen them. I have had no opportunity to see them.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Is it not true that every one of those claims has been before the Court of Claims and has been favorably reported to a committee of this House? And is it not further true that that report was referred to the Committee on Claims and that every one of those claims has been favorably reported to the House by that committee?

Mr. CANNON. It may be true; but even if that be true there is no judgment. It was a mere finding by the Court of Claims. The court had no authority to do more than merely to make a finding and report it to Congress for its consideration, and the fact that the report was referred to the Court of Claims shows the jurisdiction. It is the effort to take these separate claims, against the rule, against sound practice, and to put them wholesale upon a bill where they do not belong, and which must pass, that I object to.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I just want to add this: So far as these claims are concerned they come, every one of them, from the State of Maryland, every one of them from the district that I represent. The greater part of them I know something about personally. The greater part of them are due to men, or to their estates, for goods and property taken in war time. They have been proven again and again. They have gone before the Court of Claims; they have gone before the committee of this House; they have been favorably reported; and I say that it is within the jurisdiction of this House to pay these people the honest debt which the Government owes them.

Mr. CANNON. Well, that is a pretty long question, but I like to yield to my friend when I can. He says he thinks these claims under the Bowman Act are just.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I do.

Mr. CANNON. Has my friend examined the other claims in this amendment?

Mr. WELLINGTON. Some of them I have, and some I have not——

Mr. CANNON. Hold on a moment; I want to get at the fact. Has my friend examined into the matter of the Chouteau claim for $174,000?

Mr. WELLINGTON. I have not. I have taken it just as the gentleman took the other day the twelve-thousand-five-hundred-dollar claim.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, "the twelve-thousand-five-hundred-dollar claim!" I assented to that appropriation by Senate amendment at the close of a conference after midnight and after the Senate had receded on two or three million dollars; and when that item was submitted here in a conference report the House believed it unwise and rejected the report. Let the House follow suit in this case.

Mr. WELLINGTON. But did not the gentleman know, or ought he not to have known, that this expenditure of $12,500 was not a just or correct one?

Mr. CANNON. In my judgment——

Mr. WELLINGTON. And yet the gentleman objects this morning to the payment of claims——

Mr. CANNON. I do not yield.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Claims that are correct and just, and have been year after year reported to the House.

Mr. CANNON. I claim the floor.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I say that the Government owes these just debts, and ought to pay them to these people.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be protected in my rights.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I want my constituents to be protected in their rights.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland is out of order.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, it always affords me pleasure——

The SPEAKER. The House will come to order, and gentlemen will take their seats. [After a pause.] The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I ask for a minute more.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I move that the gentleman——

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I want but a minute—merely a part of the time that I yielded to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee I shall be entitled, I presume, to an hour; and I yield to the gentleman as much time as he may desire out of my hour.

Mr. CANNON. I want only a minute. I have already said what I desire to say about the merits of this question. I yielded to the gentleman from Maryland, for whom I have respect, that he might ask a question. In the colloquy back and forth he thought proper—I suppose in the fancied hope that he would strengthen this amendment—to refer to an irrelevant matter—an item which was carried in the conference report on the sundry civil bill; and he taunted me with the fact that that report was "turned down." The House did not assent to that Senate amendment on the merits. I was not sorry then that it was turned down; I am not sorry now. When you settle bills carrying thirty or forty million dollars, there must be something of compromise and something of yielding back and forth. But it seemed to me that the gentleman, in his zeal to try to strengthen these claims, not upon their merits, did not do himself the credit that he ordinarily does in his direct way when he turned off and lugged in something that had nothing whatever to do with the provisions before the House.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I should like to say just one word in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, if he will permit me.

Mr. CANNON. In one moment I shall be through. Is the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] in his seat?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am here.

Mr. CANNON. I find that the language which the gentleman from Ohio read from a debate in the Fifty-first Congress and credited to me was not my language. I find that it was the language of Mr. Peters of Kansas, to whom I had yielded.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not at all; I did not make any mistake.

Mr. CANNON. Very well; it may be the gentleman is correct; I will examine further. But if the language which the gentleman read was mine, it was precisely like that of the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. Peters. I acquit my friend, of course, of any intention of misquoting me. The book is here, and we will both examine it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Very well. The book was sent to me with a note calling my attention to the remarks of the gentleman, and I read what was marked.

Mr. CANNON. But what the gentleman read was the language of Mr. Peters.

Mr. GROSVENOR. We will see about that.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman from Illinois be kind enough to state the page of the RECORD that he read from?

Mr. CANNON. Page 3807.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What Congress?

Mr. CANNON. It was in 1891—the Fifty-first Congress

Mr. MAHON obtained the floor.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the Chair will allow me a moment, this book was sent to me with a note calling my attention to a marked paragraph. Looking at the heading, I saw that it appeared to be a part of the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]; and with that understanding I read a sentence or two. I find now it is the language of another member, who had interrupted the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SAYERS. It was not the language of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It was not. I was misled in the hurry.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, if the gentleman from Illinois will yield to me—he promised to do so——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] has been recognized.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then I will ask the floor later. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to what I understood him to say and what the RECORD shows him to have said in the Fiftieth Congress.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, it makes no difference what I said in the Fiftieth Congress. What is it decent and proper to do now?

Mr. RICHARDSON. You said then that these claims were "decent and proper" and ought to be paid.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] has been recognized.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I advocate the amendment of the Senate to this bill not because I have any personal interest in it, or because the great State that I in part represent has much in the bill. There are but two war claims under the provisions of the Bowman Act in the amendment in which that State is interested; two cases—small ones—one from Pittsburg, represented by my colleague [Mr. DALZELL], and another from the county of Adams, where the great battle of Gettysburg was fought. It is not, therefore, the amount that the bill carries for my own State that induces me to support the amendment; but I support it for a reason which is entirely satisfactory to me, and I propose, in the time I shall occupy, to present to the House as a lawyer the cold, naked facts which to my mind should recommend this amendment to the House for adoption.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] says this takes away the functions and the business of the Committee on Claims and of War Claims of the House of Representatives.

I have no complaint to make against the gentleman from Illinois or any other member of the House as to the method of legislation adopted by this body. We have regular calendars for the business of this House. I am not attributing it to any one or any two men, but the House has absolutely, during this entire session, permitted legislation that was in gross and open violation of the rules of the House to be enacted on this floor. The gentleman from Illinois says: "Why not stand to the rules of the House?" That has been my contention in the past, and is my contention to-day. The Bowman Act has resulted in presenting to this House and placing upon the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union a number of claims, legitimate claims, against the Government of the United States. This Congress has been in session six long months and yet that Calendar has never been touched for one single moment. The Calendars of this House are veritable graveyards in which the bills of the great committees of the House are buried, and buried out of sight. [Applause.]

The gentleman speaks of the "great committees of the House," fifty-seven of them, "organized for the transaction of its business." If I had the time I could show him and convince this House that there are about forty-two of these committees that are absolutely and utterly ignored. The gentlemen composing these committees have spent their time during this session at arduous and hard work on their committees; but all in vain, simply because they were not permitted to come before the House with the business they had matured. Now, if the War Claims Committee wants to put life into any legislation, wants to give birth to any legislation and write it on the statute books of the country, it can accomplish it in no other way than in the way the gentleman from Illinois indicates, and that is to apply the knife—a drastic measure—and put life into it by the Cæsarean operation, as he calls it.

Mr. Speaker, four times in past Congresses in recent years has the Senate of the United States placed these amendments on the deficiency bills. Why is it not a pertinent and proper amendment? The reason the Senate put them on—and they represent the people as we do—the reason the Senate put them on in four Congresses, and have included them in deficiency bills, is simply because that is the only way the people can get any consideration in this body. Take, for instance, the great Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of this House. There are present to-day gentlemen who have served a long time in the House and are on that committee; and the sole work of that committee at this session was to report a resolution, and pass it through the House, appropriating the sum of $2,000 to fix up the kitchen in the House restaurant. [Laughter.] So I might go through many of the great committees of the House and point to the fact that they have not passed a bill during this Congress.

Now, this is a deficiency bill. If the Government of the United States owes these people, and the Secretary of the Treasury has no authority to pay them, we have a right to put the claims on the bill and appropriate the money for their payment.

I will now make a brief statement as to the French spoliation claim. It is a long history. Perhaps members of the House are all familiar with it. You remember that when the colonies had declared war against Great Britain—when they had declared for their independence—another nation across the sea came to the rescue of the colonists. In 1778 a treaty was entered into by which the Government of France bound herself to help the United States colonists to secure their independence. They performed their part of that contract to the letter. They sent their men and ships of war, and the dust of thousands of brave Frenchmen is in the soil of this country to-day in recognition of the fact that they did perform their part of the contract with this Government. But in 1790, or along there, the United States Government, in violation of that treaty, after they had secured their independence, went into another treaty, known as the Jay treaty, with Great Britain; and in that treaty the United States Government wantonly and knowingly refused to perform her part of the agreement with France, which was to protect her great West India possessions as well as to give her certain rights in the ports of this country. But in place of standing with France, as she agreed to do, she turned from France to Great Britain, and what was the result?

While there was no direct declaration of war between the two countries, France began at once to prey upon the commerce of the United States. So up until about 1800 this business went on. The result of it was that some 700 vessels of the pioneer merchantmen of the United States were destroyed by the French. Then the treaty of 1800 was entered into. Up to that time the French Government, in all her legislative bodies and by all her public utterances, openly acknowledged that she was indebted to the people of the United States who had had their vessels destroyed by her privateers. There is no question about that. And the French Government was ready and willing to pay them; but at the same time they held the United States Government bound to pay damages on account of the violation or nonperformance of the treaty of 1778. So, in recognition of this fact, about the year 1800 a commission sought to settle this difficulty between France and the United States. How was it settled? It is a fact beyond all controversy that the claim of the French Government was much larger than the claims of the people of the United States—nearly two to one. France agreed that she would abandon her claim, and the United States Government was to take care of the losses to American merchantmen and relieve France from that responsibility.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. SAYERS. Does the gentleman state to the House that it is a matter of official record that any such agreement as that was ever entered into between the two Governments?

Mr. MAHON. Yes; that was the discussion, or understanding, if you will read it.

Mr. SAYERS. I do not refer to the discussion, but to the agreement. The gentleman stated that there was an agreement between the two Governments.

Mr. MAHON. Does the gentleman from Texas deny that the French Government so understood it, and relinquished her claim?

Mr. SAYERS. I do not know.

Mr. MAHON. Well, I know.

Mr. SAYERS. I know there was a certain class of claims paid for depredations by the French Government upon American commerce. That class of claims related entirely to ships that were seized in the ports of France. If my recollection serves me rightly, the French Government was then sadly in need of provisions and supplies, and that character of claims was paid for by the French Government, but that as to the other character of claims, such as we have here now, and which relate to depredations upon the high seas, payment for those claims was refused.

Mr. MAHON. Well, to be short, the French Government, through her commissioners, demanded that the United States should pay her claim for violation of the treaty for the reason, as the gentleman knows, that France had not declared war against the United States and the United States had not declared war against France. If the gentleman will go back and read the speeches of Clay and Webster, and men of that kind, in the United States Senate from 1826, during the time they served in that body, he will find that those great statesmen recognized the responsibility of the United States.

Mr. SAYERS. But the claims were not paid.

Mr. MAHON. Now, Mr. Speaker, to put it in a nutshell, the United States Government took the claims of the people who owned these American vessels, and with those claims settled with the French Government, and were released from their obligations to the French Government,

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. When did the United States settle with the French Government for those claims?

Mr. MAHON. In 1800.

A MEMBER. When we bought Louisiana.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. With those claims?

Mr. MAHON. Yes; they took those very claims——

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Will the gentleman cite us to the treaty?

Mr. MAHON. The claims which were passed in the Fifty-first Congress, to the amount of $1,300,000, and these claims which are included in this amendment to-day, and with those claims of the United States they paid to the French Government the obligations which the French Government would have insisted on being paid by the Government of the United States; and if we had refused payment we should have been compelled to pay at the point of the bayonet and in the mouth of cannon.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. If the gentleman can cite us to any such treaty he is entitled to it by every possible right of discovery. It is his.

Mr. MAHON. I am not talking about the treaty. I am talking about the agreement.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. There was no such agreement made.

Mr. NORTHWAY. If the gentleman will send to the Court of Claims he will get a very long opinion, showing the whole history of the thing, and showing how the Court of Claims uphold these claims.

Mr. MAHON. I have it here, and if the gentleman takes the floor and denies the statement I made I shall be ready to knock the pins from under him. I say there was an agreement made.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Made in some form.

Mr. MAHON. It was repeatedly declared by Webster, by Chickering, and other great statesmen who in the past graced this Government with their great intellectual powers. Now, that is the way these claims originated.

These very claims were used by the Government of the United States. In other words, the United States Government having released the French Government, so that our people could not make individual claims against the French Government, the United States Government, by that agreement or understanding relinquishing all claims against the French Government, I repeat it, was using the claims of these people to pay its obligations to the French Government. Away back, from 1800 down to the present time, these people have ever since justly and properly insisted that the United States Government should pay them back what they had lost at the hands of this Government. Now, Mr. Speaker, in 1826 President Adams sent a message to the Senate of the United States in which he set forth all the facts in relation to these claims, and if my friend from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] will get that message and read it carefully he will find everything contained therein to show what transpired between the French Government and our Government. Prior to that time three adverse reports had been made against the payment of any of these claims; but after Mr. Adams, on May 20, 1826, placed the correspondence between the United States Government and France before the Senate in the message, from that time up to 1895 not a solitary adverse report has been made to the Senate or House of the United States against these claims. The Congress of the United States since 1826 have made 53 reports, both in the House and Senate, and every one of them urging in the strongest terms the payment of these spoliation claims. The following favorable reports have been made:

There is probably no subject submitted to Congress since the organization of the Government under the Constitution, in 1798, which has been so fully and thoroughly investigated by committees of the two Houses as the present. Every essential fact having a bearing on the question, and every consideration of the international law, combined with a full development of the proceedings of both the French and American Governments in this regard, with an exposition of our diplomacy and numerous treaties, all, in the judgment of this committee, evincing conclusively the equity of these claims, have, from time to time, been laid before Congress.

In the House of Representatives there have been presented no less than 14 reports, as follows:

No.	Session.	Congress.	By whom presented.	Committee.
1	Second	Seventh	Mr. Giles	Select.
2	do	Ninth	Mr. Marion	Do.
3	First	Seventeenth	Mr. Russell	Foreign Affairs.

In the Senate the subject has undergone an investigation by the committees thereof in a manner equally elaborate, and reports have from time to time been submitted to this body, as follows:

No.	Session.	Congress.	By whom presented.	Committee.
1	First	Fifteenth	Mr. Roberts	Claims.
2	Second	Nineteenth	Mr. Holmes	Select.

It is a remarkable fact that there has not been a report adverse to these claims in either House of Congress since the President laid before the Senate, by message of May 20, 1826, the correspondence between the United States and France relative to these claims. Prior to that disclosure three adverse reports were made, to wit, one in the Senate by Mr. Roberts, from the Committee on Claims, in 1818, and two in the House of Representatives, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs—the first by Mr. Russell in 1822, and the other by Mr. Forsyth in 1814—all of which were far from being positive in opposition to their justice.

The papers communicated by the President in his message of the 20th of May, 1826, poured a flood of light on the subject; and since then every committee having the matter in charge has been constrained to come to the conclusion that these claims are just and equitable.

This committee can only account for the unexampled delay which (in face of expositions of great cogency by some of the most accomplished jurists and statesmen that have occupied seats in this Chamber) has occurred by the magnitude of the claims, and the large draft which their allowance would make on the Treasury of the United States. It would be difficult to find anywhere a more striking illustration of the truth of the axiom that delay is a denial of justice.—Senate Committee Report No. 44, first session Thirty-first Congress.

Your committee add the following list of favorable reports made since 1850:

Now, I want to read just briefly, but I do not want to weary the House by reading. I find that Marshall, the great Chief Justice; Madison, Pickering, Clay, Clinton, Livingston, Everett, Webster, Cushing, Sumner, and many other distinguished statesmen known to American history favored and made speeches in the Senate of the United States in favor of these very claims and acknowledged their validity. If my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will turn to Senate Document 102 he will find the reasons Mr. Webster assigned why these claims should be paid. It covers half a page, and it is too long for me to read. He puts it on the ground that these claims were just claims of the people of the United States against the French Government, and absolutely without the consent of the claimants the United States used them in payment of what they owed the French Government.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Read what Mr. Webster said.

Mr. MAHON. Gentlemen ask that I read to the House what Mr. Webster said. If the House will bear with me I will read it:

Mr. Webster, in his celebrated speech on granting indemnity to American citizens for French spoliations on American commerce prior to 1800, in the Senate of the United States January 12, 1835, says:

"A letter appeared in a newspaper published at Albany, N. Y., in which I was charged with having a direct personal interest in these claims. The assertion, like many others which I have not felt it to be my duty to take any notice of, was wholly and entirely false and malicious. I have not the slightest interest in these claims, or any one of them. I have never been conferred with or retained by anyone, or spoken to as counsel for one of them in the course of my life. No member of the Senate is more entirely free from any connection with these claims than I am. The question, sir, involved in these cases is essentially a judicial question. It is not a question of public policy, but a question of private right—a question between the Government and the petitioners. And, as the Government is to be the judge of its own case, it would seem to be the duty of the Government to examine the subject with the utmost good faith and the most solicitous desire to do justice."

And in same speech Mr. Webster, commenting upon the statement made by Mr. Clay as Secretary of State, in May, 1826, in transmitting Document 102 to the Senate, delivered the following remarks:

"Before the interference of our Government with these claims, they constituted just demands against the Government of France. They were not vague expectations of possible future indemnity for injuries received, too uncertain to be regarded as valuable or to be esteemed property. They were just demands, and, as such, they were property. The courts of law took notice of them as property. They were capable of being devised, of being distributed among heirs and next of kin, and of being transferred and assigned, like other legal and just debts. A claim or demand for a ship unjustly seized and confiscated is property as clearly as the ship itself. It may not be so valuable or so certain, but it is as clear a right, and has been uniformly so regarded by the courts of law.

"The papers show American citizens had claims against the French Government for 615 vessels unlawfully seized and confiscated. If this were so, it is difficult to see how the Government of the United States can release these claims for its own benefit with any more propriety than it could have applied the money to its own use if the French Government had been ready to make compensation in money for the property thus illegally seized and confiscated; or how the Government could appropriate to itself the just claims which the owners of these 615 vessels held against the wrongdoers, without making compensation, any more than it could appropriate to itself, without making compensation, 615 ships which had not been seized. I do not mean to say that the rate of compensation should be the same in both cases; I do not mean to say that a claim for a ship is of as much value as a ship; but I mean to say that both the one and the other are property, and that Government can not, with justice, deprive a man of either for its own benefit, without making a fair compensation.

"It will be perceived at once, sir, that these claims do not rest on the ground of any neglect or omission, on the part of the Government of the United States, in demanding satisfaction from France. That is not the ground. The Government of the United States, in that respect, performed its full duty. It remonstrated against these illegal seizures; it insisted on redress; it sent two special missions to France charged expressly, among other duties, with the duty of demanding indemnity. But France had her subjects of complaint also against the Government of the United State, which she pressed with equal earnestness and confidence, and which she would neither postpone nor relinquish, except on the condition that the United States would postpone or relinquish these claims. And, to meet this condition and to restore harmony between the two nations, the United States did agree first to postpone and afterwards to relinquish these claims of its own citizens. In other words, the Government of the United States bought off the claims of France against itself by discharging claims of our own citizens against France."

As Webster puts it is the whole question in a nutshell.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman state what he is reading from?

Mr. MAHON. Senate Document 102.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Now, the gentleman has read the speech of Webster; will he now point out the section of the treaty under which the United States discharged these claims?

Mr. MAHON. I refer the gentleman to history on this matter. I have not the time to cite it to him. He has an hour.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The gentleman can not find it during the course of this debate.

Mr. MAHON. The gentleman can get Senate Document 102, and all the papers transmitted by President Adams, and you will get the whole history.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Do you think that Mr. Webster did not tell the truth about it?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I am not speaking about the truthfulness of the statement. I think the gentleman is mistaken in his conclusions.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. He has read from the speech of Daniel Webster.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I understand that, and I ask him to point out the section of the treaty.

Mr. MAHON. Now, Mr. Speaker, it has been urged by some that these are stale claims. Old they are, but not stale. They are not unjust simply because the Government of the United States has refused to pay these claims that she ought to have paid long ago. Since 1800 these people have been thundering at the doors of the Departments of this Government and Congress for the payment of their claims. Now, Mr. Speaker, up to 1885——

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman allow me a question? I stepped out while he was reading the speech of Daniel Webster, who favored the payment of these claims. Does the gentleman know why it was that his colleagues did not vote with him to pay these claims?

Mr. MAHON. Because they were men who in private life would pay the last dollar of their debts, even to the selling of the shirts off their backs, but when it comes to the question of the United States, are willing to rob the private citizen. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HOPKINS. Oh, no. Does not the gentleman know right there that it was disputed by leading Senators that these claims were just?

Mr. MAHON. I do not care what leading Senators might think about it. These were just claims against the Government of the United States.

Mr. HOPKINS. Does he not know that those gentlemen considered that it was just a speculation, and for that reason they were disallowed?

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Illinois will allow me——

The SPEAKER. One moment. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has the floor.

Mr. MAHON. Notwithstanding the fact that John Marshall, the great Chief Justice of the United States, approved these claims, notwithstanding the fact that some of the most brilliant jurists of this country approved them, notwithstanding the fact that after long and severe legal contests the courts one after another declared that these were just claims of our people against the French Government, and that they had been used by this Government to liquidate claims which France had made against it—notwithstanding all this, up to 1885 Congress failed to take any action for the settlement of these claims.

Mr. GROUT. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will yield to me for a moment, I will make a brief statement of historic facts for the information of the House, and especially in reply to the gentleman from Nebraska, who asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] awhile ago to point out a place in the treaty where these claims were involved. These French spoliation claims arose, as gentlemen will remember, prior to 1800. They rose out of the Napoleonic wars, the wars of France under the Republic, the Directory, and in part the Consulate. The Government of the United States called on our merchants to send in statements of their losses. They did so, and a claim for them was presented by our Government to France. Our commissioners went over once on that errand, but the French Government would not receive them at all. They went a second time, and finally they were received, and what is called a convention was entered into. As soon as the convention met the representatives of the French Republic presented claims against the United States for a breach of the treaties of 1778.

What were those treaties? One was the treaty of amity and commerce, by which certain commercial privileges were to be given to the French, they agreeing to give us like privileges in their ports; but the principal treaty under which the French claims were made was the treaty of alliance, so called, by which France agreed to come and help us in the war of the Revolution, as she did, and by which we agreed in return to guarantee and defend the French possessions in America—the West India Islands. Now, remember this was in 1778, and when the wars of the French Republic arose, about 1793, Great Britain made for the West India Islands and France called on the United States Government to protect and defend them for her according to our promise in the treaty of 1778. I have the document here, but it would take an hour to read what I am stating in substance, and therefore I prefer to make this brief statement. I say France called upon the United States to defend her possessions in America. The United States never lifted a finger to do it. One of the French ministers to this country made a great fuss about it and was finally sent home, because he became somewhat uncivil in his complaints on account of the failure of our Government to carry out its treaty obligations.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Honest men are apt to become uncivil when injustice is done.

Mr. GROUT. Yes, and that is what ailed the French minister then.

But to resume my statement. When our commissioners presented the claims of our merchants for the destruction of our vessels and cargoes the French Government presented its claim for failure of our treaty obligations. In Article II of the treaty of 1800 it was at last agreed that the claims of the two Governments should be postponed till a more convenient time, and Bonaparte, First Consul, in the name of the French people, consented on the 31st day of July, 1801, "to accept, ratify, and confirm the above convention, with the addition importing that the convention shall be in force for the space of eight years, and with the retrenchment of the second article: Provided, That by this retrenchment the two States renounce the respective pretensions which are the object of the said article." This is the vital point in the treaty relating to these claims, namely, that "the two States renounce the respective pretensions which are the object of said article."

The Senate ratified this proposition of Napoleon, and it became the treaty, and that is how these claims of our citizens were used by the Government in settlement of a claim by the French Government of a claim against the United States, and the United States have not settled with the claimants; and this, briefly, is the ground on which these claims rest. These claims thus collected of France have never been paid to the claimants, though it is true that in 1819, when we bought Florida of Spain, we deducted $5,000,000 from the purchase money for such of these claims as arose from condemnations in Spanish courts. But these in this bill are for vessels and cargoes condemned in French courts.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Does not the gentleman know that that second article was not in the treaty at all as finally made and ratified?

Mr. GROUT. That is right; the second article, which provided for an indefinite postponement of the matter, was rejected, and in the language of Napoleon, "The two States renounced their respective pretensions which are the object of the said article." In other words, the United States gave up the claims of her merchants, and France gave up her claim against the United States for breach of the treaties of 1778. They quit even. No one well informed can for a moment claim but that the merchants' claims were used to settle the claim of France against the United States for the broken treaties of 1778.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I can not yield further. There can not be any controversy that the United States openly and flagrantly violated its treaty with France. I will give the gentleman from Nebraska my memoranda, by which he will be able to find the Louisiana treaty and the other documents bearing upon this question. As I was saying when interrupted, Mr. Speaker, the contention about these claims went on up to 1885——

Mr. KEM. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that there is no quorum present. We ought to have a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DINGLEY). The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] has the floor.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. KEM. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania can not be taken from the floor by anything but a point of order directed against words uttered by him and a refusal of the House to allow him to proceed.

Mr. KEM. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has the floor, and will proceed.

Mr. MAHON. As I said before, the best jurists, the ablest statesmen of this country and of France, all or nearly all, were in full accord as to the justice of these claims; and in the House of Representatives it was openly declared that these claimants were entitled to compensation from our Government, but like all other claims of private citizens, these were deferred from day to day and from year to year, and up to 1885 were still unadjudicated. In that year the justice of these claims was admitted by the Congress of the United States, and it referred the claimants to the Court of Claims, telling them to go there and establish their rights; in other words, to show that their fathers, or their grandfathers, or somebody from whom they inherited, had lost a vessel or vessels by destruction at the hands of the French, and to show the value of the property. Congress, I say, under the act of 1885, sent these claimants to the Court of Claims and thereby put out of its own hands forever the right to investigate them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Court of Claims did investigate; and the Fiftieth Congress (if I am not mistaken as to the date), recognizing the justice and righteousness of these claims, paid $1,300,000 upon account of them. I say that if previously there had been any controversy as to the obligation of the Government to pay these claims—if prior to that time there had been any room for such a quibble as that with which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has undertaken to puzzle this House—all such controversies and quibbles disappeared at that time when Congress, by the payment of over a million dollars on account of these claims, recognized in a way that can not be escaped the legality and justice of these claims. If Congress at that time paid $1,300,000 on account of these claims, upon what ground can we refuse now to pay this amount of $1,027,000 upon claims which have since been adjudicated by the Court of Claims? Mr. Speaker, that is all I have to say on the spoliation claims.

Now I want to refer to the claims arising under the Bowman Act. I do not know whether the gentleman from Illinois has read the debate which took place when that act was passed; but I want to refer to that debate and the reasons that compelled—I say compelled—Congress to pass the act. The committee rooms of the House and Senate were crowded with claims running into the thousands and the millions. Congress could not in its business hours, through its committees, investigate these claims. Hence it passed what was known as the Bowman Act, referring to the Court of Claims these various claims—for what purpose? For the purpose of ascertaining certain things.

The first question to be considered by the court under that act was the question, Was the claimant loyal? That was a jurisdictional fact which the court must find. If found against the claimant, that was the end of the case. If the claimant was found to be a loyal man, the question was, Did he furnish stores or supplies to the Army of the United States? And the next question was, What were those stores and supplies worth at the time they were furnished? Those were the three things which Congress could not properly investigate, and which it wanted the court to investigate. In the case now presented, the court, after long and careful examination, has found that the claimant is loyal, that he furnished stores and supplies which were used by the Army of the United States, and that those stores and supplies were worth a certain amount of money. This finding, I say, is conclusive upon Congress as to those three facts. The Supreme Court of the United States may render judgment for a million dollars against this Government in favor of you or myself; yet it can not be enforced unless the Congress of the United States sees fit to appropriate money to pay that judgment. The money or property of the United States can not be taken by attachment or execution. This Congress is the last resort. If there has been a judgment, whether a mere finding of fact or a final judgment, the parties must come here to get their money.

Now, sir, in the Bessemer Case, 93 United States, May, 1865, the Supreme Court of the United States was asked to review a finding of fact by the Court of Claims; and the Supreme Court held that "the Court of Claims has furnished the facts we are to consider; and we can not look beyond them. For the purposes of this case they import absolute verity." The finding of the Court of Claims, according to this decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, is conclusive upon both parties. If a claimant demands $600,000 and the Court of Claims allows him but $50,000, that is conclusive upon him and upon the Government.

What is the Government of the United States except the legislative, executive, and judicial departments? I say that when the courts that have been created to ascertain the facts with regard to these claims have made their finding, it is binding upon the Congress of the United States; and we can do but two things: Either pay the amount found due or repudiate debts owing to private citizens of the United States.

Now, must Congress go into the merits of these cases? I was asked by the gentleman from Illinois whether I had examined these claims. Sir, I got a copy of this amendment from the Journal Clerk yesterday afternoon in less than three minutes after the committee had made their report to this House. I spent nearly all the hours of last night in examining the amendment, and I want to say that every claim therein contained coming under the Bowman Act was before the Committee on War Claims of this House, and no claim could be favorably reported by that committee that had not been examined by the Court of Claims. I wish to say that every claim in this amendment has been favorably reported by the War Claims Committee of this House, and the bills which they have reported are on the Calendar. If the business of this House were run in accordance with the rules the omnibus bills providing for these claims would have been considered four months ago, because it is near the head of the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, a Calendar which the House has neglected, because it has squandered its time in consideration of cases brought up by unanimous consent.

Mr. WILLIS. Have these bills been before the Court of Claims?

Mr. MAHON. Every one of them. There is not a bill in the amendment—no spoliation claim and no claim under the Bowman Act—that has not been carefully scrutinized by the Court of Claims.

A MEMBER. You mean the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MAHON. No; I mean the Court of Claims. We excluded every claim that had not been thus examined. The spoliation claims in this bill, amounting to $1,027,314.09, have all been before the Court of Claims and found honestly and justly due. The claims under the Bowman Act, amounting to $587,956.75, have also been before the Court of Claims.

The Chouteau claim, a claim for the construction of a gunboat, was also before the Court of Claims, and the court found that these parties were entitled to $174,445.75. It is true that the court, after finding these facts, held that it had no jurisdiction of the case; but nevertheless, in order to give the claimants a fair hearing, they reported it to Congress. If gentlemen will refer to the records of the court they will find that what I state is true.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman does not claim that the court had any jurisdiction to try that case judicially and render judgment?

Mr. MAHON. No; they simply found the facts.

Mr. CANNON. And reported them back for the consideration of Congress?

Mr. MAHON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. In other words, the Court of Claims under the law acted in the same capacity that a committee of Congress would act.

Mr. MAHON. Yes, sir. I want to be honest in this matter. This claim, which received a long and tedious examination at the hands of the court, was confronted by the Attorney-General of the United States with the plea of want of jurisdiction. Still the court, after having taken all this testimony, and in view of the fact that the plaintiffs had been subjected to this long and expensive litigation, found as an absolute fact that the amount was due these people, but stated that they would have to go to the Congress of the United States and present their bill for that sum—an indebtedness which did not arise under the Bowman Act.

Mr. LEWIS. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Supreme Court held, in the opinion to which he has referred, that the finding of facts by the Court of Claims, under the circumstances suggested, was conclusive and binding?

Mr. MAHON. It found that the finding of the court was an absolute verity; and why? Because it was a competent court, created to do certain things, namely, to find the facts as to whether the claims were just and ought to be paid.

Mr. LEWIS. Did they not hold that it was binding on the Supreme Court itself?

Mr. MAHON. The court held that it was binding on the Government, because it bound the claimant, and therefore bound the Government. Now, this Government is composed of the legislative, executive, and judicial branches. If it is binding upon one, it is binding upon all; and in all good conscience when your court so decides are you not bound by it? You are not bound to pay; I admit that. You are not bound to pay, even if the court held that you owed the debt to these people; and the gentleman will not deny that they do owe the debt. The only thing, however, if you refuse to pay, is to absolutely repudiate your obligations to the honest creditor of the Government. That is the only course left open to you. Are you willing to assume that course? The plea that the Treasury is empty has been used against these unfortunate people in the years gone by to prevent payment. "Let us not pay them, because the Treasury is not able to pay them at this time," has been the cry for all these years.

But, Mr. Speaker, that plea has no force. We can remedy it very easily. We can make, for instance, our river and harbor bill $50,000,000 instead of seventy-four million. We can do with one war vessel less. I claim that you had better pay the honest debts of the Government than to make expenditures that are not absolutely necessary at the present time. Pay the honest debts and curtail the expenditures of the Government. Why, I could, at this very session of Congress, if I had the power, take enough money, without hurting the public service, out of the general appropriation bills to pay every war claim and every spoliation claim and every Indian depredation claim in twenty-four hours, and adjourn Congress without making the appropriation bills larger by a single penny.

Yes, we appropriated for war ships, and I voted for it. I voted for the river and harbor bill, too. I am not excusing myself; I am not accusing any other man. I am willing to go to the people of this country—the great mass of the people—with the record that has been made in that respect. I am willing to make the Navy of the United States such as will command the respect not only of the greatest government on this earth but of the combined forces of all the world. This Government is great enough and rich enough to do that, so I do not excuse my vote on war ships or on the river and harbor bill.

They talk of poverty! Why, do you not know that this country is richer to-day than ever before in the history of the country?

A MEMBER. And richer than any other country on earth.

Mr. MAHON. Richer than any other country. We went into the war of 1860 and spent four years in a bloody contest, and the Government lost the business of the eleven Confederate States; we paid the expenses of the largest army of the world, and by so doing we accumulated an enormous war debt, and yet the business of this country went on, the prosperity of the country continued; and from 1865 up to 1892 this Government paid two-thirds of that enormous debt, as well as meeting all of the current expenses of the Government, and yet people talk of being poor. If the Treasury of the United States is in trouble to-day, it is not because the Government is not rich and mighty and powerful, but because of the blundering of statesmen of past Congresses and of the gentleman who sits at the other end of the Avenue. [Applause.]

Now, gentlemen, you claim that we have reserved the right to review the findings of the court. If that be true, the passage of the Bowman Act was the sheerest nonsense. What possible object could you have in sending a claim to a court of this kind that would have no more power than one of the committees of the House? It is not worth the expense of keeping it up. Why were the courts established? Simply because it was absolutely impossible for Congress to go into the full investigation of these matters as they ought to be investigated, and therefore you transferred that duty to a court.

If the contention of the gentleman from Illinois is right, that the House should go into an investigation of all these claims, and he holds up as a bugaboo that there are 700 claims in this amendment of the Senate—yes, there are 700 claims; and it is a living, crying shame to-day that the Government of the United States has not paid them before. Each one has been adjudicated honestly and fairly; but if you are to examine them in detail, then abolish your court. If Congress is to deal with the subject solely and alone, let us get rid of the expense of maintaining the court. What possible value is it? And the time has come in the history of this Government when Congress should either pay the findings of the Court of Claims or abolish the court altogether, repeal the Bowman Act, and the Tucker Act, and the act sending the spoliation claims to that court for adjudication.

Why, Mr. Speaker, here are thousands of dollars in these claims that have been investigated. I know of many men in this country who believed that the law would be observed when the claims were investigated and adjudicated by this court. I know of one man with a claim of $1,100. Having faith in the Government and the representatives of the people, he spent $800, mortgaged his little home, in order to get a verdict from court, which found eleven hundred dollars in his favor, and he has been knocking at the doors of Congress for three or four years trying to get the little pittance due him.

Now, in his old age, 85 years, with the poorhouse staring him in the face, the Congress of the United States, in which he trusted, refuses to make the appropriation to pay his claim and keep him out of the almshouse. You serve on the War Claims Committee, and see the unfortunate men and women who are going down into the decline of life, with white hair upon their heads, appealing and knocking at the door of this committee for the just recognition of their claims, and I tell you, if you were approached by these people who come to this Capitol endeavoring to get simply their just dues, it would touch you and cause you to vote for this bill. Now, the statement was made here, when we had a war claim up a few weeks ago, that there were $400,000,000 of war claims pending before the Court of Claims. That statement was made in a message by President Harrison, I believe. It was made under a misunderstanding of the facts. The Attorney-General of the United States at once proceeded to investigate and ascertain what the fact was. In his report of 1894 he says:

> Since my last report there has been completed a detailed examination of all the cases pending under the Bowman Act, something over 7,000 in number, in order to distinguish from others those which are to be classed as war claims, defined as those "growing directly or indirectly out of the late war for the suppression of the rebellion." I am now able to report, as a result of such detailed examination, that up to the present time 9,182 claims of this description have been referred by Congress to the Court of Claims, the aggregate whereof is about $36,000,000. Of these, about 2,177 cases have been disposed of, aggregating on the face of the claims the sum of $16,184,000—the amount found due by the court thereon aggregating $2,344,000.
> There remain pending in the court 6,985 claims of this character, which aggregate upon their face about $21,500,000. In addition to the foregoing, suits are pending within either the general jurisdiction or jurisdiction conferred by special acts of Congress, based upon claims either directly or indirectly growing out of the said war, the aggregate whereof, as stated by the petitions, is about the sum of $2,600,000, thus making the total amount of war claims pending in both jurisdictions about $24,100,000, instead of the $400,000,000 stated to be pending in reports of my predecessor, presented in 1890 and 1892, and in the message of President Harrison to the second session of the Fifty-second Congress.

Mr. Speaker, that great bugaboo, that great bogie man, that has been running around through this House to frighten members, that statement about $400,000,000 of war claims under the Bowman and Tucker and 4th of July acts, is cut down to $24,000,000.

Mr. Speaker, how many of these claims will the Court of Claims allow? I want to say to this House that the pick and choice of all these claims have been passed upon long ago. After careful investigation, by the help of the officers of the Court of Claims, I find that during the last thirty-two years, of all the claims presented to the Court of Claims since the court had jurisdiction over them, only 8¼ per cent were paid, and the balance rejected. I will tell you the reason why. It was because the claimants failed to prove their loyalty, which was a jurisdictional fact, and they were kicked out of court, and that was the end of it. Now, during the past thirty-two years, if only that small percentage has been paid, it is safe for this House to presume that there will not be over 5 per cent of the claims allowed which are still pending.

Mr. WILLIS. What amount is carried in these claims that have been placed upon the bill by the Senate?

Mr. MAHON. About $1,800,000. I went to the trouble to ascertain all the claims that have been paid since 1865, and I ask the attention of the House to this matter, because this statement has been made to frighten people, and perhaps persuade them not to vote for these bills. I have examined with great care and with the help of a gentleman who is an expert, and these figures which I now read are correct to a penny. Claims for quartermaster stores furnished the Army of the United States by loyal citizens residing in the loyal States to the amount of $6,010,425.43 have been approved by the Quartermaster-General and paid to citizens of the several States by Congress under the terms of the act of July 4, 1864.

Claims for commissary supplies furnished the Army of the United States by loyal citizens residing in the loyal States to the amount of $429,552.87 have been approved by the Commissary-General and paid to citizens of the several States under the provisions of the act of July 4, 1864.

Claims for the use and occupation of church and school buildings by the Army during the late war to the number of 234 were filed in the office of the Quartermaster-General of the Army under the terms of the act of July 4, 1864. Ninety-seven of these, aggregating $102,270.29, have been paid or recommended for payment, in whole or in part, and 137 claims, aggregating $247,797.38, have been disallowed or not paid.

Claims for stores and supplies furnished the Army and the Navy of the United States by loyal citizens residing in States declared in rebellion to the amount of $4,636,920.69 have been approved by the Southern Claims Commission and paid by Congress to citizens of the several States under the terms of the act approved March 3, 1871, and acts amendatory thereof.

Claims arising under the terms of the Bowman Act have been recommended for payment by the court, and Congress has paid to citizens of the several States $751,027.41.

Congress has appropriated the following amounts to pay claims allowed under the provisions of the Bowman Act, to wit:

Forty-ninth Congress	$8,627.98
Fiftieth Congress	119,510.75
Fifty-first Congress	573,763.30
Fifty-second Congress	597.00
Fifty-third Congress	48,528.38
Total	751,027.41

Claims arising under the terms of the Tucker Act have been approved by the court and paid by Congress to the amount of $4,595. The total amount paid under these acts is $11,934,721.69.

The total amount paid since the war closed under all acts for claims growing out of the war amounts to a little over $11,000,000, or less than you spend in one year on your rivers and harbors, less than you spend in building and equipping two men of war.

Mr. Speaker, these are the facts, and still these gentlemen will come in here and undertake to convince this Congress that these claims will swamp the Government of the United States if we open the door to pay these people what we owe them.

Mr. Speaker, in closing, I want to state, as I did before, that I have no personal interest in this business. I have endeavored all my life to pay every man whom I have owed, and I propose, as a member of this Congress, as long as I remain a member, to vote to pay every citizen of this country every dollar that I believe is honestly and justly due, and that has been found to be due by the courts created by this body, and I am willing to defer other appropriations until these unfortunate people are paid. I hope this House will adopt this amendment and pay these people. It is the only way that they can get before this body, as I said before, and in order that a vote can be had, the Senate put this amendment on this appropriation bill.

I want to say to gentlemen of this House who are interested in these people, who come from all your States, you will find them in every condition of life. If you vote against this amendment, do not come to this Congress afterwards and complain that the leaders of the House have not given you a fair opportunity, a fair hearing, and a fair chance to have a vote on this matter. No obstruction is placed in your way. Here is a question that has been casting a shadow over Congress for years past. You are now confronting it face to face. If you want to pay your people the just debts that this Government owes to them, if you want to sustain the hands of this Government, and to do what is right between man and man and enforce justice and equity, vote for this amendment. It is the only chance you will have. If you depend upon the House to act on this matter, the House, under the rules, will not allow you to get it before the House. I am not as sensitive as some of my friends may be. As chairman of the Committee on War Claims I am perfectly willing to take this chance to have these claims passed. That committee will never get a bill passed through this House unless we do it as we are doing. If we desire to do justice to these claimants, we can stand this $1,800,000.

Why, Mr. Speaker, if this thing goes on, this country will become the greatest robber on the face of the earth, taking the property of her own people and using it for her own purposes and then refusing payment. What would you say of a neighbor who emptied your corncrib to feed his own stock and then refused to pay for it? An honest man will pay his debts, even if it takes the coat off his back, and an honest government, through its representatives, will pay the people it owes, even if it hurts, and even if it has to borrow money or issue bonds to pay them. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas is recognized in his own right for an hour.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I will yield of my time ten minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], and five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. The rest of the time I will use myself.

Mr. CANNON. Before the gentleman begins, I hope to be able—and that is the reason I wanted five minutes, if the gentleman has it to spare—at the end of the time the gentleman yields, to move the previous question and get a vote.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman's time is yielded last. It is the understanding, then, that the other gentlemen shall speak first. If I can have order in the House I would be glad.

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to occupy a very large portion of the time of the House, and will go directly to the proposition under consideration. It is strange, it is passing strange, that four classes of claims shall be grouped together in one amendment. In the pending proposition we find these four classes, all different from one another, sandwiched together, and attached to the bill as a single item. Upon the authority of a distinguished Senator, one of long experience in the matter of appropriations, I assert that this is the first time in the history of general deficiency bills that we have findings under the Bowman Act put upon that bill.

Now, why is it, Mr. Speaker, that these different kinds of claims are grouped together in a single amendment? If they are as meritorious as they are said to be by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] and by other members upon this floor, whence the necessity of incorporating them, aggregating more than $1,700,000, in one proposition? It was because, Mr. Speaker, these claims could not stand upon their individual merit. Each must have support from the others in order to pass the House.

For the information of members I will read them:

French spoliation claims	$1,027,314.09
Bowman Act war claims	548,022.54
Charles P. Chouteau claim	174,445.75
Claims of E. N. Fish and others	11,214.28
Total	1,761,896.66

I believe the last-mentioned claims have grown out of Indian transactions, and that the Chouteau claim is a relic of the late war, but not what is technically known as a war claim.

Mr. MAHON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. MAHON. The reason why they have been put as an amendment upon this deficiency bill was because during the past year it has been known that this House would not give them any consideration under the rules.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman assumes to speak as to the motive of the Senate in consolidating these different classes of claims. I can only look for its motives to the records of that body, and upon examination I find no expression that would justify the explanation of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. But why put all these claims into one amendment, so different from one another? It was for the purpose, Mr. Speaker, of getting the votes of the friends of each class in support of the other three classes, and in that way carry the measure through this House. What do we know about the claim of $174,445.75 due Charles P. Chouteau? Can any gentleman upon this floor explain it?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I know this, that it has been rejected by several Congresses.

Mr. SAYERS. About all we know of this claim is that it has been heretofore rejected; and so have the other claims been rejected by several Congresses.

But I wish to reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] in regard to the French spoliation claims. These claims have been argued again and again in this House. The first acquaintance I had with them was during the Fiftieth Congress when Mr. Burnes of Missouri had charge of the deficiency bill, and during the Fifty-first Congress, when the distinguished gentleman from Iowa, Mr. HENDERSON, was in charge. We have been told by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] that because of the fact that the Government of the United States yielded up the just demands of its citizens to the French Government, therefore our Government became liable for the payment of these claims. That was the ground, and the sole ground, on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] and the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] based their arguments for the payment of these claims. Let us turn to the proceedings of the Fiftieth Congress. Mr. McComas of Maryland, then an able Representative, and now a distinguished member of the judicial bench of this District, was urging the payment of these claims. When the proposition was under discussion in the Fiftieth Congress, Mr. McComas said in reference to them:

> The question, in my opinion, is whether war existed between the years 1794 and 1801 between the United States and France. If there was war, I think that is an end of these claims.

The issue upon which the validity of these claims must rest was plain. Did war exist between France and the United States between the years 1794 and 1801 was the question and the only question. Now, how are we to ascertain whether there was war or not one hundred years ago or thereabouts? To what better authority than to the official records of our country and to the opinions of our Supreme Court can we appeal? I have before me a copy of a letter by the Attorney-General of the United States, dated August 21, 1798, in the very midst of the troubles of that time; written not fifty or a hundred years later, but at the very time, and addressed to the then Secretary of State. In this letter, dated, as I have said, on the 21st of August, 1798, he says:

> SIR: Having taken into consideration the acts of the French Republic relative to the United States and the laws of Congress passed at the last session, it is my opinion that there exists not only an active maritime war between France and the United States, but a maritime war authorized by both nations. Consequently France is our enemy; and to aid, assist, and abet that nation in her maritime warfare will be treason in a citizen or any other person within the United States not commissioned under France; but in a French subject, commissioned by France, acting openly, according to his commission, such assistance will be hostility. The former may be tried and punished according to our laws; the latter must be treated according to the laws of war. I have thought it my duty to make this communication in consequence of the information you received from Rhode Island of the intentions of a Frenchman, whose name I do not now call to mind, who is said to be somewhere in this country on the business of buying ships and military supplies for the West Indies. He should be apprehended and tried as a traitor, unless he has a commission and acts according to it, in which case he should be treated as an enemy and confined as a prisoner of war.
> I have the honor to be, etc.,
> CHARLES LEE.
> To the SECRETARY OF STATE.

Mr. Speaker, this letter furnishes the reason why France would not acknowledge the justice of these claims against that Government. It was because, and only because, they originated in actual warfare.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Do any of our standard historians give any account of such a war as that which the gentleman is talking about?

Mr. SAYERS. Ah, Mr. Speaker, is not the official opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States, written at the very time when all these things were transpiring, history? Is it not better than ordinary history? The historian oftentimes writes years and years after the events and occurrences which he narrates have transpired, but here we find the Attorney-General of the United States, at the very time, in an official communication to the Secretary of State, declaring that war did exist between the two Governments. But is that all? If gentlemen will turn to the opinion of the Supreme Court—perhaps they will say that is not history—in the case of Bas vs. Tingy, delivered at the August term in 1800, they will find that court stating emphatically that we were then in a condition of war with France—during the very time stated in the communication of the Attorney-General to the Secretary of State, which I have already read.

Mr. ADAMS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMS. Had Congress declared war?

Mr. SAYERS. There may be war without a declaration by Congress.

Mr. ADAMS. Had Congress declared war?

Mr. SAYERS. Not at all; but may there not be war without a declaration by Congress?

Mr. ADAMS. Nothing in the treaty of 1800 showed a state of war existing. On the contrary, both nations denied it.

Mr. SAYERS. I take it the gentleman is a lawyer, is he not?

Mr. ADAMS. I am, sir; but I am sorry to say not a very good one.

Mr. SAYERS. Will not the gentleman then abide the decision of the Supreme Court, the highest judicial tribunal of the land, upon the question whether there was then actual war or not?

Mr. ADAMS. Let me answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. SAYERS. I will hand the book to the gentleman and he can read it.

Mr. ADAMS. I will answer the gentleman's question. The decisions of the Supreme Court, so far as they relate to this country, are of course paramount, but when you come to treaties between sovereign nations, the decisions of the Supreme Court are not binding upon questions of international law. Therefore, when two nations make a treaty——

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman is wandering into a dissertation upon international jurisprudence.

Mr. ADAMS. If the gentleman will permit me to answer his question——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] yield further.

Mr. SAYERS. I decline to yield further.

Mr. ADAMS. If the gentleman, after asking a question, will not permit me to answer, all right.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman must be contented with the time he has already had.

Mr. ADAMS. The gentleman finds he is wrong, and backs out.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I venture the assertion that no treaty stipulation can be shown by which the United States released to France the claims of its citizens. But independently of any treaty stipulation between the two Governments as to the payment of these claims, the main proposition is—and it is a controlling one—that the French Government was not responsible for the payment of these claims growing out of a state of war. If the proposition with reference to damages incurred and property destroyed in time of war be not admitted, then all the property destroyed in the South during the late war must be paid for. If the French Republic was responsible to the owners of these vessels for the destruction of their property while these hostilities existed, then the Government of the United States is responsible to every Southern man that lost property at the hands of the Union soldiery during the late war. If one proposition be good, the other necessarily follows.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. If these claims were not valid against the French Government, why did the French Government pay valid claims for the relinquishment of these?

Mr. SAYERS. I do not understand that the French Government did pay any valid claims in order that it might be released from the payment of other claims. The French Government and the Government of the United States were in a state of war. There were misunderstandings on both sides. The Government of France was involved in war not only with England but with Europe, and was anxious to make peace. The Government of the United States, recognizing the fact that France had been our ally during the Revolution, when we were weak and in our infancy, was also desirous for peace; and in that way peace was brought about.

Now, let me have the attention of my friend from Pennsylvania for a moment. I have in my hand a volume of the Supreme Court Reports, 4 Dallas. Here is what the court says in regard to the existence of war at that time:

> Now, if this be the true definition of war, let us see what was the situation of the United States in relation to France.

Mr. ADAMS. Read the definition.

Mr. SAYERS (reading)—

> In March, 1799, Congress had raised an army, stopped all intercourse with France, dissolved our treaty, built and equipped ships of war and commissioned private armed ships, enjoining the former and authorizing the latter to defend themselves against the armed ships of France, to attack them on the high seas, to subdue and take them as prize, and to recapture armed vessels found in their possession. Here, then, let me ask, what were the technical characters of an American and French armed vessel, combating on the high seas, with a view the one to subdue the other and to make prize of his property? They certainly were not friends, because there was a contention by force; nor were they private enemies, because the contention was external and authorized by the legitimate authority of the two Governments. If they were not our enemies, I know not what constitutes an enemy.

Here, Mr. Speaker, we have the reason why these claims have not been paid. The Congress of the United States settled all the Revolutionary claims many years ago. The Congress of the United States assumed the payment of the debts of the different States. Congress met every year to legislate upon the affairs of the people, and yet while the participants in the Revolution were still alive and while the men who were actually present and took prominent part in that great struggle were acting as Representatives in the Halls of Congress these claims were refused payment. These Senators and Representatives were entirely familar with all the facts involved. They, it is to be presumed, were honest and patriotic. Why, Mr. Speaker, did they not provide for the liquidation of these claims?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is not Congress—and I speak now collectively, of course—are we not great men and wise men and patriotic men——

Mr. SAYERS. I will answer the gentleman by a question——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let me finish first, and then you can answer altogether——

Mr. SAYERS (continuing). I will most cheerfully admit the gentleman from Ohio to be a great, and a wise, and a good man. There is no use in consuming my time, therefore, in asking the question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am referring to Congress now collectively. If Congress be an aggregation of wise men and patriotic men, why do we not pay the honest debts that the Government owes?

Mr. SAYERS. I am discussing these particular claims.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I refer to all honest claims.

Mr. SAYERS. Ah! that is the trouble. When we begin the discussion of a particular class of claims, or one particular claim, gentlemen will introduce into the discussion the nonpayment of other claims not connected with the matter under consideration.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, to be rather late in the day for us to undertake to pay one million dollars and over of these claims—claims which our forefathers and their children refused to pay. We should not be considered dishonest because we refuse to pay them—claims that are more than a hundred years old, claims the payment of which have been refused again and again by Congress and once vetoed by a President of the United States and no effort made to pass the bill over his veto.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is in the power of the majority to do so. I would say, however, to our Republican friends that they should not be overhasty in this matter. The claims have been discussed again and again and have been oftentimes rejected. Will the majority pay them now, presented as they are now presented, four different classes of claims grouped together in a single amendment, to be considered all together and as a single item?

Why, sir, I heard a gentleman in the House say that if the French spoliation claims were separate and apart he would vote for them, but he would not vote for the other claims that are connected with them. I heard another gentleman, who is friendly to the Southern war claims, say that if he could get a direct vote upon them, separate and distinct from the others, he would not vote for the French spoliation claims. And yet, in order to get all of these claims through, in order to draw support from all sides, these four classes are combined together in a single amendment, and the friends of each class are asked to support them all. The friends of the respective classes are uniting, and arm in arm they are marching to the Treasury to pay claims which some of them believe ought not to be paid, and which, if presented separately, would be rejected by this House with scarcely a discussion.

The idea, Mr. Speaker, that the Government of the United States is an insurer of the property of its citizens in time of war is an absurdity. What were these people doing on the high seas in armed ships?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. What business had they on the high seas at any time? They ought to stay at home. [Laughter.]

Mr. SAYERS. Possibly so, and I hope the gentleman will vote against the claims.

Mr. MAHON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. SAYERS. In a moment.

These people were on the high seas with vessels laden with their own commodities, in order to run the blockade which England had thrown around the whole of Europe. They were trying to get their goods into the European markets and to sell them at the high prices then prevailing. Their ships were armed with artillery, in case they met the French, and if they happened to be the stronger they fought and took possession of French vessels. But when they lost their own ships they came to their own Government and presented claims for compensation for the losses which they thus sustained.

I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who wishes to ask a question.

Mr. MAHON. Was war declared between the United States and France when these ships were taken and destroyed?

Mr. SAYERS. It was not necessary that it should have been formally declared. The Supreme Court have decided that it was not necessary for the existence of public warfare that war should have been actually declared. And if the gentleman, who is a lawyer, will turn to the opinion of the court in the case which I have just cited, he will find that I am sustained by high authority.

Mr. MAHON. What was the case?

Mr. SAYERS. The case of Bas against Tingy.

Mr. MAHON. What date?

Mr. SAYERS. 1800, or about that time.

Mr. MAHON. Have you read Chief Justice Marshall's opinion?

Mr. SAYERS. This opinion was before he was a member of the Supreme Court, I believe.

Mr. MAHON. I only want the gentleman to state the fact that the judges have held that there was no such state of war existing.

Mr. SAYERS. I beg the gentleman's pardon, they have held just the reverse.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I would like to ask the gentleman why, if the condition of war, as he contends, existed—why John Adams, who was President from 1797 to 1801, says something like this:

To explain all the mysteries of that period never was and never will be in my power. It would require volumes to give a simple history of it. * * * My sole object was to preserve the peace and neutrality of the country, and that, I thank God, I obtained at the loss of my power and fame on both sides.

Mr. SAYERS. Oh, Mr. Speaker, I understand——

Mr. WELLINGTON. That is what the President of the United States contended and claimed at that time.

Mr. SAYERS. But we have the letter of the Attorney-General of the United States in 1798, and the opinion of the Supreme Court in 1800——

Mr. WELLINGTON. Thomas Jefferson in 1801 used this language:

While we devoutly return thanks * * * we are bound with peculiar gratitude to be thankful to Him that our peace has been preserved through so perilous a season.

The President of the United States ought to have known something about the condition of the country, ought he not?

Mr. SAYERS. I will say to my friend that in what was said by the President of the United States view was had to the course which he took in order to prevent a formal declaration of war upon the part of the Government of the United States against France; and the gentleman will not, I apprehend, find in any of the writings, either of Jefferson or of Adams, any assertion that a state of war was not then existing. The character of war to which these gentlemen referred was an authorized war under an act of Congress, followed by direct and open hostilities.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Will the gentleman permit another interruption?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly, and I will endeavor to answer the gentleman.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Would it be possible, if there were war of any kind existing between France and America, that when Washington died in 1799 the French people throughout the whole land would have put up crape and expressed their condolence with this nation?

Mr. SAYERS. I should think so.

Mr. WELLINGTON. It is scarcely supposable that a nation at war with another would do that.

Mr. SAYERS. I can see very well why they should. The French people were living under a republic, and the United States was also a republic. The people of France knew that they had the sympathy of the people of the United States in their effort to reform their Government and to establish a republic. Republicans in those days sympathized with each other, wherever they lived.

A MEMBER. And they do now.

Mr. QUIGG. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. QUIGG. Is there any adjudication on the part of Congress or on the part of the Supreme Court or on the part of any other authority that we actually owe this money?

Mr. SAYERS. None that I know of.

Mr. QUIGG. Has there ever been?

Mr. SAYERS. None that I can now recall.

Mr. DOVENER. I will show you one.

Mr. SAYERS. I hardly think so.

Mr. DOVENER. I will show you such a declaration of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. MAHON. I know you want to be correct.

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly. If there has been any such adjudication, I am not advised of it. I speak subject to correction.

Mr. MAHON. You have just stated that these American merchantmen had no business to run the blockade.

Mr. SAYERS. That is what my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] suggested.

Mr. MAHON. Now, I want to read——

Mr. SAYERS. Oh, do not do that now. You had an hour.

Mr. MAHON. I want to correct you. I quote from Wharton's International Law the following letter, written by Thomas Jefferson to the merchants of the United States:

I have it in charge from the President to assure the merchants of the United States concerned in foreign commerce or navigation that due attention will be paid to any injuries they may suffer on the high seas or in foreign countries contrary to the law of nations or to existing treaties, and that on the forwarding hither of well-authenticated evidence of the same proper proceedings will be adopted for their relief.

Mr. SAYERS. I object to any further interruption.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield further.

Mr. MAHON. If you object to a letter from Thomas Jefferson, why, then, you can go ahead.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman should regard a decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. MAHON. I am talking about Thomas Jefferson.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas desires to reserve twenty-five minutes. He has now only twenty-five minutes remaining.

Mr. SAYERS. That being the case, Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. RICHARDSON. Would the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] prefer to proceed now? If so, I will allow him to do so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will say that the gentleman from Texas has twenty-five minutes remaining, and he has yielded ten minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is very kind in the gentleman, but——

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman from Ohio asked me for time, and I yield to him.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am very much obliged to the gentleman. It was very generous in him to yield the time. I want, if I can, to get about ten minutes more time, in my own right or otherwise.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] is recognized.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, under what principle is the time limited?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], a member of the conference committee, took the floor in his own right, and that, of course, gave him an hour. He has used all but twenty-five minutes, and he yields ten minutes of his remaining time to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then I will wait and try to get more than ten minutes.

Mr. SAYERS. I would give the gentleman more time if I had it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I understand. I will wait until the gentleman from Tennessee has concluded.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] will not take his time now I should like ten minutes more coupled with my time, to make it about twenty minutes.

Mr. CANNON. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Twenty minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended ten minutes more, in addition to the ten minutes yielded by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then the gentleman from Tennessee can proceed and use his ten minutes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is yielded only ten minutes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. When I asked for time to speak upon this amendment I hoped I would have more than ten minutes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the Chair recognize me in my own right?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will simply say that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] had the floor and had twenty-five minutes remaining, and indicated an intention to yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], and five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois. That would make his twenty-five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say to the gentleman from Ohio that I hope to have a vote not far from 4 o'clock upon this bill. There is another conference report, on the sundry civil bill, that I want to dispose of yet to-night; there is an election case pending; and if the gentleman desires twenty minutes I will ask unanimous consent now.

Mr. GROSVENOR. You will not get that.

Mr. CANNON. If the Chair will recognize me in the time offered to me by the gentleman from Texas, I will ask for time for the gentleman.

Mr. MAHON. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Very well; the arrangement is all made.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for order. When I asked for time I hoped I would have more than ten minutes in which to discuss this measure. In ten minutes it is impossible to do so. I wanted, if I had time, to recur to the two main propositions—the war claims and the spoliation claims—and to have endeavored, if I had the time, to reply to the argument of the gentleman from Illinois and that of the gentleman from Texas, in opposing the pending amendment. I will not have time to do so to my own satisfaction.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say first, in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, who opposes the French spoliation claims, that it occurs to me that the objection does not come with good grace from him. I sought to interrupt the gentleman when he was on the floor a while ago to call his attention to the fact that in a previous Congress the gentleman himself had favored an appropriation for the payment of French spoliation claims. I could not get the attention of the gentleman then, and I only want now to recur to it briefly. He will find in the Fiftieth Congress, the second session, on page 2706 of the RECORD, the following. Mr. SAYERS, of Texas, had yielded to Mr. CANNON five minutes. Mr. CANNON, among other things, said:

The bone of contention is this item of one and a half millions of dollars, known as the spoliation claims, ninety years old.

I want to be entirely frank and say there are two sides to this question. In former years, when most of us were boys, these claims met, after full discussion and passage in the House and Senate, with Executive veto. A year or two ago we did refer these ninety-year-old claims to the Court of Claims, not to render judgment, but to investigate and report to the House. As one member of this House I have read with great care the decision of that court. I believe from the best lights I can get the Government of the United States three generations after these claims are due and payable ought to pay them.

[Applause.]

Now, that is what the gentleman then said. As a matter standing alone, I do not favor payment of the spoliation claims, but there is no other way to get our little pittance of war claims.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman just yield to me one minute?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman has time after I get through.

Mr. CANNON. I will yield him one minute of the time yielded to me by the gentleman from Texas. I want to say that I have no recollection of the debate. Further, you may find the language may be modified by all that I said. I want to say, further, that I have made no attack upon the legality of the French spoliation claims; but I make the attack that it is not parliamentary, it is not sound policy, it is not parliamentarily decent to put these claims upon a general appropriation bill, some of which claims may be right, the most of which I believe to be wrong.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I yielded to the gentleman that he might make his explanation. I want to say that was not all that he said. He went on to say that it was then within fourteen hours of the adjournment of Congress, but that we ought to vote to pay these claims. We are not within fourteen hours of adjournment. He can have ample time to examine all the claims in the Senate amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman say that I voted to pay them or voted against paying them?

Mr. RICHARDSON. You said they ought to be paid. There was no yea-and-nay vote, and there was no other chance of paying them but on the appropriation bill, and they were so paid, as I understand it.

Mr. CANNON. My recollection is that there never was a time when I advocated the payment or voted to put wholesale claims upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. In view of the circumstances, it is impossible to procure the consideration of these claims in any other way, and the gentleman knows it. How much time have the leaders of the House given to the Committee on Claims or to the Committee on War Claims of the Fifty-fourth Congress to consider such measures as are involved in the Senate amendment? An hour and a half, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] says. Now, when are you going to consider them? If you wish to do justice to these claims there is no difficulty in the way of protracting this session a week or ten days and allow the gentleman and his committee to investigate them fully.

Mr. Speaker, they are brought here in a regular way, the only way they can be brought here. My friend from Texas says these claims are all grouped together, and therefore they ought not to be considered. They were not grouped together. They were considered separately in the Senate. Each one of these four propositions to which my friend refers had separate consideration in the Senate. First, the French spoliation claims were offered as an amendment. Then an amendment to that amendment was offered, and that amendment to the amendment was agreed to. That was a separate vote. Then the Chouteau claim, as it is called, was offered as an amendment to the amendment and agreed to, and so with the other amendment, all being agreed to in order. They were all separately considered. Anyone who will examine for a moment can see that these four amendments were each considered separately and passed separately, and became one Senate amendment. Therefore there is nothing in the point of the gentleman from Illinois or the gentleman from Texas. Each one of these four separate claims had separate consideration by the Senate. They each had separate consideration by the Court of Claims, organized for the express purpose of relieving this House and the other branch of Congress from the investigation of the details necessarily incident to the claims.

Why was jurisdiction given the Court of Claims to try these cases under the Bowman Act? I have the act before me. Its title is, "An act to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government." The whole object in referring these claims under the Bowman Act to the Court of Claims was to relieve Congress of the labor of investigating the details of these cases. Yet we are told, after that court, organized for the purpose, has made the investigation, that we must have time to investigate them ourselves. If only an honest investigation is wanted, we have ample time to investigate them, now that they are before this able Committee on Appropriations. We can sit here a few days and allow the committee to complete the investigation, if they desire to enter upon it. But, Mr. Speaker, I say that the Court of Claims having found the facts in each one of these cases, it seems to me that we ought to accept their findings as final and conclusive and take action accordingly. If we had a month or three months or years for the investigation, we would not undertake to go into the records in these cases as that court does.

How is that tribunal to proceed in these cases? Take the cases referred under the Bowman Act. They are referred to the court, which in its make-up is not partial to that class of claims, which are mainly war claims arising in the South. That is a Republican court. Five members compose it, each of them a Republican, and all from Northern States. Therefore I feel justified in saying that the members of that court are not partial to this class of war claims, and yet they have found every fact that Congress required them to investigate in favor of each one of these 384 war claims, saying that they are just and proper and ought to be paid. Gentlemen say we have not time to investigate them, but I repeat that if we had a year or five years there is not a member who would go through the records with such detail and thoroughness as this court does.

When I interrupted the gentleman from Illinois awhile ago I made the statement that an able Senator who formerly occupied a seat on this floor, and with whom many of us served here for years, had reported these claims in the Senate from the Committee on Claims of that body. I want to read what he said in the Senate when these Bowman Act claims were presented as a separate amendment. After the French spoliation amendment had been adopted, this amendment was offered covering these war claims, and the Senator I refer to, Mr. BURROWS of Michigan, in answer to a question, said—I will quote his words:

I will say, in response to the inquiry which has been made, that the amount carried by this amendment is $548,922.54.

Mr. HARRIS. Can the Senator answer the question asked by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER] as to the number of claims? I could not; I have not the number in mind.

Mr. BURROWS. Yes: the number of claims carried in the amendment is 325. I became conversant with this matter because it was referred to me as a subcommittee, and I have examined it with a great deal of care and made the report in this case.

That is, Senator BURROWS said that he, as a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Claims, had investigated this matter; had gone over the findings of the Court of Claims covering the 325 claims embraced in the war claims amendment to this bill; had examined them with great care, and had recommended that they be paid. The committee adopted his report and made the same recommendation to the Senate, and they were put upon this bill as an amendment. There was nothing unfair or unusual about it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I wish I had more time.

Mr. GROSVENOR rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for ten minutes, yielded by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to devote twenty minutes to the discussion on this matter—ten minutes yielded by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] and ten minutes yielded by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

I think if Congress on this occasion shall refuse to pay these claims, and particularly the so-called French spoliation claims, they will never be paid. From time to time Congress has passed the French spoliation claims. It is said that they have passed in one or both Houses of Congress fifty-two times. In the brief time which I intend to devote to these I can reply to only one or two of the arguments which have been made here. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] has repeated the oft-told tale that there is a doubt whether there was not a war existing between France and the United States at the time of the accruing of these claims for the destruction of the commerce of the merchant marine of New England.

Now, in the first place, it is too late to put forward that argument. The question has been settled by the action of Congress over and over again. It was settled especially by the Fifty-first Congress, which paid a million and a half dollars of these claims, in face of the identical argument made by the gentleman from Texas to-day. I would like to ask some student of American history when that war began. We live in an age of civil-service reform now, and all our public servants are bound to know something about the history of the United States. When was that war? How did it begin? Who commanded the French troops? Who commanded the American troops? What battle was fought? What ship fired a gun? What was the name of some officer who participated in that war? The Supreme Court of the United States in a case which has been cited used an unfortunate expression, which was mere obiter dictum, and from that time to this everybody who wanted to be on the side of the repudiation of these claims has been turning over that utterance of the court in his mouth as a sweet morsel. This war, if it happened at all, was in the year 1799. George Washington was alive for eleven and one-half months of that year. George Washington did not know that that war had any existence. [Laughter.] He never found it out. Living down here in quiet retirement on the banks of the Potomac, he never learned that his country was at war with its former ally.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit an interruption, I wish to say that while I am in favor of these claims, and while I do not pretend to be a student of history, I have always understood that that war was known as the quasi war with France.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The "quasi war"! Well, Mr. Speaker, one of the judges of the supreme court of Ohio told me once that whenever a lawyer wanted to bring a party into court, a corporation, and did not know exactly what its name was or where it was located, or how to describe it, he always spoke of it as "a quasi corporation." [Laughter.] I hold in my hand the Memoirs of Napoleon Bonaparte, dictated by himself after 1799, in the seclusion of the island on which he died. On page 116 he says this in regard to the death of Washington. It will be remembered that that death took place on the 15th day of December, 1799, while, according to the gentleman from Texas, war was raging between the Republic of the United States and France.

The death of Washington, which happened on the 15th day of December, 1799, gave the First Consul an opportunity of making known his sentiments toward the United States of America. He put on mourning for that great citizen and directed all his army to wear it likewise by the following order of the date of the 9th of February, 1800—

It took a good while to get the news over there in those days. The order is as follows:

"Washington is dead! That great man fought against tyranny, and established the liberty of his country. His memory will always be dear to the French people, as well as to all freemen in both hemispheres, and especially to French soldiers, who, like him and the soldiers of America, fight for equality and liberty."

The First Consul further ordered that for ten days all colors and standards of the Republic should be hung with black crape.

Hung with black crape for a distinguished citizen of a nation that was at war with France, says the gentleman from Texas!

But that there may be no misunderstanding about the matter, I hold in my hand a copy of a letter written by Washington less than a year before his death, in which he uses this language:

The inclination of France to be upon good terms with the United States is so strong that it must be our own mismanagement and disinclination to peace if matters with that country are not accommodated upon terms honorable and advantageous to this.

Washington died on the 14th of December, 1799. By order of the First Consul crape was suspended in honor of his memory from all the standards and flags of France. Napoleon spoke in most glowing terms of him. A funeral oration in his honor was pronounced by M. de Fontrews in the Hotel des Invalides

So the theory that there was war is an absurd one. We are to suppose that there was a war that nobody ever heard of—troops commanded by nobody—muster rolls never filed in the Department at Washington—a myth—a Flying Dutchman of the imagination!

Now, let us see the basis upon which these claims arose originally. Let me see whether I can condense it into about a minute and a half or two minutes.

When the treaty between the United States and France, which was ratified by the United States on the 18th of February, 1801, was in process of construction, each nation presented great claims—volumes of claims—against the other. It is unimportant what the French claims against us were. They were for violations of treaties, breaches of concessions, and other international complaints, alleged by France against the United States. The United States alleged these identical spoliation claims against France and demanded payment. An article was put into the treaty providing that after the treaty both nations should hold in reserve their respective claims. In the second article of the treaty this language was used:

And with respect to the indemnities mutually due or claimed, the parties shall arrange these matters by ulterior negotiations at a suitable time; and until they shall have agreed on these points the said treaties and conventions shall have no effect, and the relations between the two nations shall be regulated in the manner following.

That left to the future the settlement of both classes of these claims. But when the time came to settle finally that treaty by an agreement between the two nations that article was stricken out. With reference to that occurrence Napoleon says:

The suppression of this article at once put an end to the privileges which France had possessed by the treaty of 1778, and annulled the just claims which America might have made for injuries done in time of peace. This was exactly what the First Consul had proposed to himself in fixing these two points as equiponderating each other. Without this it would have been impossible to satisfy the merchants of the United States, and to banish from their memory the losses they had suffered. The First Consul's ratification of this treaty was dated July 13, 1801, and declared that it was to be clearly understood that the suppression of article 2 annulled all claims for indemnity, etc.

That is the language of Bonaparte, dictated to his scrivener during the last years of his life.

So a complete bar was created by this stipulation against the prosecution by merchants of the United States of any claims in any court anywhere for damages or losses arising out of those hostilities, and in return for that the United States obtained a complete acquittance of all the claims that France held against us; and from that day to this, Mr. Speaker, those claims have been as solemnly due from the Treasury of the United States as though they were the note of hand or the bond of the Government. And I would as soon, Mr. Speaker—and I make no aspersion upon anybody else, either a member of this body or elsewhere—but I would as soon vote not to pay a bond of the Government when it is due as to vote, in the time of a possibility to do so, against the payment of what I regard to be these just and honest claims against the Government.

I have no time to go further into the question of the French spoliation claims. I will now devote a few moments of the remaining time to the Bowman Act and the claims sent to the court under that act; and if my distinguished friend from Illinois will, in his own time, answer one or two propositions I want to put to him, he will disabuse my mind of some serious and unpleasant considerations in the matter.

In the first place, I hold in my hand, and will incorporate at this point, the law under which the French claims—going back to them for a moment—are audited, if you may call it auditing, in the Court of Claims. It is in the following words:

CHAPTER 25.

An act to provide for the ascertainment of claims of American citizens for spoliations committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801.

(January 20, 1885. 23 Stat., 283.)

1. Claims for indemnity on France for illegal captures, etc., prior to July 31, 1801, referred to Court of Claims. Certain classes not included.
2. Court may make rules.
3. Validity of claims to be determined. Proceedings and evidence.
4. Attorney-General to appear and resist claims.
5. Documents and evidence from abroad to be obtained.
6. Court to report to Congress annually. Claims not presented within two years to be barred. United States not committed to payment

CLAIMS FOR INDEMNITY ON FRANCE FOR ILLEGAL CAPTURES, ETC., PRIOR TO JULY 31, 1801, REFERRED TO THE COURT.

Be it enacted, etc. [SECTION 1], That such citizens of the United States, or their legal representatives, as had valid claims to indemnity upon the French Government arising out of illegal captures, detentions, seizures, condemnations, and confiscations prior to the ratification of the convention between the United States and the French Republic concluded on the 30th day of September, 1800, the ratifications of which were exchanged on the 31st day of July following, may apply by petition to the Court of Claims, within two years from the passage of this act, as hereinafter provided.

CERTAIN EXCEPTIONS.

Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not extend to such claims as were embraced in the convention between the United States and the French Republic concluded on the 30th day of April, 1803.

Nor to such claims growing out of the acts of France as were allowed and paid, in whole or in part, under the provisions of the treaty between the United States and Spain concluded on the 22d day of February, 1819.

Nor to such claims as were allowed, in whole or in part, under the provisions of the treaty between the United States and France concluded on the 4th day of July, 1831.

COURT MAY MAKE RULES.

SEC. 2. That the court is hereby authorized to make all needful rules and regulations, not contravening the laws of the land or the provisions of this act, for executing the provisions hereof. (See rules 105, 106.)

VALIDITY OF CLAIMS TO BE DETERMINED.

SEC. 3. That the court shall examine and determine the validity and amount of all the claims included within the description above mentioned, together with their present ownership, and, if by assignee, the date of the assignment, with the consideration paid therefor.

PROCEEDINGS AND EVIDENCE.

Provided, That in the course of their proceedings they shall receive all suitable testimony on oath or affirmation, and all other proper evidence, historic and documentary, concerning the same; and they shall decide upon the validity of said claims according to the rules of law, municipal and international, and the treaties of the United States applicable to the same, and shall report all such conclusions of fact and law as in their judgment may affect the liability of the United States therefor.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL TO APPEAR AND RESIST CLAIMS.

SEC. 4. That the court shall cause notice of all petitions presented under this act to be served on the Attorney-General of the United States, who shall be authorized, by himself or his assistant, to examine witnesses, to cause testimony to be taken, to have access to all testimony taken under this act, and to be heard by the court. He shall resist all claims presented under this act by all proper legal defenses.

DOCUMENTS AND EVIDENCE FROM ABROAD TO BE OBTAINED, USED, ETC.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of State to procure, as soon as possible after the passage of this act, through the American minister at Paris or otherwise, all such evidence and documents relating to the claims above mentioned as can be obtained from abroad; which, together with the like evidence and documents on file in the Department of State, or which may be filed in the Department, may be used before the court by the claimants interested therein, or by the United States, but the same shall not be removed from the files of the court.

And after the hearings are closed the record of the proceedings of the court and the documents produced before them shall be deposited in the Department of State.

COURT TO REPORT TO CONGRESS ANNUALLY.

SEC. 6. That on the first Monday of December in each year the court shall report to Congress, for final action, the facts found by it, and its conclusions in all cases which it has disposed of and not previously reported.

Such finding and report of the court shall be taken to be merely advisory as to the law and facts found, and shall not conclude either the claimant or Congress.

CLAIMS NOT PRESENTED IN TWO YEARS BARRED.

And all claims not finally presented to said court within the period of two years limited by this act shall be forever barred.

UNITED STATES NOT COMMITTED TO PAYMENT.

And nothing in this act shall be construed as committing the United States to the payment of any such claims.

January 20, 1885.

My argument, it will be seen, therefore, applies now both to the Bowman Act and to these French spoliation claims. We have provided this tribunal; we have enacted the law for their consideration, and what further can we do about them? The claims have come here from that court, acting under the jurisdiction which we conferred upon it. They have followed our direction in the consideration of the claims, and have exhausted all their resources of examination. A great many of the claims were rejected; many of them were cut down, but ultimately the forum which we have chosen made its report under that law, and these claimants have no power to go further.

How, then, will the gentleman from Illinois examine these claims? Can the committees of this Congress do it? Certainly not. The committees of Congress have remitted the jurisdiction of the examination of the claims to the Court of Claims, and this court has made its investigation and findings, and have sent the report to us clothed with the ultimate and final judgment of the court.

The gentleman from Illinois asked someone this morning, during this discussion, if he would undertake to say that the findings of the court were a judgment. Certainly not a judgment in the sense that an execution can be issued under it. But let us see what the Supreme Court say in reference to the matter—as to the finality of the two great facts in the Bowman cases and the single fact in the other.

In the case of Carver vs. The United States (111 United States Reports, page 609) the court says:

> We have no doubt that Congress, in cases under the Bowman Act, intended to establish the same practice of making the findings of facts by the Court of Claims conclusive upon both parties.

And yet, says the gentleman from Illinois, we must investigate; we must look further into them; we must consider them after a conclusive finding has been made by the court of our own choosing; after a decision has been rendered in a forum prescribed by ourselves. The gentleman says he wants us to go and examine the identical question which was submitted to the court, and whose decision the Supreme Court say was intended to be conclusive on both parties.

But let me finish the citation:

> Thus removing from the halls of legislation the determination of controverted questions of facts, relieving itself and its committees of the investigation of such matters proper to be tried only by a judicial tribunal, and obtaining the full measure of the assistance and relief contemplated by the act.

Mr. CANNON. From what is the gentleman reading?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I read from the case of Carver vs. The United States, 111 United States Reports.

Mr. CANNON. When decided?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, judging by the number of the report, I would say quite recently.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman refer to the sugar-bounty cases?

Mr. GROSVENOR. No; this is the Carver case. This is under the Bowman Act, for the citation says:

> We have no doubt that Congress, in cases under the Bowman Act, intended to establish, etc.

And after five years the Court of Claims has been operating on these claims under our direction, and in other cases which I will cite, limited by the terms of that law, and we turn around now and say we are not satisfied with the finding of the facts, that we want more facts, and we will make a further investigation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have but to say, in conclusion, with reference to some of the claims in the amendment, that if I were called upon I should certainly point out one or two claims that, as an original proposition, I would not be willing to support; and if an opportunity shall come later on I will point them out. But the claims under the Bowman Act are legitimate claims against this Government; just as legitimate as the bonds of the United States. We have put these people off time and again. After fighting the war claims for ten years, when they came only as a report from a committee or were offered under unanimous consent, I have stood them off because I wanted them to come in some form that was authentic and after due investigation. Now they are here. We have battled against and defeated private-bill day all of this session. Now they come here in a form that, in my judgment, is a legitimate demand upon the Treasury of the United States, and I for one shall vote to pay both classes of these claims. [Applause.]

Mr. MAHON. I yield ten minutes to my colleague [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, I rise in my representative capacity, first because the people in my district have been waiting for many years to receive justice at the hands of the Congress of the United States, but more as a citizen of Pennsylvania who desires to see removed a blot upon the escutcheon of our fair country, and I believe that the time has now arrived so to do, or, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has said, this will remain an ineffaceable stain on the jurisprudence of our country and upon Congressional action. These claims are founded in justice. They have knocked at the doors of Congress for years, but owing to the congested state of the business of this body they were referred to a court which was authorized to look into them and to report, as the act read, "from year to year" the findings. That court has from time to time reported either for or against these claims.

Mr. Speaker, the strength of our Republic is the law, and when you break down the faith of the people in the law, either as applied to Congress or as adjudicated in the courts of our country, you do, in my judgment, a dangerous thing. This representative assemblage of the people referred these claims to the courts of the United States. We sent them there in good faith, and the suitors, under our instructions, went there in equal good faith. They came back here seeking payment after making large expenditures in the employment of counsel, gathering the witnesses, and looking up the proofs. Our own Government assisted them by sending commissioners abroad to furnish all the obtainable evidence in the way of documents necessary to substantiate these claims. The claims were reported back to this House, and by the act of 1890 Congress acknowledged the findings of that court in judgments against the United States and appropriated one million and a quarter of dollars to pay these claims. It is too late now to question either the jurisdiction of this court or the act of Congress.

Do you wish the people of the country to believe that you will pay one set of these claims and that you will not pay another? Is this Republican Congress of the United States, which will be held responsible by the people, going to say to the people that we show preferences as to suitors whose claims are founded in equal force and upon substantial equality under the law?

More than that, there is a stronger side to this question. When, in the treaty of 1819, we purchased Florida from the Kingdom of Spain, we reserved $5,000,000 out of that purchase money to cover French spoliation claims for vessels which had been condemned in Spanish ports. That was a trust fund held by the Government of the United States for the benefit of these claims. It lies in the Treasury to this day, and with the exception of a million and a quarter of dollars appropriated in the Fifty-first Congress to pay a portion of these claims already adjudicated it stands there to-day as a trust fund for the settlement of these claims; and I appeal to this Congress now to appropriate the amount of money necessary to pay these claims sent over by the Senate after careful investigation.

Our country has always settled spoliation claims collected on behalf of its citizens. Under the Napoleonic wars we filed our claims, and in the treaty of 1831 we got our damages and paid them over to the people. So one year later we held The Two Sicilies responsible for depredations on our commerce. We took the money, and, like an honest Government, we paid it over to the people who had been damaged. These claims stand alone here in the history of our country. Yet we refuse to pay this money that we have obtained for damages from a foreign country over to the people who were damaged.

And who are the people who are claiming this money? They are the descendants or heirs at law of people who, when the high seas could not be protected by our Government, took all the danger to establish the commerce of the then young Republic, and carried the flag of the new Republic into every port. For the damage which they suffered in that heroic endeavor they have never been compensated since. These are just and equitable claims. The money should be in the Treasury of the United States, and I say here now, as to the cry of poverty that goes up whenever any legitimate appropriation is proposed here, if you have no money in the Treasury of the United States to pay these claims, then stop the salaries of the judges, stop the pay of the clerks, for it is ridiculous to support courts of justice and then not liquidate the solemn judgments of those courts.

Mr. HEPBURN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. ADAMS. I have only five minutes, and I have been waiting all day.

The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in his remarks said that these claims had received no consideration.

Why, gentlemen, they have been considered in the Senate, have received the indorsement of the committees of that body; they have been debated; they have been carefully considered there. The French spoliation claims have been considered by our own committee. That committee has not been able to get the matter before the House, but the claims have been considered and reported upon, and the statement that they have received no consideration is not an accurate statement. So with the Bowman claims; they have been considered by the Committee on War Claims; they have been reported upon, not only in this Congress, but for half a dozen Congresses back. They have passed the House at one time or another. There has probably been no legislation before the Congress of the United States that has received so many reports and been considered so carefully by the different sessions of the respective Congresses.

How any man can rise in his place and say that this amendment is tacked improperly upon an appropriation bill is past my comprehension. The facts I state here are correct. Other statements have been challenged on this floor. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] defied us over and over again to produce the section of the treaty of 1800 whereon these claims were founded by the convention between the two countries, and it was not until we poked the treaty under his nose that he admitted the fact. There have been other statements made upon this floor in that way.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I wish to say to the gentleman that he has not stated the facts correctly.

Mr. ADAMS. I have stated the facts correctly. The gentleman defied me personally to produce the treaty.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. And you have not done it yet.

Mr. ADAMS. I have; and if the gentleman has not been long enough in this country to understand the English language, I refer him to the French translation, on the other page.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. You may be polite, but you are certainly not informed.

Mr. ADAMS. I am informed and polite. I welcome foreigners to our country; but when I rise upon the floor of this House to advocate the payment of claims, the justice of which has been established, for services upon which the commerce of this country has been built up, it comes, I say, with bad taste from the gentleman to oppose them.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. If you will just allow me a minute——

Mr. ADAMS. These other claims have had consideration. Now, it follows that they will have to be acted upon by Congress. I appeal for justice to our people who have presented these claims, who have followed your advice and sent them to the Court of Claims that you designated. That court has now reported and adjudicated them, and now we ask that you shall keep good faith with the people of our country as a legislative body. You first pointed out the way in which they might establish their claims, and now refuse the payment. The law is the strength of the Republic, and if you do not enforce the law and keep confidence with the people, God help the Republic! [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, what time have I?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, in that five minutes——

Mr. LEWIS. I only want to say——

Mr. CANNON. At the end of five minutes I want to ask for a vote.

Mr. LEWIS. I have no objection to that; I only ask about ten minutes. My constituents are very much interested in this matter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. CANNON. I have only five minutes.

Mr. LEWIS. Ten minutes is all I ask; and I ask it in my own right?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. LEWIS. I have not had a minute of the time of the House this whole session.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor. The Chair will state that no time has been fixed for closing the debate. If the House shall order the previous question all debate will be closed. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. LEWIS. I insist on my constitutional rights as a representative of the people.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the gentleman from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask the Chair if I will have time for debate after the previous question is ordered?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not after the previous question is ordered.

Mr. CANNON. That was my understanding. And now, Mr. Speaker, when this is disposed of there is yet a conference report upon the sundry civil bill that I want disposed of, if I can, and send it to conference.

One word in conclusion:

Such findings or report of the court shall be taken to be merely advisory as to the law and facts found, and shall not conclude either the claimant or Congress.

That is the law as to every claim in these 100 pages of claims that have been wrongfully and against all rule and all precedent placed upon this bill by the Senate. Gentlemen can concur with the Senate if they choose, but I say this to those who are interested in appropriations for public improvements in their various sections of this country: From the standpoint of patriotism you deny yourselves authorizations and appropriations, and yet now, out of order, without investigation, you are asked to place yourselves $2,000,000 further away from those just appropriations by paying these claims, many of which, in my judgment, are stale, and no one of which any man here can rise and say is right. The question is, will you do it? Will you set this precedent? Will you break down your general appropriation bills? Will you countenance this coming together and by this log-rolling scheme putting these claims on a general appropriation bill, claims as to which I believe the gentleman from Ohio knows that a portion of them are dead wrong, and which are made up, at least in one case, by an allowance for interest and profits? Gentlemen, I ask you to turn down this method of legislation and keep clear of the scandal that I say, measuring my words, will, in my judgment, follow the action which you are asked to take. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question. [Applause.]

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks for the previous question.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to be heard before the question is submitted on ordering the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair regrets to state that it can not recognize the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. LEWIS. That is always the case.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. LEWIS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered.

Mr. SAYERS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion of Mr. SAYERS was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring with the Senate amendments.

Mr. SAYERS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 110, nays 97, not voting 148; as follows:

Mr. ATWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. BARRETT, if he were present, would vote "aye."

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. BINGHAM, but I have transferred the pair to my colleague, Mr. HALL, and have voted.

The SPEAKER. On this question the yeas are 111 and the nays are 97; and accordingly the House concurs in the Senate amendments. [Applause.]

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the House has concurred in the Senate amendments and to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the latter motion will be——

Mr. KEM. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KEM].

Mr. CANNON. I withdraw the motion to reconsider, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] made the motion to reconsider.

Mr. CANNON. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania had better withdraw it.

Mr. MAHON. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. CANNON. I am not sure whether the Senate asked a conference on this bill or not. I believe my motion covered a request for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The Senate did not ask a conference.

Mr. CANNON. Then I move that the House request a conference with the Senate on the remaining disagreements on this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CANNON. I rise to present a privileged report, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7604) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 20, 26, 34, 36, 40, 41, 45, 46, 47, 49, 50, 51, 52, 58, 60, 75, 80, 81, 85, 86, 104, 107, 118, 120, 121, 130, 148, 149, 151, 152, 153, 154, 158, 159, 183, 184, 185, 186, 188, and 189.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 5, 21, 27, 29, 30, 31, 35, 42, 43, 48, 53, 54, 55, 56, 59, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 77, 78, 79, 82, 83, 87, 88, 89, 90, 95, 99, 100, 101, 102, 105, 106, 108, 110, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 119, 131, 132, 136, 137, 138, 142, 143, 144, 150, 155, 156, 157, 162, 163, 169, 176, 179, 180, 181, and 182; and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 33: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"Fire Island light vessel, New York: For constructing, equipping, and outfitting, complete for service, a first-class steam light vessel, with steam fog signal, $40,000; and the total cost of said steam light vessel, with a steam fog signal, under a contract which is hereby authorized therefor, shall not exceed $80,000."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 37: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 37, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"San Francisco Harbor light vessel: For constructing, equipping, and outfitting complete for service, a first-class steam light vessel with steam fog signal, $40,000; and the total cost of said steam light vessel, with a steam fog signal, under a contract which is hereby authorized therefor, shall not exceed $80,000."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 38: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 38, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"Tender for the Second light-house district: For constructing, equipping, and outfitting complete for service a new steam tender for buoyage, supply, and inspection in the Second light-house district, Massachusetts, $37,500; and the total cost of said steam tender, under a contract which is hereby authorized therefor, shall not exceed $75,000."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 39: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 39, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"Tender for the Seventh and Eighth light-house districts: For constructing, equipping, and outfitting complete for service a new steam tender for buoyage, supply, and inspection in the Seventh and Eighth light-house districts, $37,500; and the total cost of said steam tender, under a contract which is hereby authorized therefor, shall not exceed $75,000."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendments numbered 44: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 44, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert: "For constructing two revenue steamers of the first-class, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, for service on the Great Lakes, $200,000; and the total cost of said revenue steamers, under a contract which is hereby authorized therefor, shall not exceed $200,000 each"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 57: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 57, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 27 of the bill, in line 3, strike out the following: "for extra engraving and drawing"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 62: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 62, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$67,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 76: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 76, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$110,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 84: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 84, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$131,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 98: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 98, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"That the city of Bismarck, in the State of North Dakota, by and through its regular city council, shall have authority to use, upon lease from the Government by the Secretary of the Interior, Sibley Island, an island in the Missouri River, near said city of Bismarck, for a public park: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize the felling of timber on said island for sale or consumption, nor shall any timber be cut save for the purpose of improving or beautifying the grounds."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 103: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 103, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$15,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 133: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 133, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$40,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 134: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 134, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$40,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 135: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 135, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$40,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 139: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 139, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Add at the end of said amendment the following: ": this sum to be in full of any authorization or appropriation under said joint resolution"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 145: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 145, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"For repairs to the Guilford battle grounds: To enable the Guilford Battle Ground Company to repair the grounds and public buildings of said company on said battle grounds, $1,000; said amount to be disbursed on the order of the president of the said company, and the United States shall be at no further expense in the future for repairs or other expenses relating to said battle grounds."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 160: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 160, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$2,470,478.75"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendments numbered 164 and 165: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 164 and 165, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of the amended paragraph constituting lines 22 to 25, inclusive, on page 93 of the bill, and lines 1 to 4, inclusive, on page 94 of the bill, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"For payment of salaries, fees, and expenses of United States marshals and their deputies, $1,000,000, to include payments for services rendered in behalf of the United States or otherwise."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendments numbered 166, 167, and 168: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 166, 167, and 168, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows; Strike out the amended paragraph constituting lines 5, 6, and 7, on page 94 of the bill, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"For salaries of United States district attorneys and expenses of United States district attorneys and their regular assistants, $275,000."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 170: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 170, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$85,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 171: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 171, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$220,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 172: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 172, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$225,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 173: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 173, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$583,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 174: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 174, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,066,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 175: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 175, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$460,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 177: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 177, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "And such payments shall be allowed the marshal in the settlement of his accounts with the United States"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 178: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 178, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$150,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 187: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 187, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: ": Provided, That hereafter the reports of the Geological Survey in relation to the gauging of streams and to the methods of utilizing the water resources may be printed in octavo form, not to exceed 100 pages in length and 5,000 copies in number; 1,000 copies of which shall be for the official use of the Geological Survey, 1,500 copies shall be delivered to the Senate, and 2,500 copies shall be delivered to the House of Representatives for distribution"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 191: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 191, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 3 of the matter inserted by said amendment insert, after the word "company," the following: "To reimburse said company for expenses incurred and paid in connection with the Government building and exhibit"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference have been unable to agree on the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 12, 13, 15, 16, 17, 22, 23, 24, 25, 28, 32, 61, 91, 92, 93, 94, 96, 97, 109, 111, 112, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 140, 141, 146, 147, and 161.

J. G. CANNON,
E. J. HAINER,
JOSEPH D. SAYERS,
Managers on the part of the House.

W. B. ALLISON,
EUGENE HALE,
A. P. GORMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. CANNON (when the reading of the conference report had begun). I ask that the reading of the conference report be dispensed with, and that simply the statement of the House conferees be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks to dispense with the reading of the conference report. Is there objection?

Mr. KEM. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KEM] objects.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the report.

The following statement of the House conferees was also read:

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7664) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year 1897 submit the following written statement in explanation of the accompanying conference report, namely:

The conference report as submitted differs from the conference report submitted on the 22d instant in respect to the following amendments only:

On amendment numbered 115: Appropriates $500, as proposed by the Senate, for the arsenal at Columbia, Tenn.

On amendment numbered 120: Strikes out the appropriation of $1,500 proposed by the Senate for a children's playground in East Washington.

On amendments numbered 138, 139, 142, and 143: Appropriates for river and harbor works under contract as follows:

At Philadelphia, $300,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $480,000, as proposed by the House;

At Mobile, Ala., $160,000, as proposed by the Senate, with the provision that said sum shall be in full of any authorization or appropriation under the joint resolution approved March 16, 1896;

At Point Judith, R. I., $300,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $240,000, as proposed by the House; and

At Humboldt, Cal., $225,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $159,000, as proposed by the House.

On amendment numbered 144: Appropriates $2,058, as proposed by the Senate, for purchase and use of land included in the military cemetery at Key West, Fla.

On amendment numbered 145: Appropriates $1,000 for repairs to the Guilford battle grounds, with a provision that the United States shall be at no further expense in the future for repairs or other expenses relating to said battle grounds.

On amendment numbered 183: Strikes out the appropriation of $12,500 proposed by the Senate to purchase from Gen. James D. McBride 2,500 sets of his "historical publications."

The conference committee have been unable to agree on the following amendments, namely:

On amendments numbered 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 12, 13, 15, 16, 17, and 22, relating to public buildings, as follows:

Boise City, Idaho, increasing limit of cost from $150,000 to $300,000, and appropriating $50,000;

Camden, N. J., increasing limit and appropriating $25,000;

Cheyenne, Wyo., increasing limit from $150,000 to $250,000, and appropriating $50,000;

Fortress Monroe, Va., for post-office building, $15,000;

Helena, Mont., increasing limit from $150,000 to $300,000, and appropriating $50,000;

Kansas City, Mo., increasing limit from $1,200,000 to $1,316,000;

Little Rock, Ark., increasing limit and appropriating $43,000;

Sioux Falls, S. Dak., appropriating $700 for bathroom and lavatory;

Martinsburg, W. Va., appropriating $5,000 for approaches;

Omaha, Nebr., appropriating $100,000, instead of $70,000, as proposed by the House;

St. Paul, appropriating $125,000, instead of $60,000, as proposed by the House;

Savannah, Ga., increasing limit $100,000, and appropriating $25,000;

Salt Lake City, Utah, appropriating $75,000 for site and commencement of building; and

New York City, post-office building, appropriating $60,000 for alterations.

On amendments numbered 23, 24, and 25, reducing the appropriations proposed by the House for work and improvements at the Marine Hospital at Chicago, $1,500.

On amendments numbered 28 and 32, appropriating $30,000 for range lights in Sandusky Bay, Ohio, and $15,000 for a light-house on Swan Island, in the Caribbean Sea.

On amendment numbered 61, appropriating $250,000 for an additional fireproof building for the use of the National Museum.

On amendments numbered 91, 92, and 93, relating to the lighting of the Capitol Grounds by electricity.

On amendment numbered 94, appropriating $55,000 for ventilation of the Senate wing of the Capitol.

On amendment numbered 96, increasing the appropriation for surveys and resurveys of public lands from $250,000 to $400,000.

On amendment numbered 97, relating to the reclamation of arid lands.

On amendment numbered 109, appropriating $35,000 to enable the Government to take part in the International Exposition at Brussels, Belgium.

On amendments numbered 111 and 112, relating to the editing of papers and archives of the Revolution.

On amendments numbered 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, and 129, relating to the price to be paid for gas and electric lamps in the public grounds.

On amendments numbered 140 and 141, relating to the improvement of the Columbia River.

On amendments numbered 146 and 147, relating to the support and medical treatment of destitute patients and to the Providence and Garfield hospitals.

On amendment numbered 161, relating to the disbursement of appropriations for the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

The Senate, by its amendments, added to the bill $6,577,257.10. Of this sum, under the terms of the conference agreement and the action of the House when the bill was last considered, the House agrees to $2,487,628; the Senate recedes from $3,003,450, and there remains in dispute $1,086,179.10.

J. G. CANNON,
E. J. HAINER,
JOSEPH D. SAYERS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CANNON. I move that the conference report as just read be adopted.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. CANNON. I now move that the House further insist on its disagreement to the amendments still open, and agree to the further conference asked by the Senate.

Mr. TERRY rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY]?

Mr. TERRY. I desire to make a motion that the House concur in Senate amendment numbered 9.

Mr. CANNON. I suppose that motion would be in order.

Mr. TERRY. That is the amendment relating to the court-house and post-office building at Little Rock, Ark.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman desire to discuss the matter?

Mr. TERRY. Yes, sir; I should like to say a few words.

Mr. CANNON. Will five minutes suffice?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to know whether there are any other of these amendments on which a separate vote is asked.

Mr. LESTER. I desire to move concurrence in amendment numbered 16.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I wish to move that the House recede from its disagreement to amendment numbered 22, and concur in that amendment.

Mr. DAYTON. I ask a separate vote upon amendment numbered 12, on which I desire to move concurrence.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. And I ask a separate vote on amendment numbered 3.

Mr. CANNON. I now move that upon the remaining amendments the House further insist on its disagreement.

The SPEAKER. That motion covers all the remaining amendments, except those numbered, respectively, 3, 9, 12, 16, and 22.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The first question now is upon amendment numbered 3.

Mr. BLUE. What is that?

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

For public building at Camden, N. J.: For construction of building, $25,000; and the limit of cost of said building is increased $125,000.

Mr. CANNON. I wish to say only a word touching this matter. It may be a very desirable thing to extend the limit with reference to the public building at Camden, N. J., $125,000; but after the action that the House took touching these public-building items the other day, when this subject was fully discussed, I will simply say that I should like to have this question disposed of by the House one way or the other. If the House wants to concur, well and good; but if it desires to insist on nonconcurrence I hope the Senate in the next conference will recede.

Mr. BLUE. Did we not vote to nonconcur in this amendment?

Mr. CANNON. We did.

Mr. BLUE. Why, then, is it brought back now and made an exception?

Mr. CANNON. It is a matter of difference between the House and the Senate. We report that difference; and it is in order for gentlemen to move to concur. We have taken a vote now on all the amendments except five, upon which gentlemen have asked separate votes, as they desire to move concurrence. This is one of them.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. If the House concurs in this amendment of the Senate, let me ask the gentleman if it is not, in his judgment, a plain discrimination against public buildings in the far Western cities?

Mr. CANNON. Well, I think the House understands about that. Gentlemen understand how many public buildings have been passed at this session for those far Western places.

But one thing certain, we are not going to get public buildings authorized this session; and we are not going to get them because the Senate does not take a hundred public buildings and put them in one amendment and distribute them throughout the whole country and then attach the amendment to a general appropriation bill. [Laughter.] If the Senate did that, I am satisfied the House would concur. But they have not, and therefore we are not going to get public buildings, and it is not for me to say whether the House wants to make an exception in any particular case or not. I answer the gentleman's question in that way.

I am well acquainted with the honorable gentleman who represents that district in New Jersey; I like him. I am well acquainted with the Senator who represents that State, and I like him. [Laughter.] I understand that Camden is a large city; a growing city that needs this public building, and needs it badly. Now the matter is with the House. If you see proper, under all the circumstances, to adopt the amendment, I have nothing more to say. I am here merely, for the time being, as the servant of the House on this conference; and it is for the House to determine what it will do.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. You have not yet answered my question, with all deference, as to whether or not the adoption of this amendment would not be a plain and a palpable discrimination against the capitals of the Western States which have no public buildings at all.

Mr. CANNON. Well, Camden in that event would have the limit broken, and the others would not have the limit broken; that is all.

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. They would be left entirely out.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. Then there is less merit in these otners, or more merit in Camden than in them?

Mr. CANNON. I do not say that. There is merit in many other places. But it is impossible to do much, if anything, in that line at this session. That is plain.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Speaker, it is not a question of liking or disliking, as presented in this amendment, and I do not think it a good reason that Camden should be made an exception because it has a very lovable Representative on this floor. There are very many cities, in the Western country especially—and I am more familiar with them than the East—that are equally deserving.

Mr. NORTHWAY. On the same ground. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLUE. On the same ground, the gentleman from Ohio suggests, and I accept the amendment. But they are also more deserving, or equally deserving, at least, on other grounds.

The gentleman from Idaho has made a very pertinent suggestion, and addressed an inquiry to the gentleman from Illinois, which, I regret to say, my good friend from Illinois, the chairman of this committee, did not answer with his usual promptness and candor.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I aimed to be candid. I said the situation is this, and explained it. I had no intention, certainly, of covering up anything.

Mr. BLUE. Certainly not. I did not mean to intimate that my friend had done so, or to criticise him, especially in such a matter as this. But possibly, under the impulse of the moment, whether hypnotized or not by the lovable characteristics of the member from New Jersey, I fear the gentleman who represents the committee is a little too much disposed to be lenient in this particular case.

It seems to me that we ought to see, as a matter of common justice to all, that exceptions are not made in regard to these public buildings in which all parts of the country are equally interested.

Mr. CANNON. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LOUDENSLAGER].

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, in regard to the necessity for a public building at Camden, N. J., I desire to say simply and briefly, in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE], that that necessity does not rest on the likes or dislikes of a member who represents New Jersey on this floor, but rests solely upon the merits of the case itself.

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in the previous Congress, after having had the matter under consideration and after a full investigation, decided that a public building for Camden was necessary, and that it was for the best interests of the Federal Government and the officials located there.

As I said to the House on a previous occasion when this matter was pending, and the gentleman from Kansas, if present, will remember the fact, before a title to the site was obtained by the Government officials, so much delay had been occasioned that the amount of money necessary for the construction of the buildings proper, so as to be sufficiently commodious to accommodate the public business there, was not contained in the appropriation. The amount appropriated was insufficient, and the Secretary of the Treasury, under the advice of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, refused to contract for the building for the amount of funds at his disposal.

Since that time the city has almost doubled itself in population. The receipts of the post-office at that place have more than doubled—almost trebled. The post-office receipts when this building was authorized amounted to about $23,000. They now amount to $68,000 per annum, and there is located there an internal-revenue collector and a collector of the port.

The site of this building, already obtained by the Government, in the center of that important city, has been boarded up and is now boarded up in some places, while a part of the inclosure has been torn down in others and in some places entirely torn down. One of the buildings that were on the site has remained there ever since. It has been partially destroyed. The shutters have been torn off, the window lights are out, the doors are open, and the building is a constant nuisance, right in the center of that city of 70,000 population. It seems to me that when a matter of such importance, of such merit, is presented to the House, it ought not to be decided upon a question of likes or dislikes, but it ought to be decided upon the merits of the case. That city of 70,000 population ought to have a public building. The Federal Government, for the purpose of conducting its Federal business, requires it, and I hope that the members of this House will give this measure fair, just, and honest consideration.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I should like about three minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I yield to my friend such time as he desires.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I am very glad the gentleman from New Jersey has made the speech he has, because it is exactly applicable to the city of Akron, in my district, a city of some 40,000 or 50,000 inhabitants, where a public building was authorized some years ago, and after purchasing the ground there was not money enough left so that the Department was authorized to enter into any contract. We need a larger building, and must have one.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

Mr. NORTHWAY. Yes.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. If you will present that matter in the House I shall gladly vote for your bill.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Yes, but here is the difficulty: When I go to the proper committee to inquire about it they turn me down, as they have turned down all others, and I find no fault, because they have treated me as they have treated others; but if this House should authorize a public building for the city of Camden, N. J., which is not yet commenced, I should like to know why they should not authorize it for the city of Akron, in my district. If I vote for one, why should I not vote for the other? If you vote for one, why should you not vote for the other?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I will.

Mr. NORTHWAY. No exception should be made in favor of Camden. There are a good many other cities that desire the same thing. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have declined to listen or to consider the other cases at all, and why should we make an exception of this? I submit that it would not be fair to the other sections of the country.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I do not desire to make an exception. I shall gladly vote for the public building in the city which the gentleman refers to whenever the opportunity is presented.

Mr. NORTHWAY. But there are fifty other similar cases here.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend that there is no amendment concerning Akron in this bill.

Mr. NORTHWAY. No; because they would not put it on, as the Senate did in favor of Camden, N. J. In the House the same Committee on Appropriations turned down both projects.

Mr. HOPKINS. Is not Ohio represented in the Senate? [Laughter.]

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. I should like a little time.

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. It seems to me the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTHWAY] has correctly stated this matter, and that the gentleman from Illinois only emphasizes it. If we make two or three exceptions, as will be the case if we vote in favor of these amendments upon which separate votes have been requested, then all the rest of the country will suffer. We are willing to suffer if we can all suffer alike, but we are not willing to suffer when some one else does not suffer. When an amendment is put upon this bill in the Senate, and it comes over here without any report from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of this House, it has no sanction whatever so far as this House is concerned, and it has never received any consideration here. I am not calling in question the truthfulness of the statements of the gentleman, but this question has never received any consideration at the hands of this House. Now, would it be proper to make it an exception and leave all of these other cases out? Should all of these other cities be left out which have no public buildings and which are in great need of them? Should my State and other States suffer, while an exception is made in this case? Mr. Speaker, there is but one proper course in this matter. Let us follow the right rule of legislation, and let us not concur in these amendments of the Senate, but let us stand by the action of the House and of the committees of this House and vote in favor of nonconcurring in each of these Senate amendments.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. You are willing to vote for all meritorious and just bills, are you not?

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. I am when they come in the proper way; but I am not willing to vote for a bill because it is meritorious when it comes here in an exceptional way, because that is against the interest of all other similar bills which can not be reached in the same way.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I do not think this is against the interest of the others.

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. It certainly is, because you can not reach all these other bills in the same way.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. We have never had any chance to consider any of these bills in the House.

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. We have had no chance to consider this bill, nor has it received any consideration in this House.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I would say to the gentleman that I am credibly informed that the matter has received consideration in the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. I am a member of that committee, and I am credibly informed that the bill has not received consideration at the hands of the committee.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. It has been considered by the committee.

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. It has not received consideration that amounts to final consideration.

Mr. KIEFER. It has not received such consideration as to be reported.

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. No consideration amounts to anything except it be a final consideration. It has been talked about, if that is consideration; but it has received no action at the hands of that committee of the House.

Mr. CANNON. I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the amendment of the Senate.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 61.

So the House refused to concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report amendment numbered 9.

The Clerk read as follows:

For court-house and post-office at Little Rock, Ark.: For additional amount to construct an addition to the United States court-house and post-office and enlarging judge's chamber and the offices of the marshal and clerk of the circuit and district courts, and for an elevator, $43,000.

Mr. CANNON. I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, this is not a new project at all. It has received consideration. The Congress preceding this adopted a proposition to improve this building. It is urgently demanded; and the question now is simply as to whether this House will vote the amount of money recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury in his report sent to the Speaker at the present session. I hold the report in my hand in which is shown the great necessity for this work. So the point can not be made that it has not been considered and been determined upon. That has already been done. To show the imperative need for this work I will again call the attention of this House to a letter from the Federal judge, because it relates especially to the United States court building:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, EIGHTH CIRCUIT.
Little Rock, March 23, 1892.

MY DEAR SIR: I have just seen a copy of your bill relating to the United States building in this city.

I have said and written so much about this building in the past that I have grown weary of the subject. My letters are on file in Washington protesting against laying the foundations of the building under the limitations and restrictions of the act making the first appropriation.

I said then, and time has verified the correctness of my judgment, that the building which it was proposed to erect would be found totally inadequate to accommodate the public officers and business expected to be provided for within its walls. I knew this was so so far as it related to the United States courts.

I pleaded for two court rooms, or a judge's chambers large enough for a chambers court room, but all in vain. There is but one court room, and the judge's chambers is barely large enough to contain my bookcases, a table, and two or three chairs.

The result is that when there are two judges here and it is desirable to hold two courts at the same time, as it frequently is, we are unable to do so except when the county court-house is not in use and is loaned to us, or we can get in the State house.

The want of another court room is a source of expense to the Government and of delay and costs to parties and witnesses.

The circuit court of appeals ought to hold its winter sessions at this place, and doubtless would do so if we had a court room, but under existing conditions it is out of the question.

I know nothing about the wants of the other departments. I only know that the present building does not furnish adequate accommodations for the United States courts.

Yours, truly,
HENRY C. CALDWELL,
Circuit Judge.

Hon. W. L. TERRY, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

Now, gentlemen, here you have a proposition, the policy of which and the necessity for which has already been determined upon by Congress. It is a matter of such urgent necessity that a special recommendation has been sent in to the Speaker of this House, asking that this appropriation should be made. The estimate is here and this proposition stands upon different ground to any that has been presented. Now, I appeal to the House that, in a spirit of justice and with a sense of fair play, it will concur in this amendment. Although the building in which I am interested may be beaten, I shall not stand here to aid in the dog-in-the-manager policy that some have advocated upon this floor, and say that no man shall have a public building because I got none. I will vote for a public building where it is shown to be so urgently needed, or in a special case like this. I ask the House, in that spirit of fairness which I hope will control the vote upon this matter, to allow us the poor privilege of having a United States court-house adequate to the public business, and not to put this great Government in the humiliating position of having to depend upon the courtesy of a county in order to have a building in which to hold its court.

Mr. KEM. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules it.

Mr. CANNON. I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to concur in the Senate amendment.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. TERRY. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 41, noes 72.

Mr. TERRY. I ask for tellers.

The question was taken on ordering tellers.

The SPEAKER. Twenty-eight gentlemen have arisen—not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused. On this question the ayes are 41, the noes 72——

Mr. KEM. Now I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the point is raised too late, tellers having been demanded and refused. The noes have it, and the amendment of the Senate is nonconcurred in.

Mr. CANNON. I ask for a vote on the text.

The Clerk read as follows:

For court-house and post-office at Martinsburg, W. Va.: For completion of approaches, $5,000.

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I think the members of this House upon calm consideration of the circumstances at Martinsburg will certainly make an exception. [Laughter.] It does not appear to me possible that members of this House, knowing the situation and condition of things, will say that this case is similar to the other cases in regard to public buildings. Surely it has not come to pass that this great Government of ours will haggle over the matter of clearing away the rubbish around one of its public buildings so as to afford to those who have business to transact in the court-house at Martinsburg some other means of approach to that building than a pine plank. I do not believe it is possible that we are going to take such a position as that when the small sum of $5,000 is all that is necessary to get rid of the rubbish and put in order the approaches to the building, the structure itself being completed and occupied, especially when the present condition of the approaches to that building is in violation of the municipal regulation which requires the Government as well as other owners of property to put down sidewalks. I trust that members will not go to the extent of voting against this item simply because they say they can not have their own appropriation or bills passed.

Mr. CANNON. Just a word, Mr. Speaker. The facts about the public building at Martinsburg are these: For two or three years past that building has been completed and occupied by the Government for both court and post-office purposes. There is no money to the credit of that building. The approaches from the street to a public building can not be constructed from the general appropriation for repairs.

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. This building has sidewalks around it, has it not?

Mr. CANNON. I understand that there are temporary sidewalks there. It is for the House to say what they will do with this amendment. I only want gentlemen to understand that this is not for any addition to the building—that this is a completed and occupied building.

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. If I understood the statement of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON] correctly, this appropriation is asked for to build sidewalks around the property of the Government. Am I correct?

Mr. DAYTON. It is for the approaches to the building.

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. Is it for the sidewalks or for work on the grounds belonging to the building?

Mr. DAYTON. It is for the approaches and for the removal of the rubbish that is on the ground.

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. Then it is not for the purpose of building sidewalks?

Mr. DAYTON. Yes, sir; sidewalks and approaches to the building. The building itself has been completed.

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. Then, Mr. Speaker, the objection to this is twofold. For fifteen years Congress has not made any allowance for streets and sidewalks around public buildings.

Mr. CANNON. As I understand it, the Government has always taken care of the property on which it puts its buildings out to the property line of the street, making sidewalks and approaches, but for many years past the Government has not been paying for the macadamizing of the streets.

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. So far as walks upon the property itself is concerned, I think the gentleman from Illinois is correct; but the regular sidewalk is a part of the street, and the rule has been as I have stated it so far as my examination has gone. I can say very positively, so far as Indianapolis, the capital of my State, is concerned, that there are now pending in this House before various committees claims to the amount of twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars for improvements of sidewalks and streets made under laws similar to that spoken of by the gentleman from West Virginia requiring the property owners to pay for them.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman is correct about the streets; but our public buildings, so far as I know, stand back from the property line. So far as I have knowledge or belief, the Government universally constructs the approaches upon its own property and the sidewalks around its buildings and out to the property line, or to the street.

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. In answer to that suggestion I would say that if there is a city in the United States that has the ordinary sidewalks which accompany our streets situated upon the property of the United States and not upon the street, I do not know of it. In the cases that I speak of the sidewalks along the Government property are within the line of the highway, the same as they are along private property, and, as I understood the gentleman from West Virginia, these sidewalks about the building in question are a part of the street, so that property owners are required by the local regulations or by the law of West Virginia to construct them.

Now, certainly the local authorities there would have no right to order the Government to make sidewalks upon its own property, so that can not be the ground upon which this appropriation is asked. The local authorities would, of course, have no jurisdiction whatever over that question. Therefore there must be sidewalks that are parts of the highway, parts of the street, the same as the roadway itself. Now, the rule, as I understand it, has been for at least fifteen years past that no Congress has given an appropriation for the construction of such sidewalks around a public building, unless it may have been put through by such an item as this. What I mean is that no fair, straight-out, honest appropriation has been made for the building of a sidewalk along Government property. The statement is sometimes made here that cities are glad to have public buildings, and that, therefore, they ought to improve the roadways and the sidewalks. Now, I do not believe in that doctrine, but I say it is wrong to single out an exceptional case, put it on this bill by a Senate amendment, and seek to get it through in that way.

Mr. CANNON. After all, the question is not what the gentleman from West Virginia or I may say touching this matter. The item speaks for itself:

For court-house and post-office at Martinsburg, W. Va.—

Now comes the operative language—

For completion of approaches, $5,000.

Mr. DAYTON. That is all of it.

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. If the gentleman from West Virginia says it does not include streets or sidewalks——

Mr. CANNON. If the intention were to include streets or sidewalks the money would not be available under the language I have just read.

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. I will say that I have no information on this subject except the statement of the gentleman from West Virginia the other day, and have based my objection on his statement.

Mr. DOVENER. Mr. Speaker, I inspected these grounds yesterday. When the building was completed the ground was covered with stone and was not graded. The object, as I understand, of this appropriation is to clear and improve a walk of probably 40 or 50 feet from the building to the street. The sidewalk in front of the grounds—only about 8 feet wide and 100 feet long—is entirely outside of the matter spoken of in this appropriation.

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. Will it take $5,000 to grade the lot and make the necessary improvement which the gentleman speaks of?

Mr. DOVENER. I suppose it would, on account of the size of the lot. A portion of it is not even graded; there are deep places which have to be filled up.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment numbered 12 and concur in the same.

Mr. KEM. I again make the point that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER (after counting the House). One hundred and forty-two members are present; not a quorum.

Mr. CANNON. It is now nearly half past 5 o'clock, and I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 28, 1896.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. LODGE, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

ACCIDENTS TO NAVAL VESSELS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in response to a resolution of April 17, 1896, a list of accidents furnished by the Bureaus of Construction and Repair and Steam Engineering, showing the principal accidents that have occurred to naval vessels within the period mentioned, the causes thereof, and the damages resulting therefrom; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

TENNESSEE CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. DUBOIS, Mr. GIBSON, Mr. ALLEN, Mr. BROWN, and Mr. BATE, under the resolution of May 12, 1896, as the committee to attend the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the admission of the State of Tennessee into the Federal Union, to be held at the city of Nashville, Tenn., on the 1st day of June next.

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6739) for the relief of John N. Quackenbush, late a commander in the United States Navy.

Mr. HALE. I call for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded. Petitions and memorials are in order.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. McMILLAN presented the petition of James F. Dodge and 116 other citizens of Detroit, Mich., who earn their living in Canada, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called McCall immigration bill, on the ground that it may necessitate their removal to Canada; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DAVIS presented a petition of sundry citizens of Minneapolis, Minn., praying for the Government ownership and control of the telegraph lines; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of the common council of St. Paul, Minn., praying for the enactment of legislation extending aid for a governmental exhibit at the transmississippi and international exhibition to be held at Omaha, Nebr., in 1898; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CANNON presented a petition of the legislature of the State of Utah, praying that an appropriation be made for the support of the Shebit Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House joint memorial.

To the Congress of the United States:

Your memorialists, the governor and legislature of the State of Utah, respectfully ask your favorable action in the matter herein set out. In Washington County, this State, are a few families of Indians, known as the Shebits. Some years ago, through the action of your honorable body and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, a small appropriation was secured for these Indians and disbursed, under the direction of Hon. A. W. Ivins, of Washington County, in providing farms, houses, mules, wagons, and other utensils for general farming. The Indians at once settled down and went to work and have been working steadily ever since, their progress being most gratifying, and there having been something of an increase of their numbers. But through constant use and the lapse of time some of the mules are dead, the implements are in many cases broken down or altogether worn out, and further assistance is needed.

The testimony of those who have had opportunity to observe is that the money spent on these Indians was well spent, and they are progressing toward civilization and a self-supporting condition as rapidly as possible.

Your memorialists, in view of the premises, would therefore ask a further appropriation of $10,000, to be applied as needed for the relief of these Indians, under the direction of some reputable citizen of Washington County, and, hoping your immediate and favorable action thereon, we will ever pray.

GEORGE M. CANNON,
President of the Senate.
PRESLEY DENNY,
Speaker of the House.

Approved April 3, 1896.

HEBER M. WELLS,
Governor of Utah.

STATE OF UTAH, Department of State, ss:

I, James T. Hammond, secretary of state of the State of Utah, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a full, true, and correct copy of house joint memorial No. 3, approved April 3, 1896, as appears on file in my office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Utah this 21st day of May, A. D. 1896.

J. T. HAMMOND,
Secretary of State.

Mr. WHITE. I present a memorial, forwarded to me by telegraph, of the Chamber of Commerce of Los Angeles, Cal., remonstrating against the passage of House bill No. 8536 and Senate bill No. 2967, proposing to amend section 10 of the interstate-commerce law. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BRICE presented a memorial of the Medical Society of Cleveland, Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of Senate bill No. 1552, for the further prevention of cruelty to animals in the District of Columbia; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Encampment No. 124, Union Veteran Legion, of Erie County, Ohio, praying for the enactment of a service-pension law; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of the Ohio State Grange, of sundry citizens of Ohio, and of the Ohio Cheese Manufacturers' Association, of Cleveland, Ohio, praying for the passage of the so-called filled-cheese bill; which were ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PETTIGREW, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3188) to ratify an agreement with the Indians of the Shoshone or Wind River Reservation, Wyo., and making an appropriation to carry the same into effect, establishing the Wyoming Hot Springs Reservation, and making an appropriation for the survey thereof, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3167) to grant to the Hudson Reservoir and Canal Company of Arizona the right of way through the Gila River Indian Reservation, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6259) to expedite the delivery of imported parcels and packages not exceeding $500 in value, to report it with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. I give notice that I shall ask the Senate at an early day to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. BATE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2874) to provide for the construction of a graveled road from the termination of the graveled road and bridge on the north side of Cache River, in Pulaski County, Ill., to the national military cemetery near Mound City, in Pulaski County, Ill., and for other purposes, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BACON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1968) for the relief of the Mobile Marine Dock Company, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BRICE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 979) granting a pension to Frances E. Helfenstein, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2358) for the relief of Arminda White, widow of Israel White, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PASCO, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1178) conveying to Rafael Seguro, of Iberia Parish, La., the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to certain lands in said parish of Iberia, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

INVESTIGATION BY COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. CHANDLER, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the expense incurred by the subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs in visiting Bethlehem, Pa., in pursuance of the duty imposed on said committee by resolutions of the Senate dated, respectively, December 31, 1895, and February 13, 1896, be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

EMPLOYEES OF GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

Mr. PRITCHARD. I am directed by the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, who were authorized by the resolution of March 23, 1896, to investigate and report upon the administration of the civil-service law in the Government Printing Office, etc., to submit a report thereon. I ask that the report be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, having had under consideration the following resolution, which was adopted by the Senate on the 23d day of March, 1896:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment be, and is hereby, empowered to fully investigate and report upon the administration of the civil-service law in the Government Printing Office as affecting the separation from service of the 35 ex-employees referred to in the printed correspondence furnished the Senate under Senate resolution of January 29, 1896"— report as follows: Your committee have examined all the parties who desired to be heard in the matter, and herewith attach a copy of the statement of each individual who appeared before the committee. There were only two questions arising before the committee for consideration, to wit:

When did the order of the President placing the Government Printing Office under the civil service go into effect?

Second. Were the parties employed on the temporary roll at the time of the adoption of the order entitled to be classified and placed on the list of eligibles?

Your committee deem it unnecessary to state any conclusion in regard to the questions suggested, and therefore submit to the Senate the statement of the witnesses, without recommendation.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 3234) donating condemned cannon and cannon balls to the Ohio Soldiers and Sailors' Home, Erie County, Ohio; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. KYLE (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3235) to regulate labor and business on Sunday in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a bill (S. 3236) to remove the charge of desertion from Patrick H. McCall, late an enlisted man in the United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. STEWART introduced a bill (S. 3237) granting a pension to Annie Fowler; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BRICE introduced a bill (S. 3238) to amend the military record of Silas Graham; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HALE introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 153) authorizing the compilation of the United States customs laws and regulations thereon, the decisions in relation thereto of the Federal courts, the Treasury Department, the United States general appraisers, and the opinions of the Attorneys-General; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

IMPORTATIONS BY EXPRESS COMPANIES.

Mr. GIBSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6259) to expedite the delivery of imported parcels and packages not exceeding $500 in value, imported by express companies, or other duly incorporated inland carriers; which was ordered to be printed.

REGULATIONS CONCERNING ADULTERATED BEER.

Mr. CARTER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 8008) defining cheese, and also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of filled cheese; which was ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, it was Ordered, That the adverse report in the case of William B. Matchett be withdrawn from the files of the Senate under the rules of the Senate.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. PASCO, it was Ordered, That the petition of Fernando I. Moreno be taken from the files in the Secretary's office and referred to the Committee on Claims.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I desire to call up the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. WALTHALL. I object to the consideration of that report at this time. It will lead to quite a protracted debate.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I suppose if the question of consideration is raised it will be submitted to a vote of the Senate, and that I desire.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota move to proceed to the consideration of the report?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Yes; I move that the report be taken up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Dakota, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 24, noes not counted.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CULLOM. What is the use? The "ayes" have it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. There was no quorum voting on the division.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PALMER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH]. He has not voted, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. PRITCHARD (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD].

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON]. Otherwise I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CARTER. I desire to announce a pair between the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON] and my colleague [Mr. MANTLE]. I make the announcement for the day.

Mr. DUBOIS. I inquire if the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. DUBOIS. I am paired with that Senator, but will transfer my pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] and vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—41.

Aldrich,	Dubois,	Mills,	Sewell,
Allison,	Elkins,	Mitchell, Oreg.	Sherman,
Berry,	Gallinger,	Morgan,	Shoup,
Burrows,	Hale,	Morrill,	Teller,
Butler,	Hawley,	Nelson,	Turpie,
Cannon,	Hill,	Perkins,	Vest,
Carter,	Jones, Ark.	Pettigrew,	Warren,
Chilton,	Lodge,	Platt,	Wilson.
Cockrell,	McBride,	Proctor,
Cullom,	McMillan,	Quay,

NAYS—13.

Bacon,	George,	Mitchell, Wis.	White.
Bate,	Gorman,	Pasco,
Brown,	Harris,	Peffer,
Chandler,	Kyle,	Walthall,

NOT VOTING—35.

Allen,	Daniel,	Irby,	Squire,
Baker,	Faulkner,	Jones, Nev.	Stewart,
Blackburn,	Frye,	Lindsay,	Thurston,
Blanchard,	Gear,	Mantle,	Tillman,
Brice,	Gibson,	Murphy,	Vilas,
Caffery,	Gordon,	Palmer,	Voorhees,
Call,	Gray,	Pritchard,	Wetmore,
Cameron,	Hansbrough,	Pugh,	Wolcott.
Clark,	Hoar,	Smith,

So the motion was agreed to.

ALCOHOL IN THE ARTS.

The bill (H. R. 3282) to repeal section 61 of an act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, which became a law August 28, 1894, was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HARRIS. I believe the conference report has been taken up?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is before the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. So soon as the conference report is disposed of I shall ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to allow me to report the bill that has just been referred to the Finance Committee. That committee, having anticipated the reference, considered the measure this morning. I shall report the bill back as soon as the pending matter is disposed of, if I can get the floor, and will ask the Senate to allow me to make a statement of about two minutes and a half, when I shall appeal to the Senate for unanimous consent to consider the bill this morning.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to lend to the mayors of the cities of East St. Louis, Ill., St. Louis, Mo., and vicinity, a sufficient number of tents to temporarily shelter such citizens as may have lost their homes by the tornado of yesterday, and to render such other relief in the premises as he may deem necessary; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

SUFFERERS BY TORNADO IN ILLINOIS AND MISSOURI.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the concurrent resolution just received from the House of Representatives.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized to lend to the mayors of the cities of East St. Louis, Ill., St. Louis, Mo., and vicinity, under such regulations and restrictions as he may deem proper, a sufficient number of tents to temporarily shelter such citizens of said cities as may have lost their homes by the tornado of yesterday, and to render such other relief in the premises as he may deem necessary.

Mr. PALMER. The Senate is fully advised of the terrible calamity which has befallen St. Louis, and more particularly East St. Louis, Ill. I ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, of course it would be a very ungracious and ungrateful proceeding, perhaps, upon my part to offer any opposition to the resolution. Yet I am compelled to say that I do not think there is any necessity for its passage. Recent advices, telegrams received within the last half hour, show that the accounts of this great disaster, which is a great one, have been terribly exaggerated, as is always the case in the first hours of a calamity.

I wish to say for the city of St. Louis and the State of Missouri, without boasting, that that city and that State can take care of their people under these or any other circumstances. I have myself received no information that tents are needed. No harm can be done by passing the resolution, but I wish to express my dissent from the custom which has obtained in all instances of States and communities which are entirely capable of meeting any exigency themselves rushing impulsively to the seat of the Government of the United States at all times and asking assistance. I myself do not like that practice. But, of course, if the Senators from Illinois, speaking for their constituents, want to have the resolution passed, I shall make no objection to it.

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to suggest whether the resolution ought not to be made a joint resolution instead of a concurrent one. I hardly think it safe to pass it as a concurrent resolution, as it is evidently in conflict with existing law. I shall interpose no objection, but I am in full sympathy with the views expressed by the Senator.

Mr. PALMER. I did not quite understand the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HARRIS. My suggestion is that the resolution should be made a joint resolution instead of a concurrent one, inasmuch as it changes existing law; and I will say to the Senator, the House having passed the resolution, that if such an amendment should be made I do not think it will involve a delay of two hours, because I think the House, which passed the resolution, would concur in such an amendment at once.

Mr. PALMER. I am impressed with the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee, and I will move the amendment according to his suggestion. I move that the resolution be made a joint resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be amended by inserting the resolving clause of a joint resolution instead of a concurrent resolution. The joint resolution will be considered as having been twice read, and is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CULLOM. I simply desire to say that this is a House resolution, and while I agree with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] that there is probably no occasion for its passage, because I am very much gratified to learn that the loss of life and property there is not so great as was reported by the papers this morning, and that our respective States will be able to take care of all the interests of our people on both sides of the river, yet as the House has passed it I suggest it might be well for us to agree to it.

I desire to state further that I am very much worried over the reports which come from the Illinois side of the river. The last report which was shown me a moment ago stated that the loss of life was much greater on the east side of the river than on the Missouri side. But on whichever side the greatest suffering has occurred, I have no doubt the officials of the States will take care of the people. I hope the joint resolution will be passed, inasmuch as it comes from the other body.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to lend to the mayors of the cities of East St. Louis, Ill., and St. Louis, Mo., and vicinity, a number of tents."

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report of the committee of conference will be read.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6249) making appropriations for current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 66.

Amendment numbered 37: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 37, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: Add at the end of said amendment the following:

"That said Commission is further authorized and directed to proceed at once to hear and determine the application of all persons who may apply to them for citizenship in any of said nations, and after such hearing they shall determine the right of such applicant to be so admitted and enrolled: Provided, however, That such application shall be made to such Commissioners within three months after the passage of this act. The said Commission shall decide all such applications within ninety days after the same shall be made. That in determining all such applications said Commission shall respect all laws of the several nations or tribes, not inconsistent with the laws of the United States, and all treaties with either of said nations or tribes, and shall give due force and effect to the rolls, usages, and customs of each of said nations or tribes: And provided further, That the rolls of citizenship of the several tribes as now existing are hereby confirmed, and any person who shall claim to be entitled to be added to said rolls as a citizen of either of said tribes and whose right thereto has either been denied or not acted upon, or any citizen who may within three months from and after the passage of this act desire such citizenship, may apply to the legally constituted court or committee designated by the several tribes for such citizenship, and such court or committee shall determine such application within thirty days from the date thereof.

"In the performance of such duties said Commission shall have power and authority to administer oaths, to issue process for and compel the attendance of witnesses, and to send for persons and papers and all depositions and affidavits and other evidence in any form whatsoever heretofore taken where the witnesses giving said testimony are dead or now residing beyond the limits of said Territory, and to use every fair and reasonable means within their reach for the purpose of determining the rights of persons claiming such citizenship, or to protect any of said nations from fraud or wrong, and the rolls so prepared by them shall be hereafter held and considered to be the true and correct rolls of persons entitled to the rights of citizenship in said several tribes: Provided, That if the tribe or any person be aggrieved with the decision of the tribal authorities or the Commission provided for in this act, it or he may appeal from such decision to the United States district court: Provided, however, That the appeal shall be taken within sixty days, and the judgment of the court shall be final.

"That the said Commission, after the expiration of six months, shall cause a complete roll of citizenship of each of said nations to be made up from their records, and add thereto the names of citizens whose right may be conferred under this act, and said rolls shall be, and are hereby, made rolls of citizenship of said nations or tribes, subject, however, to the determination of the United States courts, as provided herein.

"The Commission is hereby required to file the lists of members as they finally approve them with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, to remain there for use as the final judgment of the duly constituted authorities. And said Commission shall also make a roll of freedmen entitled to citizenship in said tribes, and shall include their names in the lists of members to be filed with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. And said Commission is further authorized and directed to make a full report to Congress of leases, tribal and individual, with the area, amount, and value of the property leased and the amount received therefor, and by whom and from whom said property is leased, and is further directed to make a full and detailed report as to the excessive holdings of members of said tribes and others.

"It is hereby declared to be the duty of the United States to establish a government in the Indian Territory which will rectify the many inequalities and discriminations now existing in said Territory, and afford needful protection to the lives and property of all citizens and residents thereof.

"Sisseton and Wahpeton Indians: That all the interest due the Sisseton and Wahpeton Indians on March 3, 1896, is hereby appropriated to be paid at once in cash per capita; and hereafter all interest on the permanent fund of said Indians, after deducting the amount expended for education, shall be paid in cash per capita on the 1st day of November of each year.

"Seneca Nation of Indians: That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to ascertain and report to Congress a detailed statement of all the leases made and entered into by the Seneca Nation of Indians, with all persons or corporations, of all lands in the Allegany Indian Reservation in the State of New York, giving an itemized statement of each and every lease now in existence or force, with the date and terms of each lease, and amount or amounts due on each lease."

And the Senate agree to the same.

On amendments numbered 64, 69, and 70 the committee of conference has been unable to agree.

R. F. PETTIGREW,
H. M. TELLER,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. S. SHERMAN,
CHARLES CURTIS,
GEO. C. PENDLETON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill and who submitted this conference report, before the report is accepted, to what seems to be the main feature, or the only feature of the report, aside from further disagreements:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 37, and agree to the same with amendments as follows:

Add at the end of said amendment the following—

Which is a complete and carefully drawn and extended provision of new law as it has just been read from the desk. The basis of that amendment I find in the bill is amendment 37, which is referred to, and which reads as follows:

For salaries and expenses of the Commissioners appointed under acts of Congress approved March 3, 1893, and March 2, 1895, to negotiate with the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, the sum of $40,000, to be immediately available; and said Commission is directed to continue the exercise of the authority already conferred upon them by law and endeavor to accomplish the objects heretofore prescribed to them and report from time to time to Congress.

That, Mr. President, is a clear, plain provision recognizing existing law, in no degree departing from it, making an appropriation to carry it out, and directing the Commission so to carry out the provisions of existing law. I do not see that any point of order can be made upon that amendment or could have been made at the time it passed the Senate. It is such a provision as is proper in appropriation bills, and is the provision that went to the conference.

I find, further, as to the great body of the new law proposed and reported here from the conference—which was never considered by the Senate and was never adopted in either House, but which is absolutely new—I find, on looking at the debates which arose in the course of the progress of the bill, that nearly identically the same proposition which the conferees have now reported was, upon April 23 last, submitted as an amendment, discussed for days and days, and at last ruled out of order by the Presiding Officer, thereby taking it from the consideration of the Senate; thereby, under the rules, declaring that it was not a proper subject for consideration in Congress on an appropriation bill. The ruling of the Chair is found on page 4312 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD during the session of April 23.

I rose, Mr. President, for the purpose of asking the Senator in charge of the bill, a member of the Committee on Appropriations, a member of large experience in this and the other body, what warrant of authority the committee of conference had to enlarge the simple amendment that is found in the bill which I have read, to ingraft upon it provisions of law that had been before the Senate and rejected under its rules, and also, as I am informed, as to the latter part of the amendment, to ingraft provisions which had never in any form been before the Senate.

I ask this question with some considerable earnestness, because it has been my fortune to serve upon the Committee on Appropriations ever since I have been a member of this body. If there is one thing that ought to be observed with most sacred obligation it is the limitation of committees of conference to subjects-matter that have been before one body or the other. The line is as clearly drawn as the walk between the two Houses in this Capitol. The disagreeing votes of the two Houses is the fundamental proposition upon which conferences are ordered. Without such disagreeing votes no conferences would be ordered or needed; and the domain under which committees of conference must always come is that limited domain. It is the subjects-matter that are in controversy between the Houses. It is subjects-matter that one House insists upon and the other House disagrees to, and one or the other on a compromise definable within the limits of the subject disagreed upon is all that conferences can ever report.

I know it is not only a tradition, but it is the experience and the history of the Committee on Appropriations on the part of the Senate, to insist rigidly upon this rule. Mr. President, if this rule is departed from, if conferees can put new matter into their report and introduce it in this body with the privileges that conference reports have of being always in order and that they can be made at any time, there is no authority, there is no committee, there is no portion of the Senate that has such power to abuse its privilege as conference committees have.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator from Maine whether I understood him to say that the provision reported by the conference committee was substantially the same as the amendment proposed in the Senate to the bill when it was before the Senate and ruled out of order by the Chair?

Mr. HALE. The two provisions are long. I have read them both, but have not had time to compare them. I do not say that they are the same, but I understand that they involve——

Mr. TELLER. They are not the same.

Mr. HALE. No; I do not suppose they are.

Mr. TELLER. They are quite different.

Mr. HALE. I understand they involve the same subjects-matter; that other things have been added to them, and that the subject-matter which was ruled out on a point of order is again introduced in the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. President, I do not know the merits of this controversy. I was not here when it was debated. When the Senator submitted the report and it was printed in the RECORD and I examined the RECORD and saw this long amendment which had been reported from the committee of conference, without consultation with any Senator I went to the RECORD, hunted up the original amendment, and hunted up the debates, because it occurred to me at once that there must be some reason why so great a body of law had been reported here, if the committee had not exceeded its authority.

Mr. President, the Committee on Appropriations ought to be very sensitive about these matters. There is no committee that is so trusted by the Senate as the Committee on Appropriations. It submits its final reports, in many cases, during the last week of the session, when there is no opportunity for critical examination. It submits its amendments agreed to, disagreed to, and amended, generally by numbers, and nothing more than the numbers and amendments are read. Senators know the Committee on Appropriations realize that there is no opportunity for full examination and investigation. The highest duty that is imposed upon the members of the Committee on Appropriations in conference on appropriation bills is to hew to the line of the rule and rigidly refuse to put in any new propositions, no matter how beneficent they are, no matter how desirable they are, no matter if they be consented to by every member of the Senate. The initiative point of the wisest legislation is never with a committee of conference, and it never ought to be there.

It is, therefore, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations that, having the gravest doubt about this matter, I have called the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill—if it can be fully explained, that it comes within the rule and is not new matter. As I said, I know nothing of the merits of the controversy, but I am interested that the committee should not in any way exceed its authority.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Maine please explain, if he is familiar with the report, what was the amendment numbered 37, to which the new matter is now proposed to be added?

Mr. HALE. I have read it once. I will read it again for the Senator.

Mr. HILL. I was not in at the time.

Mr. HALE. It is very simple.

For salaries and expenses of the Commissioners appointed under acts of Congress approved March 3, 1893—

Which I have here—

and March 2, 1895—

Which is only a continuation of the appropriation and providing for two additional Commissioners—to negotiate with the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, the sum of $40,000, to be immediately available.

That is simply an appropriation for the salary under those acts.

And said Commission is directed to continue the exercise of the authority already conferred upon them by law and endeavor to accomplish the objects heretofore prescribed to them and report from time to time to ongress.

As I said while the Senator was not in his seat, that is a very simple provision. It is giving money to carry out the existing law, and in a monitory way, and no further, suggesting to the Commissioners that they proceed to carry out the law. That has been reported by the conference committee, as I have said, as provisions embodying a wide scope of legislation, and I am informed a portion of it was ruled out in the Senate, and that another portion was not considered either by the Senate or the House. I want the Senator in charge of the bill to explain why it is that this departure has been made.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I desire to make a point of order as to whether a conference report containing substantially a provision that was ruled out as not being in order when the bill was before the Senate is now in order as a part of the conference report. I desire to make that point of order, and to state to the Senate the reasons why I believe it to be good.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to call the Senator's attention to the fact that in making the point of order he is assuming that this provision has been ruled out by the Senate. That is incorrect. It is an entirely different proposition.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is a much stronger provision. It contains additional provisions which would have made it much more amenable to the point of order if this had been the amendment that was ruled out of order instead of the one that was ruled out.

Now, I desire to state the reasons why I think this amendment is not in order. A conference report of this kind ought to be out of order under the rules of the Senate, whether it is or is not, because if a long and important amendment making alterations in existing law can be deliberately ruled out upon a point of order, and then can be inserted almost bodily in a conference report, it will be necessary for the Senate to be constantly watching the reports of conference committees.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should like to present a parliamentary inquiry to the Chair, and that is whether a point of order can be made to a conference report? My understanding is that a conference report has to be accepted or rejected as a whole, and that points of order can not be entertained in connection with anything of this kind.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is the very point I am arguing, if the Senator from Arkansas will allow me to proceed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is hearing the discussion on that point. The Chair has not ruled upon it.

Mr. CHANDLER. The very point I am arguing is whether a conference report, the vote upon which must be taken either yea or nay, so that one vote disposes of it, can, according to the rules of the Senate as they ought to be construed, contain a long provision of law that was once deliberately ruled out by the Presiding Officer and his ruling acquiesced in by the Senate.

Mr. President, that is the point of order, and it seems to me that the Chair, and if not the Chair, then the Senate, ought to decide that it is not in order for a conference committee to do what this conference committee has done.

The amendment as it was proposed in the Senate on the 23d day of April provided $40,000 for the salaries of the members of the Dawes Commission, directed the Commission to proceed to make rolls of citizenship of the Five Civilized Tribes, and to make allotments of land to those whom they might find to be citizens. All the provisions in reference to the duties of the Commission were attached to the amendment appropriating $40,000 for continuing the Commission and paying their salaries, and the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has stated the result. After a long debate the Vice-President decided that the amendment was out of order, particularly specifying the powers of a court that were given to the Commission. The whole amendment went out, not only the provision for the salaries to the Commission, but also the legislation changing existing law and providing for a census of the tribes and the allotment of land.

Before the bill was disposed of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] moved an amendment contained on page 4216 of the RECORD, which was a mere appropriation of $40,000 for continuing in existence the Commission and directing them to go on and negotiate with the Indian tribes in accordance with the provisions of existing law.

That provision, which was adopted (it was the first part of the amendment that had been ruled out of order), did not change existing law in any manner. It simply provided for the salaries of the Commissioners and for continuing them in the work which the previous law authorized. All the rest of the amendment was ruled out of order. No appeal was taken; no criticism was made. The Senate acquiesced in the ruling, and, as ex gratia, subsequently consented to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin simply continuing the Commission with its existing powers, and the Senate one and all understood that so far as this bill was concerned that was an end of the question of dealing with the Civilized Tribes by an amendment upon an appropriation bill.

What do we behold? We behold the conference committee doing substantially the very thing which had been held to be out of order—doing substantially what the Senate unanimously acquiesced in as being something which could not be done upon the appropriation bill, and we have the long provision that the Chair will see by glancing at the amendment. The amendment is as long as the other. It is on the same subject-matter. It provides equally with the other amendment for a census of these Indian tribes. But I admit that it has been carefully and cunningly framed to avoid, if possible, any point of order in the Senate, so that, if possible, it may receive the approbation of the Senate, which had once been refused it.

If it can be done in this form upon a conference report, it can be done in precisely the form in which the Senate rejected it. I maintain that proposition with confidence. If it can be done with the amendment as it now stands, the conference committee might have put the very rejected amendment itself upon the bill.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question. Suppose it is not the identical amendment which was ruled out in the Senate. Is it any the less a body of absolutely new legislation that the conference committee had no business to deal with, whether or not it is the same amendment that was ruled out? Is it not new matter?

Mr. CHANDLER. Beyond all question.

Mr. HALE. And upon which there was no disagreement between the Houses?

Mr. CHANDLER. None whatever. The subject-matter which was ruled upon by the Chair has never been discussed between the two Houses, because it never so passed one House that it could be disagreed to by the other.

There is the broad question whether the Senate wishes to approve of this attempt to legislate upon a conference report, even if it is in order to do so. There is the narrower question which I am arguing, whether it is in order to submit to the Senate and compel the Senate to vote upon a conference report which contains a provision of this kind.

Not only do we have the whole subject of dealing with the Five Civilized Tribes—about which the Senate did nothing, about which the House did nothing—disposed of by an amendment to a conference report, but we have two other extraordinary provisions, to which the Senator from Maine has also alluded. There is the following clause on the second page of the report:

Sisseton and Wahpeton Indians: That all the interest due the Sisseton and Wahpeton Indians on March 3, 1890, is hereby appropriated to be paid at once in cash per capita; and hereafter all interest on the permanent fund of said Indians, after deducting the amount expended for education, shall be paid in cash per capita on the 1st day of November of each year.

I do not know how much money that clause appropriates from the Treasury of the United States, but I do know that that clause was not in the House bill; it was not a Senate amendment; and the conference committee have undertaken to usurp to themselves the sole function of legislation by inserting this provision which never was heard of in the House, which never was heard of in the Senate, until the conference report was presented.

Another thing, Mr. President. Curiously enough, there is a provision about the Seneca Nation of Indians:

Seneca Nation of Indians: That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to ascertain and report to Congress a detailed statement of all the leases made and entered into by the Seneca Nation of Indians, with all persons or corporations, of all lands in the Allegany Indian Reservation in the State of New York, giving an itemized statement of each and every lease now in existence or force, with the date and terms of each lease, and amount or amounts due on each lease.

That is an entirely new provision. It does not appropriate any money. It is legislation pure and simple. Whether it is important legislation or whether it is unimportant legislation, it has no place whatever upon a conference report when the subject-matter never was mentioned in the original bill, and never was proposed to the Senate or discussed by the Senate or voted on by the Senate.

This is the most extraordinary parliamentary proceeding I have ever witnessed during my nine years' service in Congress. It is a more extraordinary proposition than I have ever observed or heard of so long as I have observed legislative proceedings anywhere. It is a new departure by the conference committee, made I know not on what conception of their powers and duties, but it is a proceeding which, if it is in order to present it to the Senate and it can not be ruled out of order and the Senate has no way of disposing of it except to vote it down, is going absolutely to revolutionize the methods of doing business in this body.

The Committee on Appropriations of the Senate has enough to carry. It has had difficulty enough hitherto in dealing with the subjects-matter that were committed to the committee. It has had difficulty enough in the selection of its conference committees which have at the last hours of the session been in the habit of dealing with the various appropriation bills. It has had difficulty enough, while the Committee on Appropriations, so far as I know and have observed, have at all times hitherto conformed to the fundamental rule of the Senate in connection with conference committees, without undertaking to constitute themselves legislators for the Senate, to bring in new legislation in the closing hours of an expiring session of Congress. If the power to do this thing exists with conference committees, if the intent to do it is not now met promptly and vigorously, I say the whole character of legislation will be changed, and instead of proceeding in a safe, prudent, and orderly way we shall have adopted methods of legislation which will open the Treasury to all manner of raids upon it through concealed paragraphs in conference reports, and the public welfare will be immensely damaged by the new practice.

My point is that the rules of this body protect the Senate against the necessity of having to vote upon this rejected proposition; that it is legislation of an extensive character, no part of which was in the original bill; that in particular there are two clauses which never were heard of or suggested in either the House or the Senate in connection with the bill until they are presented by the conference report, and that therefore the conference report ought to be ruled out of order. The committee of conference ought to be called upon to take up the matter again and to proceed to do the duty committed to them by the Senate, and to do no more than the duty which was committed to them by the Senate.

Mr. WALTHALL. Mr. President, it has not been disputed and it can not be disputed that the amendment to item 87 as reported by the conference committee proposes original legislation. It does not in any wise arise out of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses. I submit, therefore, that it is entirely without the proper sphere of a conference committee's duty.

When the Indian appropriation bill came from the other House there was no provision in it for the Dawes Commission. There was no mention of the Dawes Commission. That Commission was not referred to directly or incidentally in the bill as it came to us from the House. When the bill reached the Senate an amendment was proposed here appropriating $40,000 for the Dawes Commission, prescribing duties for the Commission which did not belong to it under the law that provided for its organization. That amendment led to protracted debate, in which some eight or nine Senators participated, and it extended through the whole of two days. The Senate decided that that amendment could not be engrafted upon an appropriation bill without an open violation of a standing rule of the body. It must not be forgotten that the Dawes Commission appeared for the first time in the proposed amendment in the Senate, no provision of any kind or character having been made, and no reference having been made to it in the bill as it came to us from the other House.

The Senate, as I have said, after full debate decided that no such provision could be ingrafted upon the Indian appropriation bill without a direct breach of one of its own standing rules. After that decision was reached the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] offered an amendment appropriating $40,000 for the Dawes Commission, and directing the Commission to proceed with the negotiations for which it was organized and the only purpose for which it was organized. To that amendment no objection was raised, although the appropriation for the Dawes Commission had gone out on a point of order along with the balance of the amendment. But when that harmless provision was proposed no objection was interposed to it.

After that was done, what does the conference committee do? The conference committee proposes to invest the Commission not only with duties which did not belong to it before, but to invest it with power and authority which were positively, after long debate, denied to the Commission by the action of the Senate, and, what is more, which had never been asked for by the House. Therefore there were no disagreeing votes between the two Houses, and there could not be. The provision originated here. It was not asked for by the House. It was defeated here upon the ground that we would violate one of our standing rules unless it was ruled out.

Mr. President, the proposed legislation, originating with the committee, is wholly gratuitous. It is directly in conflict with the action of the Senate, and is not responsive to anything that has been proposed on the part of the House. For one I desire to protest against such unauthorized and most questionable extension of their own powers by this committee of conference or by any other committee of conference.

That is not all. It is said that the amendment is not identical with the amendment which went out on a point of order in the Senate. It is not identical, but it is exactly the same character of legislation. It is general legislation upon an appropriation bill, and upon exactly the same subject, with many of the same provisions in it contained in the amendment which the Senate decided should not go upon the appropriation bill and could not go upon it without an open violation of a standing rule of the Senate.

I call attention to one other matter. The committee, not content with originating its legislation and building it upon the amendment providing an appropriation of $40,000 for the Dawes Commission, go further and say:

> It is hereby declared to be the duty of the United States to establish a government in the Indian Territory which will rectify the many inequalities and discriminations now existing in said Territory and afford needful protection to the lives and property of all citizens and residents thereof.

The honorable committee proposes a policy; it proposes to put into the form of law its idea of the duty of the United States upon a most complicated and difficult problem. With as much right and as much pretense of authority it might just as well have declared what the policy of the United States should be upon the financial question. With the same propriety it might have declared what the policy of the United States should be with reference to the Cuban question, or with reference to the tariff, or any other subject not connected with the matter with which they were dealing.

Whatever may be said about the changes which have been made in the proposition submitted by the committee as compared with what is known as the Platt amendment, which the Senate rejected, this I suppose the conference committee will concede and admit, that it has no right in this form to lay down a line of duty for the Government upon a question which has vexed the greatest statesmen of our day for years—the Indian problem. The Senate amendment provided that the Dawes Commission should go on under the law under which it was organized. The committee says that the policy of this Government with reference to the Indians shall be so and so; as foreign, as I said before, to its duty and proper function as if it had declared what the policy of the Government should be upon any question before the American people.

Mr. HALE. I wish to ask the Senator from Mississippi whether there is any doubt that the authority with which the Dawes Commission is invested by the amendment is entirely distinct from its present authority by law, and an enlargement of its scope of duty and of action, and entirely beyond what was contemplated in the original law?

Mr. WALTHALL. Every word contained in the long amendment in relation to the Dawes Commission is new; every word in it is an addition to the duty devolved upon it under the law by which it was organized and referred to in the amendment which the Senator from Wisconsin offered.

Mr. HALE. I so understand.

Mr. VILAS. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me to add one other statement? It is not only that, but it is in the most flagrant violation of existing treaties with the Five Civilized Tribes, upon which ground it was opposed in the Senate during that long discussion, when the bill was before the Senate, of which the Senator from Mississippi has spoken.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Will the Senator from Wisconsin be good enough to explain where and how it is in direct violation of the treaties? That is a pretty broad statement.

Mr. VILAS. That can be done before the debate is ended, if necessary.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I think the Senator will have some difficulty in doing it.

Mr. WALTHALL. The question was up before, and no matter who was right about it the Senate determined that it was one of those questions which could not be disposed of in an amendment to an appropriation bill.

But that is not all of this most remarkable report. After declaring what the policy of the United States is upon the Indian question, they go on and dispose of some Indian interests with which the Dawes Commission have never had any connection whatever, direct or indirect. As I said, the Dawes Commission dealt with the Five Civilized Tribes and no other Indians. This report says:

> Sisseton and Wahpeton Indians: That all the interest due the Sisseton and Wahpeton Indians on March 3, 1896, is hereby appropriated, to be paid at once in cash per capita; and hereafter all interest on the permanent fund of said Indians, after deducting the amount expended for education, shall be paid in cash per capita on the 1st day of November of each year.

Having relation to a tribe of Indians that the Dawes Commission have no connection with; that the Dawes Commission was not instructed to negotiate with. But that is not all. The report says further:

> Seneca Nation of Indians: That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to ascertain and report to Congress a detailed statement of all the leases made and entered into by the Seneca Nation of Indians, with all persons or corporations, of all lands in the Allegany Indian Reservation in the State of New York, giving an itemized statement of each and every lease now in existence or force, with the date and terms of each lease, and amount or amounts due on each lease.

Now, Mr. President, I ask the Senator in charge of this conference report if either the Sisseton and Wahpeton Indians or the Seneca Nation of Indians cut any figure in any way in the matter which this conference committee had to deal with? As I said before, the Dawes Commission had no connection with them, and no duty was imposed upon that Commission with reference to those Indians. Their duties were limited to negotiations with the Five Civilized Tribes, and this conference committee, after conferring upon the Dawes Commission new powers which did not belong to it, most of which the Senate had refused to give to it, and after proposing legislation indicating what the duty and policy of the Government should be in reference to the Indians, travels outside and deals with two tribes of Indians that the Dawes Commission had no connection with.

Mr. President, it will not be denied, I take it, that this is entirely original legislation, and that it is not responsive to anything proposed by the House of Representatives and rejected by the Senate, and that it does not arise either directly or indirectly out of any disagreeing votes between the two Houses.

I think, Mr. President, that this kind of legislation is reprehensible in the last degree.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the point of order raised by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] can not be well taken. I understand the proper way to deal with the subject, if the report is not agreeable to the Senate, is to reject the report, and that is the only way it can be disposed of. If the Senate is not satisfied with the enlargement of the Senate amendment, which was disagreed to by the other House and which put the provision in conference and gave to the conference committee jurisdiction, the Senate can so declare by voting it down or declining to accept the report, and that is the only way it can be done. That is the proper way to deal with it, and that is the way I shall consider it.

There has been a good deal of indignation and a good deal of loose statement made about conference reports. The Senator from New Hampshire declares that nothing of the kind has ever occurred in the extended public service that he has had here. Why, Mr. President, in the twenty years I have been familiar with this body there has not been an appropriation bill passed which did not contain more or less of this "reprehensible legislation" of which the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALTHALL] speaks; and the objection now is not that it is reprehensible. That is not what disturbs the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Mississippi, but it is that they are opposed to this kind of legislation, whether it is in an appropriation bill or whether it is in any other bill.

Mr. WALTHALL. The Senator has no right to say that as to me.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator says it is not true, of course I retract it.

Mr. WALTHALL. The Senator has no right to say that. I discussed the proposition when it was here before distinctly on the point of order and declined to take any position on it except in reference to the point of order.

Mr. TELLER. If I am mistaken, the Senator can correct me. I understand the Senator considers that he is acting under instructions of his legislature on this subject.

Mr. WALTHALL. I do not think the Senator should say that.

Mr. TELLER. The legislature of Mississippi has taken action on the subject as to what should be the action of this Government with reference to these Indians.

Mr. WALTHALL. Mr. President, I think it is due to myself and to the Senator that he allow me to make a statement.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. WALTHALL. I am under no instructions from anybody. My attention, as I said when the question was up before, was directed to this subject by reason of a memorial from the legislature of Mississippi.

Mr. TELLER. That is what I understood.

Mr. WALTHALL. That induced me to look into the subject; and I said then, and say now, that the legislation is not proper upon an appropriation bill. That is the extent to which I have gone on the subject.

Mr. TELLER. It may be true that it is not proper on an appropriation bill, and yet some of the most beneficial and valuable legislation on the statute books we have got on appropriation bills.

Mr. HALE. But not originated in conference committees.

Mr. TELLER. Yes; originated in conference committees.

Mr. HALE. I will venture to say that the Senator is mistaken as to that.

Mr. TELLER. I am not going into details. I make the statement, and Senators who have been here a long time will bear me out in it, that we frequently change measures in conference and that we make material changes.

Mr. HALE. And introduce new matter?

Mr. TELLER. Yes, new matter.

Mr. HALE. That has not been done so far as I have been concerned as a member of the body and as a member of the Committee on Appropriations. If it has been done, it has always been done sub silentio, no attention being called to it; and that is the reason whenever a subject does come up that the committee ought to take notice of the violation of the rule and see that it does not occur again. I can not say that in years past something of this kind may not have been done and no attention called to it, where a matter has been passed without objection; but never have I known in any conference I have been where absolutely new matter was projected and initiated by the conference, and I think the chairman of the committee will bear me out in that statement.

Mr. ALLISON. I never knew but once to my knowledge of new matter being placed on any appropriation bill by a conference committee, and then it passed without the Senate knowing it.

Mr. HALE. It was found out afterwards.

Mr. ALLISON. It was discovered afterwards; and I want to say for myself, as the matter is up, because I do not want the Senator from Colorado to rest in the belief that conference committees have ever put new matter in a conference report, that I never have done it since I have been on the Appropriations Committee for twenty-three years but once.

Mr. TELLER. I will not take back that statement, but to that extent I will admit——

Mr. ALLISON. I want the Senator from Colorado to give any instance, except the one to which I have referred, in twenty-three years in which that has been done on a conference report.

Mr. VEST. It was done in 1883 on the tariff bill.

Mr. ALLISON. That is not an appropriation bill. I am speaking of appropriation bills.

Mr. VEST. Oh!

Mr. TELLER. But it is a conference report, all the same.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, it is.

Mr. TELLER. And it is just as objectionable on one conference report as on another. I am speaking generally of conference reports.

Mr. ALLISON. I can have no controversy about this matter. I venture the statement that there never has been, except in one instance, any new matter inserted on an appropriation bill, especially nothing containing legislation, which this amendment, if I am not mistaken, certainly does contain.

I do not wish at this stage to engage in this debate, but when it is said that it is a common thing on appropriation bills, or other bills, to inject new matter in the conference, I wish to say that I think it never has been done except when explained to the Senate, and unanimous consent asked, which probably may have been done in some instances.

Mr. TELLER. I do not intend to go into a general discussion of this question.

Mr. ALLISON. I want to say——

Mr. TELLER. I want to say a word, if the Senator will give me a chance.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well, I will give the Senator a chance.

Mr. TELLER. When I get through, the Senator can be heard. I want to say that conference committees within my experience have changed the phraseology of bills repeatedly.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. TELLER. And changed the interpretation, changed the meaning, and have done that from time to time. Sometimes I think the changes have gone to such an extent as to be objectionable, because they perhaps went beyond what would be germane and proper, where the objection could be made that it was legislation. I do not claim because that has been done that it follows that it is correct; but I want to say that the question should be here now, not whether this is a customary thing, but whether this is proper legislation which ought to be put on any bill. It may be objectionable to say that you shall not legislate in an appropriation bill; and yet the most important legislation of this session is in an appropriation bill which has now become a law, or, so far as we are concerned at least, I believe it has been agreed to. We have thereby torn up a system which has existed in this country for one hundred years, and we have done that on an appropriation bill; and we defend ourselves in that because we said it was an important question, that it was a very important thing to be done now, and that it could not be done otherwise because of certain objections which would be made to a general bill. We have changed the whole system of marshals, of district attorneys, and of commissioners.

Mr. HALE. That was not initiated in conference.

Mr. TELLER. That was not initiated in conference, but one of the objections now is that this is on an appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. So far as I am concerned I did not raise that point. My point was that it was an alarming instance of initiating new legislation, which the Senator does not deny, in conference committee not behind the general subject of legislating on appropriation bills. That is not the grievance. The grievance is the other thing.

Mr. TELLER. I am coming to that; but both seem to be grievances to Senators, and if the Senator from Maine has not made that a grievance some other Senator has.

The trouble here now is, I think I may say, that if this had been legislation which was agreeable to certain Senators there would have been no objection made. This legislation, which I admit ought not to pass here in any shape without a full and free discussion, is very much controverted. There probably never has been in the history of this Senate and the House of Representatives such an active lobby against this class of legislation as there is here to-day. There never has been since I have been in public life an evil of such magnitude which ought to be taken hold of, and as to which, if there is any justification at any time for a violation of the Senatorial rule, it ought to be excused in this case by those at least who are familiar with the necessities of legislation and the deplorable condition which nearly half a million of American citizens are in to-day for want of some such legislation.

I am not going to contend that this is in order, and if the Senate thinks it is not in order and that there is not a necessity for this legislation which would justify the Senate in departing from its customary rule, the way to meet it is to vote down this report. Then the committee will know what they have to do.

We attempted in the early days of the session—but that is some time since—to put upon this bill a provision which the Chair held to be out of order. The Senate did not vote on it as I understand, but it was declared to be out of order under the rule. This is a very different proposition, however, from the one which was declared to be out of order, for that was a provision which contained all of these provisions and very much more. It contained a provision for the allotment and the distribution of the lands of the Indians, and in that respect at least it was a repeal of existing law. This does not repeal any existing law. This provides simply that a Commission which we have appointed and to which we have given certain powers may have additional powers, and that is all there is of it. It is simply an extension of the authority already given to them, recognized in the statute now. I will admit that it is an extension and that it is a detailed statement of what they should do or what they might do without that detailed statement if they saw fit. The law creating this Commission I have before me and I will read it.

SEC. 16. The President shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint three Commissioners to enter into negotiations with the Cherokee Nation, the Choctaw Nation, the Chickasaw Nation, the Muscogee (or Creek) Nation; the Seminole Nation, for the purpose of the extinguishment of the national or tribal title to any lands within that Territory now held by any and all of such nations or tribes, either by cession of the same or some part thereof to the United States, or by the allotment and division of the same in severalty among the Indians of such nations or tribes, respectively, as may be entitled to the same, or by such other method as may be agreed upon between the several nations and tribes aforesaid, or each of them, with a view to such an adjustment, upon the basis of justice and equity, as may, with the consent of such nations or tribes of Indians, so far as may be necessary, be requisite and suitable to enable the ultimate creation of a State or States of the Union which shall embrace the lands within said Indian Territory.

Then it goes on to give power and authority to the Commissioners to appoint a stenographer, etc., and provides how they shall discharge their duties. I have not read it all, because it is not necessary. Then it proceeds:

Such Commissioners shall, under such regulations and directions as shall be prescribed by the President, through the Secretary of the Interior, enter upon negotiations with the several nations, of Indians as aforesaid in the Indian Territory, and shall endeavor to procure, first, such allotment of lands in severalty to the Indians belonging to each such nation, tribe, or band, respectively, as may be agreed upon as just and proper to provide for each such Indian a sufficient quantity of land for his or her needs, in such equal distribution and apportionment as may be found just and suited to the circumstances, etc.

For which purposes $50,000 is appropriated.

This provision is contained in "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses, and fulfilling treaty stipulations with Indian tribes, for fiscal year ending June 30, 1894."

Mr. HALE. Approved March 3, 1893?

Mr. TELLER. Approved March 3, 1893. Then it provides that the Commission shall report.

There is a most extensive authority given to this Commission—authority to deal with these Indians on every subject, to buy their lands, to allot their lands, and to negotiate with them as to their condition with reference to statehood, etc.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. Is any power under the original act given to these Commissioners except the power to negotiate to make contracts or agreements? Is anything that they do binding on anybody except by agreement with the Indian tribes?

Mr. TELLER. I suppose not. I supposed the object was to negotiate, as I said, with the Indians, and I suppose any agreement which they made with the Indians which was subsequently disagreed to would not be an agreement with the Indians.

Mr. HALE. The amendment, among other things, I see, provides that the decision of the Commissioners in all such cases shall be final.

Mr. GEORGE. To what is the Senator from Maine alluding?

Mr. HALE. To the amendment which is proposed.

Mr. GEORGE. That the action of this Commission shall be final?

Mr. HALE. Yes. I do not understand that there is any great controversy between Senators. The Senator from Colorado himself has been very frank about it, and he does not claim that this is not an enlargement of the powers granted to the Commission.

Mr. TELLER. I have said so. I have said it is an enlargement which could only be justified by the exigencies of the case.

Mr. HALE. The Senator does not contend that the power which is given by this amendment is in any way contained in the original act?

Mr. TELLER. I think very much of it is. It is not such an enlargement as Senators have professed; but it is somewhat of an enlargement, I admit. It is not so objectionable, however, it seems to me, as the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from New Hampshire seem to think.

Mr. President, the conference committee got jurisdiction of this matter by amendment numbered 37 of the Senate, which is as follows:

For salaries and expenses of the Commissioners appointed under acts of Congress approved March 3, 1893, and March 2, 1895, to negotiate with the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, the sum of $40,000, to be immediately available; and said Commission is directed to continue the exercise of the authority already conferred upon them by law and endeavor to accomplish the objects heretofore prescribed to them and report from time to time to Congress.

That is legislation on an appropriation bill undoubtedly, and when this came into conference—I suppose I am not precluded from saying what occurred in conference—when it came into conference, the conferees on the part of the House, the House having originated this provision in another measure, said they would accept it and agree to it provided that this substantial amendment as we have presented it here should be added. There is where the conferees of the Senate were met, and the conferees of the Senate believed that it would be better for all concerned that we should agree to this provision, which is substantially a provision which I think has already passed the House of Representatives. At all events, it was taken out of a House bill which had been considered by the House of Representatives. Am I mistaken in saying it passed the Senate?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not think the House bill has passed the Senate, but this conference report has been agreed to by the House of Representatives.

Mr. TELLER. This provision is in a House bill, though it may not have passed the other House.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not think it has ever been taken up, but I am not sure about that.

Mr. TELLER. But it met the approval of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and was taken from a House bill at the request of the conferees on the part of the other House, with perhaps some slight amendments and changes of phraseology.

I make this statement simply to show, Mr. President, that the Senate conferees have not gone out hunting for something extraordinary and that we have done what is frequently done, when one part of the conferees say, "We will accept this with some amendments," and the amendments are made.

Mr. HALE. The Senator states what I suppose undoubtedly to be the fact, that this subject-matter originating in the other House was embodied in a bill there which perhaps had been reported by the same committee which has charge of the appropriation bill—the Indian Committee.

Mr. TELLER. The same committee—the Indian Committee.

Mr. HALE. Now, in all fairness, if that committee, or any subcommittee of that committee, expected to bring this matter up before the Senate on an appropriation bill, ought not that committee to have put it onto this appropriation bill, which originated in the other House?

Mr. TELLER. Yes, they ought to have done it, but they did not.

Mr. HALE. Therefore is it not objectionable, after they have failed to do that and thereby given us notice when the bill comes in that then it should be put on in conference, as I understand they insisted that it should be put on in conference? I understand the pressure came from the House conferees. I think the Senator himself sees, as a member of the committee, some embarrassments that we are under by the House taking this course.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me to ask the Senator from Maine a question?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not understand the position assumed by the Senator from Maine in the question that is now submitted. Does he assume that whatever is done by the Senate must of necessity go without concurrence on the part of the House?

Mr. HALE. No; not at all.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. We have made an amendment to this bill by putting on the Commission, and the House simply reply that they will agree to the Commission provided we limit its authority in a certain method.

Mr. TELLER. And instruct it to do certain things.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Precisely.

Mr. HALE. Provided you put on in effect what a House bill contained, but which the House did not put on the appropriation bill. I say the Indian Committee of the House of Representatives, if it expected this legislation to pass on an appropriation bill, ought to have put it right on the Indian appropriation bill and passed it through the House of Representatives and sent it to us, so that we could have considered it; but they declined to do that. They failed to do that, and it comes here on a bill with the ordinary clause giving money to the Commission under its old power, and then that committee comes in and insists on putting on their amendment, which they could not and would not put on an appropriation bill. I do not believe that is right.

Mr. TELLER. I do not care to go into any criticism of the other House as to what they failed to do. It is enough for us to know that the conference committee came here with our measure, and they suggested that they must have some addition to it, and that we allowed.

I want to go to the question for a moment whether there is any necessity for legislation at all here, and whether, after all, there is any such great outrage committed as the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from New Hampshire seem to think there has been upon the Senate. It was not expected that a matter of this kind would escape the attention of the Senate. We knew very well that when this report came before the Senate it would be thoroughly discussed. We knew that with the great lobby which was hanging around this Senate, with nearly all the attorneys of this community employed, there would be some objection made to the report; and therefore we kept it as near as we could within the rule that we thought had been sometimes recognized as acceptable and not objectionable where there has been enlarged and extended in conference what has been done by one of the Houses, with the consent or at the demand of the conferees of the other.

Mr. President, I do not intend to waste much time upon this subject, but I wish to say that we have in the Indian Territory a question which has got to be settled in the interest of good government, which has got to be settled in the interest of the Indians, which has got to be settled in the interest of the great mass of the Indians and the mass of the white people who have been allowed by the Indians to invade that Territory and to make that Territory their home.

We agreed with the Indians that we would keep from their settlements white people if they objected, and to a very great extent the Government of the United States has maintained that agreement. We have kept out of the Indian Territory the class of people as a rule that they objected to. There have been some exceptions; but there is to-day within the Indian Territory a very large population by the consent and at the request of the Indian population—a population that has made the Indian land and the Indian property worth a great deal more than it would have been. There are in the Indian Territory now, I think I may say without exaggeration (probably more than I shall name), at least 300,000 citizens of the United States who are as foreign to the government of the Indian Territory as they would be if they lived in the Island of Cuba, where every right of citizenship is denied to them, where they are compelled to raise their children in ignorance, where they can not have the benefit of schools, which are denied to them by the Indian population and the Indian government, who have declined, at the request of these white people, to open their schools and allow them to have the advantages of the schools under any terms whatever, and who have treated them as if they were foreigners in a foreign land.

There are now at least five white people in that Territory to every red man. I need not say to the Senate of the United States that that condition of affairs is an unnatural one—one that can not be continued; and that if the Indians will not make some arrangement and take some steps by which the citizenship of those people can be recognized and they be given an opportunity to educate their children, the Government of the United States must take some steps in that direction.

To do that we shall be compelled to change existing laws or treaties with those tribes. And why should we not? Of this Indian population of sixty-odd thousand, or somewhere, probably, in the neighborhood of 75,000, I will say not to exceed 10 per cent, although I do not believe it exceeds 5 per cent (I think, perhaps, one man out of ten in that community; I do not believe that is correct, for I think the number is less), are participating in the advantages and are aggregating to themselves all the benefits of the acts, very liberal acts, which the Government of the United States has passed from time to time, not for a few Indians, but for all of them. The great mass of Indians are denied as absolutely the right of property in that Territory as the white men are denied it, and a sprinkling, a few men who control that population, are the nabobs and the lords who realize the profits the Government of the United States intended that the whole tribe and all the people should have. A few families alone are aggregating to themselves all the benefits and all the wealth to the exclusion of the great mass of Indians, as well as to the detriment of the great mass of whites who inhabit that section of country.

Mr. President, the common Indian in the Indian Territory has made practically no advancement in the last quarter of a century. He stands still. He does not progress. The other class of which I have spoken as the few have grown wealthy and rich. I can name an Indian whom I met two years ago last spring in the town in which he lived. I put the question to him, "I am told that you have 130 tenants?" He said, "Yes; I have." The most of his tribe were living in squalor and poverty, while this man was living in wealth. I was told, in the southern part, in another tribe (and I do not doubt the accuracy of the statement), that a man who had no Indian blood in him whatever, but who had acquired citizenship by intermarriage, had 400 tenants, and another man who had no Indian blood in him whatever was the owner of an income of $200,000 a year from rentals, while the average Indian was not occupying more than 10 or 15 acres of that vast heritage which the Government intended should be owned by all the Indians, and not by a few.

Mr. President, that is the condition, and that is the condition which is now sought to be continued in this country. The common Indians are in the brush; the aristocratic Indians are getting all the advantages and all the benefits, the very great benefits, that the Government has conferred upon them from time to time in grants of land and grants of money. The common Indian takes what he can get. When the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. ROACH], and myself went down there two years ago as members of the Select Committee on the Five Civilized Tribes we were assailed by the common Indians. They said, "When you have any more money to be paid to this tribe, let an employee of the United States Government pay it, because if it is not paid that way we do not get it." We had just before that made to those people in purchase of their land a great grant of money that was supposed to be distributed per capita amongst all the people alike. We were told of a woman who came up there to get her money which was in the hands of the Indian officials. She brought her family certificate showing that she was entitled to $800. When she went up to the people who were by their tribe charged with the distribution of the money she was told that the United States Government had not paid the money and she could not have it, but if she would wait a few days she could get it. Returning on the street she met one of these confederates, who with effrontery walked up and said, "I will buy your certificate of $800." The ignorant woman from the brush said, "What will you pay?" He said, "I will give you $40"; and he paid her $40 for that which he had only to walk to the office to get the Government money that should have been paid to her.

That is a sample of the way the leading Indians in that country manage the affairs of the tribe to the exclusion of the great mass of them and to their own enrichment and aggrandizement. And it is not to be wondered that they are standing around the corridors of the Senate and insisting that there shall be no violation of treaties—that they shall be maintained. These Indians have never maintained a treaty that they made with the United States. Their treaties require them to give to all the Indians benefits, and equal benefits. This they do not pretend to do, and nobody pretends that such a state of affairs exists.

Mr. President, because of my knowledge that this condition of affairs existed I was willing myself to stretch the rule with reference to the authority of the conference committee and accede to what the House demanded, and what I thought they rightfully demanded, if we were to further legislate upon that subject at all, and present the conference report in the shape it is in. I have no more interest in it than anybody else, and I have no feeling about it. I am not disturbed about the criticism that is made that this is an unusual proceeding. The condition of affairs existing there is an anomalous one, an unusual one, and one that exists nowhere else under the sun, I believe. It may be true that we should wait and let this matter go on year after year until we can pass, in some general law, legislation that shall rectify these wrongs. But as I have seen on other occasions appropriation bills made use of for such a purpose, as I have seen during the present session an appropriation bill made use of for the purpose of accomplishing beneficial legislation, I am myself in favor of keeping this amendment in the appropriation bill and enacting it into law, whether it is consistent with the rules of the Senate or whether it is not.

I am not afraid of the precedent. I am not afraid that the Senate of the United States will fail, whenever there is an improper provision in an appropriation bill, to reject it. The question here for the Senate should be, Is there such a condition of affairs now in the Indian Territory as will justify the Senate in passing this kind of legislation? If there is, we will be justified if we shall adopt this report.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to make a suggestion relative to the order of business?

Mr. VILAS. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER]. I see the difficulty of enforcing by a point of order the views which have been expressed here. It is a grave question whether it can be reached in that way. I suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that he withdraw the point of order and that the sense of the Senate upon this whole matter can be taken by the vote on accepting the report.

Mr. GRAY. In other words, it is a question that concerns the privileges of the Senate in a very high degree and does not exactly touch the point of order made by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HALE. No; I myself think it is beyond the domain of a point of order.

Mr. TELLER. I think the Senator from Maine is right. If the Senate of the United States thinks the contingency is not such as to justify the departure, then, of course, the report ought to be voted down. That is the way to meet it, and not simply by a question of order.

Mr. CHANDLER. I comply willingly with the suggestion to withdraw the point of order. I think there ought to be a rule, and a rule that can be enforced by the Presiding Officer; but I am convinced that there is not such a rule capable of enforcement. Therefore the Senate must deal with the question of the observance of its own rules by its own vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The point of order being withdrawn, the question is upon concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President——

Mr. VILAS. I believe I have the floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin is entitled to the floor. The Chair will state to the Senator from Wisconsin before proceeding that the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1341) to prohibit the further issuance of interest-bearing bonds without the consent of Congress.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask unanimous consent that the pending order be temporarily laid aside that we may proceed with the consideration of the conference report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid aside temporarily for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the conference report. Is there objection?

Mr. GEORGE. There are several objections over here.

Mr. BUTLER. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is interposed to the request of the Senator from South Dakota.

ALCOHOL IN THE ARTS.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask leave at this time simply to submit a report.

I am directed by the Committee on Finance to report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 3382) to repeal section 61 of an act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, which became a law August 18, 1894. I report it in order that it may go upon the Calendar, and I give notice that immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow morning, if I can get the floor, I shall ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider it at that time.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. PLATT. May I inquire what was the notice which was given?

Mr. HARRIS. I gave notice that I would to-morrow morning immediately after the reading of the Journal, if I can get the floor, ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider at that time the bill which I have just reported.

Mr. PLATT. That is all right.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I can not yield consent.

Mr. PLATT. It is merely a notice.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The notice I care nothing about. I wish to state that at the earliest possible moment I shall try to call up again the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill and dispose of it. I will not make the motion now, however.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The unfinished business will be proceeded with.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the concurrent resolution of the House authorizing the Secretary of War to lend to the mayors of the cities of East St. Louis, Ill., and St. Louis, Mo., and vicinity, a number of tents.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3279) to authorize the reassessment of water-main taxes in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1347) to establish and provide for the maintenance of a free public library and reading room in the District of Columbia.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 193) authorizing the Secretary of War to lend to the mayors of the cities of East St. Louis, Ill., and St. Louis, Mo., and vicinity, a number of tents.

REGULATION OF BOND ISSUES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1341) to prohibit the further issuance of interest-bearing bonds without the consent of Congress.

THE ENDLESS CHAIN.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, we are told that there is an endless chain in the Treasury. There is also an endless chain in the pulling-down process of a contracting currency, which pulls down first the farmer, the merchant, and the manufacturer, and presently pulls down also the investors and capitalists who must rely upon the prosperity of these industrial interests for their own. They now form trusts to sustain prices, and trusts failing, they resort to tariff taxation and to all manner of legislative, mechanical stimulants. After a while these in turn fail, and with the foundations crumbling the superstructure commences to fall. There are black Fridays in New York and black Fridays in London; railroads go into the hands of receivers, and while ruin is rampant even the Treasury of the United States passes into the hands of receivers with foreign connections, who kindly take the great Republic, with all its boundless resources, under the shadow of their wings.

THE SOPHISM THAT "THE QUANTITIVE THEORY OF MONEY IS EXPLODED."

There are certain sophisms used by the so-called sound-money men—who are in fact gold monometallists and national-bank-extension advocates—to uphold their schemes. One of these is that the quantitive theory of money, to which I have referred, is exploded, and the distinguished Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] fervently so declares in his able speech of recent date.

But in the very moment of his declaration he showed that he realized the quantitive theory, for he was opposing free coinage on the ground that, while within a certain limit silver dollars were not cheap, they would become cheap if freely coined. The fact is, the whole theory of monometallism and its purpose to keep money dear is based upon the idea that by keeping it small in quanity it will be kept dear and strong in purchasing power. The great thinkers of the world have, of course, universally admitted and illustrated the quantitive theory of money. Montesquieu, in his Spirit of the Laws, teaches that—

> Prices are fixed in a ratio of the whole of the commodities to the whole of the signs (gold and silver) combined with a ratio of the whole of the commodities in the channels of trade to the whole of the signs in these channels. The establishment of prices depends always fundamentally upon the ratio of the total of commodities to the total of signs.

Darvanzati, the eminent Italian, taught three hundred years ago that—

> All commodities which serve to subserve the wants of man are by convention equal in value to all the gold, silver, and copper. The parts are subject to the same rule as the whole.

So Hume taught in his Essay on Money:

> The policy of the good magistrate consists in keeping the money of the nation, if possible, still increasing, because by that means he keeps alive a spirit of industry and increases the stock of labor, in which consist all real power and riches. Accordingly we find that in every kingdom into which money begins to flow in greater abundance than formerly everything takes a new face—labor and industry gain life, the merchant becomes more enterprising, the manufacturer more diligent and skillful, and even the farmer follows his plow with greater alacrity and attention.

So Hamilton taught in his report on the mint in 1791:

> But, upon the whole, it seems to be most advisable, as has been observed, not to attach the unit exclusively to either of the metals, because this can not be done effectually without destroying the office and character of one of them as money and reducing it to the situation of a mere merchandise, which accordingly at different times has been proposed from different and very respectable quarters, but which would probably be a greater evil than occasional variations in the unit from the fluctuations in the relative value of the metals, especially if care be taken to regulate the proportion between them, with an eye to their average commercial value.
> To annul the use of either of the metals as money is to abridge the quantity of circulating medium, and is liable to all the objections which arise from a comparison of the benefits of a full with the evils of a scanty circulation.

Daniel Webster declared that a contraction of the currency, even if not sudden, contracts business, discourages enterprise, and restrains the commercial spirit; and that these circumstances were aggravated by sudden contraction. (See Shucker's Reply to Garfield, page 8.)

Jean Baptiste Say, the great French economist, reviewing the period of resumption and contraction in England, closes by declaring that the privileged classes, the public functionaries, the pensioners of the State and the fundholders, had profited by the resumption act, but that it had laid a burden upon the masses of the people and upon industry which only so rich and industrious a nation, so admirably administered in all respects, could support.

The difference between contraction and expansion was admirably stated by Hon. Thomas Ewing, of Ohio, in 1877, wherein he said:

> No greater wrong can be inflicted on a people by government than a contraction of the volume of currency to which their values are adjusted. The prices of commodities, whether land, product, or labor, are determined absolutely by the effective volume of the currency. An increase of the volume raises the price of all commodities, but if not carried beyond the wants of business does injury to only a comparatively small class, whose wealth or dependence is chiefly in money securities, fixed rents, annuities, or salaries. Yet, while it injures them in one way it helps them in another; it lightens the burden of taxation, promotes industry, stimulates exchanges, multiplies opportunities for safe and profitable investments, and thus indirectly compensates them for the diminution of the relative value of their money. Thus, during the war of the rebellion, so great were the general benefits from the increased volume of the currency, and so many the new opportunities for successful investment, that even the small creditor class suffered little by the decrease of the purchasing power of money.—Speech of November 23, 1877, in House of Representatives.

HISTORIC ILLUSTRATIONS.

In a speech which I had the honor to make against the unconditional repeal of the Sherman law, on the 14th of September, 1893, I attempted to show that the monetary panic which was then raging had begun to creep upon the commerce of Great Britain in 1888 and had burst forth in the summer of 1890 upon the announcement of the failure of the Barings. I pointed out, furthermore, that so far from the Sherman law being the cause of the panic that it had come at a time when money was so much needed in this country that the printing presses were put actively to work to meet the demand for them in printing Sherman notes, and so eagerly were they sought that they were printed in hundred and thousand dollar notes, the famishing money market not being willing to wait for small bills. I pointed out also that in 1890 the Bank of England, upon the failure of the Barings, went to work to supply more money, and secured from the British Government the right to issue £7,000,000, provided the same was used to assist that firm. I believed then, as I believe now, that it was more money, and not less money, that was needed, and that we could not possibly by contracting the currency in such an emergency restore confidence or revive business.

In 1825, after England had forced the resumption of specie payments that had been suspended in 1797, a period of momentary, or rather apparent, prosperity began, and the King congratulated the people that "the country was reaping, in honor and repose, all that had been sown in courage, constancy, and wisdom."

In December of that year, owing to a drain of bullion from the country and a contraction of the currency, a fearful monetary panic was in full blast. How was it met? The Bank of England in four days inflated the currency by an issue of $25,000,000 of notes. And it is said:

> This audacious policy was crowned with the most complete success; the panic was stayed almost immediately. All contemporary evidence proves that it was this profuse issue of £5,000,000 of paper in a few days that stayed the panic. If the bank had persevered in its restrictive policy three days longer, it was said the total and entire destruction of commercial credit would infallibly have ensued.—Shuckers on Panics, page 17.

In the crisis of 1847 a similar policy of the British Government had equally beneficial effects. In October, to relieve the pressure, the Government recommended the Bank of England to enlarge its discounts. Ten minutes after this policy was announced its effect was produced:

> The panic vanished like a dream. Mr. Gurney stated that it produced its effects in ten minutes. No sooner was it known that notes might be had than the want of them ceased.

Ten years after, in 1857, another panic came upon England. The Government again authorized the Bank of England to inflate the currency by extending its issue, and the beneficial effect was instantaneous.

In 1866—with singular periodicity—still another panic came. Again the Government suspended the bank act, which restricted the issue of currency; again the favorite English remedy of inflation was applied, and again, as said by Gebbart in his work on Banking, "it operated like a charm."

THE SOPHISM THAT "FINANCE IS A MERE QUESTION OF FIGURES."

In reversing the wise precedents and in stopping the coinage of money when it was most needed we have reversed the effect and have brought distress and hardship upon the country. Some of the sophists tell us that "finance is a mere matter of figures." An eminent gentleman in public life said to me lately, "Finance is a mere matter of figures; there is nothing in your free-silver business." Said he, "Let me illustrate. After the war I assessed all of my property, and it was worth $130,000. Soon the currency was contracted; silver was demonetized. I reassessed the same property, and it was then worth $30,000, and," he added, "I lost nothing, for the property was all there." "Yes," I replied, "the property was all there; but let me put another case to you and see if the matter does not appear in a different light. Suppose that when it was assessed at $130,000 a buyer had called and you had sold it to him for that price. Suppose he had paid you $60,000 in cash and given his note for the balance of $70,000, running through a series of years to come. He defaulted in payment. You then had the property sold and bought it back at $30,000, which was its then value. At the end of the transaction the buyer had lost his $60,000, he was yet $40,000 in debt, and you had all the property you started with and $60,000 to boot and $40,000 due you." So, when contraction of the currency and property take place, was it a mere matter of figures representing dollars that ruined the one and enriched the other? This process, in different degrees and in different shades, is what has been transpiring in this country in recent years.

THE WORLD-WIDE MALADY—DISLOCATION.

Within this recent period not only the United States but the world is suffering from a world-wide malady. There has been a displacement and derangement of one of the great factors of civilization—hard, bimetallic money. One of the foundation stones of money upon which three thousand years of civilization had been built up has been pulverized by the massive force of governmental power. The law has been employed to uncouple gold and silver and to confuse their relation and to discharge one of them from the monetary function, and the effort is now being made to require indebtedness accrued upon the double standard to be discharged according to a single standard, and that represented by the dearest metal. It is imagined by some that this question will soon be dismissed from public view and soon be settled by the productive powers of an active and energetic people. They reckon without their host—that is, unless the question is rightly settled. The people are just beginning to realize thoroughly the terrible effects upon all the workers of the world of this derangement and contraction of the currency, and if the projections of those who favor the contraction shall be realized, we are destined to wallow in the slough of despond for many years to come. They propose a further contraction.

PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN OF 1892.

Let me now review briefly the political events with reference to our currency of the past four years. In the Presidential campaign of 1892, which resulted in the election of Grover Cleveland, the Republican, Democratic, and Populist parties differed in many things, but all of them agreed in the necessity for the restoration of silver money.

The Republicans declared in their platform:

> The American people, from tradition and interest, favor bimetallism, and the Republican party demands the use of both gold and silver as standard money, with such restrictions and under such provisions, to be determined by legislation, as will secure the maintenance of the parity of values of the two metals, so that the purchasing and debt-paying power of the dollar, whether of silver, gold, or paper, shall be at all times equal. The interests of the producers of the country, its farmers and its working men, demand that every dollar, paper or coin, issued by the Government shall be as good as any other. We commend the wise and patriotic steps already taken by our Government to secure an international conference to adopt such measures as will insure a parity of value between gold and silver for use as money throughout the world.

The Democrats at Chicago said in their platform:

> We hold to the use of both gold and silver as the standard money of the country, and to the coinage of both gold and silver without discriminating against either metal or charge for mintage; but the dollar unit of coinage of both metals must be of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value.

The Populist party in its platform said:

> We demand free and unlimited coinage of silver and gold at the present legal ratio of 16 to 1.

The President who was elected, in accepting his nomination, accepted all the pledges which his party made in behalf of its nominee. He said:

> I find much relief in the reflection that I have been selected merely to stand for the principles and purposes to which my party is pledged and for the enforcement and supremacy of which all who have any right to claim Democratic fellowship must constantly and persistently labor.

Again, in the same speech, he said:

> I shall not attempt to specify at this time other objects and aims of Democratic endeavor which add inspiration to our mission. True to its history and its creed, our party will respond to the wants of the people within safe lines and guided by enlightened statesmanship.

The election came, and the Democratic party found itself in full possession of the executive and legislative departments of the Government. In the House of Representatives and in the Senate it alike had a majority, and in the Presidential chair was the present Executive, who had been elected by a popular majority and by a majority of the electoral college as well.

Over thirty years had elapsed since the Democratic party had been in power. A new generation had grown up since it had been driven into retirement. It was composed of veterans who had grown gray in its service, of recruits from the opposition who had grown weary of its extravagance, and of fresh and buoyant young men who looked forward to see the policies reversed which had been so disastrous and detrimental to the country. The chief issue of the Presidential election, by the common consent, was the tariff, but as soon as the President was inaugurated the outcry against the McKinley bill grew fainter and fainter. I was then in favor of an extra session of Congress, and so declared myself in a public letter. The iron was hot; then was the time to strike. But the weary months wore on. The robber barons were left unvexed by any attempt to relax their extortions. Presently, like a thunderbolt, came a message from the President convening Congress in extra session.

THE PRESIDENT'S CHANGE OF BASE AND HIS MISTAKEN DIAGNOSIS.

A new revelation seemed to have dawnded upon the Presidential mind. It had discovered that the tariff was not the great imposition upon the people and impediment to our prosperity that it had been represented to be, but that our silver currency, which we had promised to uphold, was the trouble.

When the message was delivered, I felt that a great mistake had been made. The physician, in my opinion, had made a false diagnosis of the disease. The message demanded the unconditional repeal of the Sherman law of 1890—that and no more. A great struggle ensued. Desiring to keep the Democratic party together, I offered upon the floor of the Senate to meet with my Democratic brethren in caucus and to abide their judgment. This was indignantly refused by the leaders of the opposition. Various compromises were proposed, and one was agreed upon, nearly all Democrats signing their names thereto, the Secretary of the Treasury himself favoring it. At the last moment this compromise was repudiated. The repeal, unconditionally, of the Sherman law was a Republican proposition. It had been made by the Senator from Ohio; it had been defeated by the Democrats in February, 1893, before the Democratic President was inaugurated. It was not called for by the Democratic platform, which had demanded in lieu of the Sherman law "the free coinage of both metals without discrimination against either." Under no political promise or obligation to vote for the unconditional repeal, I declined to do it. It was urged that after the repeal there would be silver legislation, but I knew that then a Presidential veto would be all-powerful, and it would be difficult to agree upon a measure.

THE FALSE PROPHECIES OF THE REPEALERS.

Now, let me ask what considerations urged in favor of the unconditional repeal of the Sherman law have been substantiated? What prediction of the repealers has come true? Not one; not one. It was urged that it would prevent the further export of gold from the country, but the gold has flowed and flowed away.

(1) It was urged that it would prevent the raid upon the gold reserve. Behold the result. Two hundred and sixty-two millions of gold borrowed to keep it up, and yet it remains an organized appetite without the power of satisfaction.

(2) It was urged that it would induce foreign capital to invest here, and there would be a flow of money to our shores. The flow has been in the other direction.

(3) It was urged that it would stop the sale of our securities by foreign investors. More securities were thrown upon the market the day after its repeal and more and more.

(4) It was urged that it would restore confidence and prosperity. "Confidence, confidence," was on every lip, and a bountiful supply of it was predicted to pervade the land just as soon as the law was repealed.

The President said in his message:

Our unfortunate financial plight is not the result of untoward events nor of conditions related to our natural resources; nor is it traceable to any of the afflictions which frequently check national growth and prosperity. With plenteous crops, with abundant promise of remunerative production and manufacture, with unusual invitation to safe investment, and with satisfactory assurance to business enterprise, suddenly financial distrust and fear have sprung up on every side. Numerous moneyed institutions have suspended because abundant assets were not immediately available to meet the demands of frightened depositors. Surviving corporations and individuals are content to keep in hand the money they are usually anxious to loan, and those engaged in legitimate business are surprised to find that the securities they offer for loans, though heretofore satisfactory, are no longer accepted. Values supposed to be fixed are fast becoming conjectural, and loss and failure have invaded every branch of business.

I believe these things are principally chargeable to Congressional legislation touching the purchase and coinage of silver by the General Government.

The Hon. JOHN SHERMAN, in a speech made for the repeal, declared on October 17, 1893, with radiant and roseate inspiration:

In the present condition of affairs there is no money to buy cotton or corn or wheat for foreign consumption.

Break down the barrier now maintained by the Senate of the United States, check this viper called obstruction to the will of the majority, give the Senate free power and play, and—

Now mark the sunburst that was to come—and in ten days from this time the skies will brighten, business will resume its ordinary course, and the clouds that lower upon our house will be in the deep bosom of the ocean buried.

Horace White wrote in the Forum for August, 1893:

What may be affirmed with positiveness is that our present scarcity of money would certainly be relieved by the surplus of Europe but for the silver wars.

What prompt and bountiful relief was thus vouchsafed to us.

PROFESSIONS OF LOYALTY TO BIMETALLISM.

(5) Associated with these alluring predictions were declarations of undying loyalty to bimetallism and assurances that after unconditional repeal was accomplished legislation would be effected that would restore silver to its accustomed place in our financial system. Many supposed to be on intimate terms with the President shook their heads wisely and said he would duly be heard from in behalf of silver. Indeed, in the very statute of repeal new vows of friendship were sealed by solemn enactment, the President himself becoming a party to those vows by approving the repealing statute, which declared:

And it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money and to coin both gold and silver into money of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, such equality to be secured through international agreement, or by such safeguards of legislation as will insure the maintenance of the parity in value of the coins of the two metals and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts.

Time wore on. A bill for coining the seigniorage passed Congress and went to the President and was vetoed. The fish had the hook in his mouth; nothing was done. Nothing can be done; nothing is even proposed.

WHERE IS THE PROSPERITY PROMISED?

In the meantime, Mr. President, what kind of prosperity is this that has come upon us? The first quarter of 1896, as stated in the financial journals, has been the most disastrous in our commercial history. Losses by failures in 1895 were greater than those in 1894, and the process of failure goes on. While the masses are thus suffering the dividends of the national banks have decreased from fifty-one millions in 1893 to forty-six millions in 1895.

LOOK AT OUR RAILROAD SYSTEM.

Let me read a little extract from the Financial and Commercial Chronicle of April 4.

Mr. GEORGE. Of what year?

Mr. DANIEL. Eighteen hundred and ninety-six.

Railroads: Decrease of gross earnings in 1894 as compared to 1893 = $142,313,275 = 11.64. Dividends decreased $10,000,000.

We show a deficit in March (1896) of $1,804,000. This is not large, but to us it is a disappointment, though, as stated a month ago, it was to be expected, for no other result was possible with business unloading.—The Financial and Commercial Chronicle, April 4, 1896, page 616.

[The Manufacturer, March 28, 1896.]

This country has about one-half of the railroad mileage of the world. At the present time, according to report, two-thirds of the railroad mileage are in the hands of receivers. A few weeks ago the great Baltimore and Ohio system went over to the majority. On Monday last receivers were appointed to take charge of the Central Vermont Railway Company, a corporation having 800 miles of track. On Monday, also, the Glendon (Pa.) Iron Company failed. Not long ago it was one of the richest and most successful concerns of the kind in the country. The list of wrecks grows larger. The mass of ruin heaps higher and higher. What is the matter? The potentiality of wealth in this land is beyond computation. The soil is rich; the people are industrious, intelligent, enterprising. The Government no longer purchases silver. The credit of the public Treasury has been fully established. The gold standard is supreme. A tariff for revenue only is in full operation. Why should the clouds grow darker and the commercial situation more hopeless day by day? What else must be done to bring back again the good times? Nothing is more nearly certain than that the extension into practice by a Government of wrong theories must work toward evil. Would it not be well for the wealth producers, who suffer from the conditions as they are, to consider if indeed some of the theories now in practical operation are destructive in their nature? Mr. Cleveland represents the present tariff and the existing financial system; has he suggested any method of reaching good times which can commend itself to men of sound judgment?

POSITION AND PROPHECIES OF THE BIMETALLISTS AS TO THE UNCONDITIONAL REPEAL OF THE SHERMAN LAW.

At the time when I was resisting the unconditional repeal of the Sherman law I undertook to analyze the situation and to state my judgment as to what would occur if Congress should yield unconditionally to the Executive command.

(1) I showed that the repealing statute did not put back the law as it existed before the Sherman law was passed, for then we had the Bland-Allison Act, which put forth a minimum of two million of silver dollars every month, and unconditional repeal meant no free silver at all per month or per year.

(2) I acknowledged that some temporary benefit might flow from the repeal "under the momentary influence of declarations so vociferously made that prosperity would come," but expressed my opinion that this momentary effect would soon wear off; that, "existing mostly in the emotional nature of man, though to a degree promoted by a scheme to contract the currency, it would soon dissipate its influence," and that people who were persuaded to expect great relief would "ere long stand confronting the merciless conditions of a contracted currency without a corresponding contraction of either taxation or debt." Let the course of affairs of the last three years bear witness to the truth of that prophecy.

(3) I undertook to show that silver would further decline in value. It had declined under the demonetization in Germany and the United States twenty years ago. It fell perceptibly in India but a few years ago; and I asked, "Under demonetization would not history repeat itself if we follow these examples now?" We followed the example, and history has repeated itself.

(4) I predicted an increase of taxation; that present assessments of real and personal property would be reduced, and, meanwhile, the property holder compelled to pay a tax no longer represented by corresponding value of productive power. This prediction is verified by the very bills now before the Senate.

(5) I showed further, Mr. President, that as soon as the Sherman law was repealed monometallism would be strengthened, and that those who in America had masqueraded as bimetallists would unfurl the flag of monometallism. I declared that it would be heralded over the boards of exchange and urgently boasted by all the organs of the money power that this country had deliberately discarded silver and turned the prow of the ship of state toward the mainland of monometallism. Hear the present clamor of the single gold standard! See how the masks are being cast aside from those who danced at the masquerade ball of the Sherman silver repeal bill and witness the somersaults of the political changelings!

I predicted further that as soon as the Sherman law was repealed it would be immediately claimed that all our silver money was a mere subsidiary money to be redeemed in gold. I pointed out that our stock of gold in the Treasury was then about $103,000,000, and was then charged with the redemption of $412,000,000 of uncovered paper money; that in addition to this there was $600,000,000 of certificates and silver dollars, making over a billion of subsidiary money, resting upon a gold basis of $100,000,000, or an inflation of a billion of paper money on the unbankable basis of 10 to 1, provided the theory upon which the Sherman law was repealed was carried to its intended projections.

Now, here comes the Director of the Mint, the avant courier of further contraction, and two years later fulfills my prophecy that the withdrawal of outstanding currency would be demanded.

GOLD RESERVE.

[The American, February 29, 1896.]

Mr. Preston, the Director of the Mint, is authority for this statement. In his annual report for 1895, page 184, after speaking of the $346,681,016 of greenbacks and the $141,092,280 of Treasury notes outstanding November 1, 1895, a total of $487,773,296, which he assumes to be redeemable in gold, and of the insufficiency of a gold reserve of $100,000,000 to insure their convertibility at all times, he proceeds: "But this heavy task is not the only one imposed on our gold reserve of $100,000,000. As under the laws of February 12, 1878, July 14, 1890, and March 3, 1891, $423,289,309 in full legal-tender silver have been coined, against which $333,456,236 in certificates were outstanding November 1, 1895, and as the act of July 14, 1890, has declared it to be the established policy of the United States to maintain the two metals on a parity with each other upon the present legal ratio or upon such ratio as may be provided by law, we have a total superstructure of $821,229,532 resting on the frail basis of a gold reserve of $100,000,000."

A gold reserve of $100,000,000 is indeed frail to support a superstructure of eight times as much. The European banks of issue, taken as a whole, hold $1 in gold to $2 of paper in circulation.

I then showed, Mr. President, that with these conditions we would have two alternatives presented to us, that is, either the withdrawal of the greenback circulation of $346,000,000, or the issue of bonds for the taking up of all our paper money. In order, if I may quote myself, I said:

To provide gold to save the Treasury, there should be a rush of silver or greenbacks for redemption, the issue of bonds would be proposed.

And I asked—

Will confidence then be restored when the already overtaxed gold resources are thus assailed? On the contrary, confidence will be weakened, and those who have been urging the President to order or recommend the issue of bonds to provide gold will renew their demand, and it must be granted or the attempted gold system will collapse and fall and bury the honor of our country in its ruin.

Every prediction which I then made, Mr. President, has been fulfilled. Two hundred and sixty-two million dollars of bonds, the greatest public debt ever contracted in time of peace, have been piled up upon the people, the increase of taxation has been demanded, and the end is not yet, for the only remedy we have now suggested from the Presidential chair is that we shall proceed to further contract the currency by the withdrawal of the greenback circulation, and that would inevitably result in appalling disaster.

THE CAUSE OF FALLING PRICES.

It is alleged that the dislocation of silver is not the sole cause of falling prices in this and other nations; and that this is shown by the fact that the fall began in 1865, not in 1873. I admit all this, that the fall began in 1865. It was natural that a fall in prices should come about in 1865, for two reasons:

(a) Because then over two millions of men who had been engaged in the work of war and destruction returned to peaceful pursuits—ceasing to be destroyers and consumers of other men's productions, and becoming producers themselves and vastly increasing production in all the avenues of labor.

(b) Because a currency that had been used only in the Northern and Western States had to diffuse and divide itself among the Southern States, who had little or no money of any kind, and whose productions were now opened to the world's markets, increasing their stock. Such a period as this, the period just after the war, is generally the opportune occasion seized by those who profit by making money dearer and commodities cheaper to get in their work. Great Britain seized such an occasion after the overthrow of Napoleon at Waterloo and demonetized silver to enhance the value of her securities; Germany did likewise after the fall of Napoleon III at Sedan, and the United States followed suit after Appomattox; and the like results followed in each case.

It is argued that the demonetization of silver in 1873 could not have been the cause of falling prices for two reasons:

1. Because in the period extending from 1818–1827 to 1843–1852—a period of twenty-five years—the fall in average prices was about the same as that which has taken place since 1873.

Admitting the fact, it is evident that the price fall was due to very much the same causes that have prevailed in the last quarter of a century.

Remember—

(1) Great Britain demonetized silver in 1816.

(2) Great Britain resumed specie payments in 1819.

(3) The Spanish-American wars cut off the world's supply of the precious metals.

Commenting upon the decreased production of the precious metals from 1810 to 1829, Jacobs, in his work on the Precious Metals, says:

We are now arrived at a period when a great and sudden change took place in the production of the mines of gold and silver. After a space of more than three centuries, during the whole of which there had been a constant increase of the quantities obtained, and each succeeding decennial period yielding a larger portion than the similar number of years that preceded it, the whole of the mines in every part of the Western Continent declined greatly in their produce; and though they have in some measure been restored, it has been by slow degrees, and they are yet very far from having the copious produce which they yielded before their general abruption from European government.

But it is urged by an able and distinguished opponent of free silver coinage that "during the long period from 1809 to 1865—a period marked first by a tremendous fall and then by a great rise in price of commodities—the price of silver varied but slightly." This is put forward in support of the idea that silver "held aloof from other commodities when it had free access to the mints," and was impotent alike to prevent the fall or promote the rise of prices.

I reply that in that period, though silver had legally free access to the mints, its decreased production kept much of it from getting there; whereas now the mine turns it out and the mints shut it out—the same result being reached by closing the mines in one case and closing the mints in the other.

Let anyone read the little volume of Sir Archibald Allison entitled England in 1815 and 1845, or a Sufficient and Contracted Currency, and he will see displayed with the clearness of the master mind the effect on prices produced by English policy. He points out that the period from 1797 to 1815 was the most glorious, and taken as a whole the most prosperous, which Great Britain had ever known; that agriculture, commerce, and manufacture had increased in an unparalleled ratio; that the landed proprietors were in affluence, and that wealth to an unheard-of extent had been created among the farmers. He shows that with the arrival of peace with its sudden contraction of war expenditures there was of necessity great temporary distress and extraordinary difficulty experienced in industry finding out new and specific channels. He shows that the Empire continued to grow richer, although for decade after decade there was never a greater amount of financial embarrassment experienced by Government or more widespread or acute suffering endured by the people. That is just the condition of this country now. And now, as then, it is largely due to the same cause. While wealth was increasing, as Allison says, to an unparalleled extent among the commercial classes, suffering and distress generally ensued amongst the rural inhabitants.

THE PREDICTED FALL OF REVENUE.

There was one prediction, Mr. President, which I took occasion to make, and that was that there would be shrinkage of revenue. I pointed out that the British commission on the Indian currency had shown that the fluctuation in relative values of gold and silver had so increased the liabilities of the Indian Government in comparison with its revenues as to make it necessary in the absence of other remedies to impose fresh taxation. This shrinkage of revenue is now a sad realization; this increase of taxation has only been avoided so far by the $262,000,000 of public debt.

Now comes the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], the same who told us in 1893 that the patient would be well and prosperous in ten days if he would take his repeal bolus. He comes again—the pulse is low and faint, but the physician has lost no confidence in himself, and he is ready again to tell us all about the sick man and his troubles. He says now that the whole matter is want of revenue—that is, the man is dying for want of breath. He says put up high taxes again and all will be well.

Want of revenue is indeed a malady of the Treasury visible enough, and the present Secretary of the Treasury has been as far behind in his predictions as his predecessor from Ohio, who is his model.

In 1892, while the McKinley law and the Sherman law were both in operation, we had still a small surplus revenue, although the revenues were much reduced by their passage. They were both passed in 1890, when we had a surplus of $105,344,469. This fell to $37,239,762 in 1891, to $9,914,543 in 1892, and to $2,341,674 in 1893. Now, on November 1, 1893, the Sherman law was repealed, while the McKinley law remained, and in 1894 the deficit was $72,000,000. In 1895 the deficit was $40,000,000 under the Wilson-Gorman bill, and in 1896 it was $25,000,000. This analysis shows that the great deficit followed the repeal of the Sherman law with the McKinley law yet in force.

What is the cause of this want of revenue? The Senator from Ohio says it is the Wilson-Gorman tariff bill. Certainly, but for the additions put in that bill in the Senate the deficit would be much greater, and it is gratifying to observe that while the President would not sign it in 1893 his subsequent reflections have led him to regard it as embodying—

A tariff policy which in principle is based upon the denial of the right of the Government to obstruct the avenues to our people's cheap living or lessen their comfort and contentment, for the sake of according especial advantages to favorites, and which well encourages our intercourse and trade with other nations, recognizes the fact that American self-reliance, thrift, and ingenuity can build up our country's industries and develop its resources more surely than enervating paternalism.

But here is the deficit to deal with. What caused it? A falling off in the volume of trade. Yes. But what caused the increasing falling off of trade? I answer its shrinkage and its paralysis from the accursed falling of prices, which unsettled all business relations.

FALLING PRICES AND SHRUNKEN VOLUME OF BUSINESS THE CAUSE OF FALLING REVENUES.

Let me read an extract from a recent issue of the Financial News:

If we had received 1873's prices for the quantity of produce we exported in 1895, the latter year's exports would have brought $1,769,061,584 instead of $607,538,165. How many know that the merchandise balance of trade in our favor, had we received 1873's prices, would have been in 1895 $616,508,997 instead of $75,568,209, which they actually were? Yet such are the facts.

These figures should form interesting study for the farmers of this country. Just think of it, farmers and laborers, a falling off of more than one-half of the value of the products of your labor within twenty-two years, or from 1873 to 1895! The same products that were exported last year would have brought, had the prices of 1873 been realized, just $361,523,419 more than they did. That is just what laborers and producers lost by this falling off in prices. Now, we may ask, What is the cause of such an immense contraction of prices? Not because of overproduction, for actual facts go to prove that the increase of the world's population is greater in proportion than the increase of the necessaries of life, and they also show that people are not using proportionately as much as they did twenty years ago from the very fact that they have not the money with which to buy. Then what can be the cause? There is but one reasonable answer, and that is that silver (which had always been used by almost every nation of the world except England as primary money) was demonetized in 1873 by the United States, Germany, and the other nations forming the Latin Union in Europe, and has since been used only as subsidiary coin by these nations. Every man knows that the value of the products of the soil has ever been measured by the value of silver, and we know that ever since the United States and these nations of Europe have been degrading silver money that the value of all the products of the farmer and the laborer have in like manner been getting lower and lower, until now the expense of producing many of our staple products is more than those products will sell for on the market.

Mr. GRAY. If the Senator will permit me, the line of suggestion as to the cause of the falling off of revenue which the Senator has made is very interesting. He says truly that the apparent cause, the approximate cause, of the falling off of revenue is the falling off of business, the falling off of those transactions of daily life which make trade and imports, upon which revenue is paid and internal taxation collected. I wish to know whether he attributes the falling off in business activities to the unsettled state and the want of confidence which has been produced by the agitation of the standard of payment in the matter of silver and gold, for if, as I believe—I am not going to argue the question—it is true that the paralysis of business which so largely prevails in our country is due to that cause, then it deserves some consideration. Returning to the suggestion which the Senator made as to the business conditions, not to interrupt him again, I will add further that he would also have to account, it seems to me, in dealing with this cause which he asserts, for the fact, as stated in British trade journals, that in the year last past in the trade of Great Britain, which has not been assailed by the disturbing influences of a disputed standard and a troubled currency, there has been a most gratifying increase in every direction, and in the profits of the British people resulting therefrom.

Mr. DANIEL. No doubt, Mr. President, the British people are getting along very well on our paying them two for one.

I will try to answer the Senator's question with entire frankness. I have no doubt that any agitation on any large question of currency or taxation which is in an acute condition, independent of the right or wrong on either side, is calculated to depress trade; but I wish to call the Senator's attention to one thing. This agitation had been going on for twenty-five years; and when in 1878 it had agitated a silver free-coinage bill through both Houses of Congress, which was compromised by the Bland-Allison Act, which poured $2,000,000 more silver into the currency each month, the agitation, instead of having a depressing effect, stopped the course of the panic, increased prices, and started the country upon a career of prosperity. It is the agitation for the gold standard, and the partial success of it, which is depressing the conditions of the country, and your success will be more depressing than your agitation. Our success relieves, whilst yours destroys. If the Senator is right, why is it that the agitation of 1878 and its partial success did not depress prices? I will give the Senator time to reflect in order to invent an answer.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I do not want time to invent an answer. I do not want to give any answer that is not apparent, and does not result from the conditions of the question; but the point I wanted to call the Senator's attention to and have him explain in the last part of my question was this: Why is it that a people of kindred tongue and kindred thought and blood during the last year under a condition of what he calls gold monometallism, with a perfect stable standard so far as any assault being made upon it by its own people is concerned, should have enjoyed this exceptionally prosperous year which ended in January, 1896, while we, who have such intimate intercourse with that people, should be now in the depths of what the Senator has described as a business depression wide and extended and all-prevailing in this country, including all classes of the community? Is there any other difference in the condition of the two countries which will account for this different result, except that in the one case they had a stable standard and in the other they had one that is threatened with destruction and instability?

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, my worthy friend has shifted his question.

Mr. GRAY. I beg pardon.

Mr. DANIEL. The first question he asked me was this: If I did not believe that the agitation of the silver question was one of the causes of depression.

Mr. GRAY. That is quite right; I did.

Mr. DANIEL. And I answered the Senator with precision that any agitation was depressing, but that whenever our agitation had been successful it had elevated conditions and had not been depressing; and I pointed to him the result of the passage of the Bland-Allison Act in 1878.

The Senator now asks me another question. He asks me, Why is it that Great Britain is prospering? I will give him a partial answer, for I am not prepared to answer fully without an analysis of all the conditions of British trade. It is because the gold standard plays into her hands and out of our hands and the double standard plays out of her hands and into our hands. It is because she is buying American cotton cheaper than she ever bought it before by the gold standard. It is because she is getting more corn and oil and wine and iron and wool and cotton, dollar for dollar, under the gold standard than she could get if we had the double standard, and what she is gaining is just to the same extent our loss.

Mr. GRAY. She need not have a monopoly of this stable condition unless we choose to give it to her.

Mr. DANIEL. We are largely the producers of the bread stuffs and raw materials and Great Britain is the consumer, and if the buyer is constantly putting down the prices of the seller, will not the buyer get rich and will not the seller lose? It depends upon which side of the counter you are buying. If I were an Englishman, especially if I were a rich English capitalist, my selfishness might prompt me to be a gold-standard man, but, instead of being an English capitalist or their representative, I am an American and the representative of American interests, and that is the reason I am for the double standard. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The Chair will admonish the galleries that it is a violation of the rules of the Senate to show evidence of approval or disapproval.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, the Senator has sought to answer my question with an appeal, not to the reason of the thing, but to the supposed patriotism involved in his position. I do not deny the Senator's patriotism; but I should like to know from the Senator, to return to the question I just put, how it is that a stable condition of currency based upon the gold standard, unassailed by popular agitation, should be fruitful of results so beneficent to the British people, and that the like condition should not produce the same results in our own country; and, further, to ask him what other difference there was to account for this difference of condition, except that in this country there is this intense agitation and threat made against the stability of our monetary standard, to distinguish ourselves from the people who have a stable standard and abounding prosperity under it? The Senator answers, true it is, that England, with her stable-money standard, has reached beneficent results from it because she has been buying from this country cheaply with her gold-standard money, and is enabled thereby to make a profit from her traffic with the people of this country. Now, I ask the Senator from Virginia, how will she buy at higher prices, or any less cheaply, if we go upon the standard of 16 to 1 on a free-silver-coinage basis? Will not England have to pay the same price for our corn and our wheat in gold that she pays now, even though there is nominally a higher price?

Mr. DANIEL. She would have to pay more.

Mr. GRAY. Would she have to pay more for it?

Mr. DANIEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRAY. Why?

Mr. DANIEL. Because the entire monetary volume of the world will be swelled up, and there being more money in the world money will be cheaper and property dearer. That is the reason.

Mr. GRAY. I would ask the Senator, would every bushel of grain raised by an American farmer and sold abroad have to be settled for upon gold prices? Then, if it has to be settled for upon a gold price, the merchant abroad who buys it will buy it upon the same terms he does now. The only thing you can argue is for the benefit of the farmer that you translate the gold price he may get into a silver price here; and whether that silver price will be worth more to him when it has less purchasing power, is a question I have not heard answered yet.

Mr. DANIEL. The Senator from Delaware has diverted me from the trend of my remarks, and has anticipated much to which I had expected to refer before I got through; but he wants to know now, as my answers to his other questions do not seem to have brought him contentment, whether or not the prices of American produce in English markets would be increased by the double standard in America or otherwise. If the Senator had read the debate in the House of Commons on the 17th of March last, he would have seen that resolutions were unanimously passed by that body favoring a return to the double standard, and he is very much mistaken if he imagines that there is not agitation for the double standard in Great Britain.

Mr. GRAY. There is no evidence of it in their press.

Mr. DANIEL. I have an extract from the London Times before me, and can show the Senator the entire paper.

Mr. GRAY. In regard to those resolutions?

Mr. DANIEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRAY. I recollect the resolutions very well.

Mr. DANIEL. Then there is agitation, and agitation sufficient to get a unanimous vote from the House of Commons for the restoration of bimetallism by international agreement. Now, I ask the Senator not to ask me another question until I get through answering this one.

THE BRITISH WANT MUCH OF OUR PRODUCTS FOR LITTLE OF THEIR GOLD.

The resistance in the British House of Commons to the whole theory of bimetallism was based upon the proposition which the Senator from Delaware is now denying. It was based upon the proposition that it would make Great Britain pay higher prices for all the produce which she buys from other nations. I will read the Senator a portion of the speech of Sir W. Harcourt, who addressed the House of Commons on that subject. He said:

There has been something said about England as the creditor country, and nobody who heard it will have forgotten that remarkable speech which was made by Mr. Gladstone in this House when he last spoke upon this subject, when he held up to the scorn of mankind the proposal that the great creditor country should go, hat in hand, to beg the world to pay 10 shillings in the pound. [Laughter.] That is practically the result that the bimetallic system would bring about. ["Hear!" "Hear!"] Of course it is said we receive more for our money. The fact is, we are not paid in gold, as everybody knows, but in commodities. These are the commodities upon which our people live, and therefore we are to go round the world to beg them in return for the gold we have lent them to send fewer commodities. Is it possible to conceive idiocy going further than that? [Laughter and "Hear!" "Hear!"] We, who have lent £100,000,000, perhaps £1,000,000,000, to foreign nations, are to beg them to give us less in exchange for that money than they do at present. ["Hear!" "Hear!"] It is really hardly possible to state a case of that kind and imagine any person would adopt it. I know they say that under the bimetallic system silver will really be exactly worth as much as gold. If you believe that, will you show the sincerity of your belief by giving an option to the creditor as well as the debtor? ["Hear!" "Hear!"]

Sir, there is my answer to your question. The declaration of the British gold-standard men, the open and declared purpose to buy from us all that they get cheaper, and the appeal to Britons to stand by them upon the ground that it would be idiocy for Great Britain to be wanting to pay more—and while I would not use such a term as "idiocy," or use any term which might reflect upon honorable gentlemen who debate with me on this subject, I do say that it is the most singular piece of fatuity that I have ever seen for the great debtor nation of the world and the great productive nation of the world to be constantly laboring in its legislative bodies to increase the burden of those debts upon the people, and to change the standard of them in order to pay Britons $2 where they owe $1, and bear down the prices of their wheat and their corn and their iron and their wool and their cotton in the markets.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. What I started out to say to the Senator was that these conditions of alleged prosperity, perhaps I might say conceded prosperity, which obtain according to the financial chronicles of Great Britain in that country were by reason as I thought of the only differentiation I could make between them and this country—that there was no substantial agitation of the currency question, there was no attack threatened upon the stability of the monetary standard, while here the situation was entirely different. But the Senator takes issue with me upon the fact that there is no agitation in Great Britain just now, and in proof of it reads resolutions passed by the House of Commons, the debate upon them, and the comments of the London Times. All I want to say in regard to that is that since those resolutions passed and since that debate the whole question so far as I know—the Senator may differ with me—has fallen entirely flat in Great Britain, and there is by general consent an abstinence from any raising of a question of changing the standard of exchange or of value in that country. It may be that reasons such as were alleged in the speech in the British House of Commons which was read by the Senator from Virginia were given, but what I contend for is that the same conditions which make prosperity there will make prosperity here, if they are allowed to work out their legitimate results without the constant threat made that there is going to be a change in the standard of value in order to pay debts contracted in the gold standard in cheapened silver.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Virginia permit me to say a word?

Mr. DANIEL. I am trying to make a speech, and I hope Senators will be good enough to make their speeches in their own time.

Mr. GRAY. I have interrupted the Senator, and I beg his pardon.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator allow me to introduce a statement from the London Statist which answers the question of the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. DANIEL. I have that statement here, and shall come to it directly, but I shall be glad if the Senator from Georgia will send it to me now, because I want to take one idea after another.

Mr. BACON. I send it to the Senator marked.

Mr. DANIEL. I am very much obliged to the Senator for his courtesy.

Mr. President, I have answered all the questions which the Senator from Delaware has asked me, and he now comes with an abstract proposition which he does not ask me as a question, but enunciates it as a relief to himself.

Mr. GRAY. And as a comment upon your answer.

WHY THE GOLD STANDARD IS NOT GOOD FOR AMERICA.

Mr. DANIEL. And as a comment upon my answer the Senator now declares that if America would only come to the gold standard, as the gold standard has brought prosperity to Great Britain, it would bring prosperity here. I beg leave to say to the Senator that if he has read the views of the leading financiers of Great Britain, as expressed in the international monetary congresses, he will see that Mr. Rothschild declared that while the gold standard was a good thing for Great Britain, if the rest of the world were to try to come to a gold standard it would produce widespread panic and ruin. Mr. President, one man may live on bacon and another on beef. There may be enough bacon for one man to grow fat and hardy upon, and there may not be enough for two men to grow fat and hardy upon; and the trouble about the gold standard is that there are not enough rations to go around, and that you can not go to a gold standard without reducing the prices of wages in the United States, without reducing the prices of produce and land in the United States, and without paying to Great Britain double the quantity in produce and labor that we are now paying in order to discharge our debt to her.

Mr. GRAY. You recognize that we are on the gold standard in this country?

THE SOPHISM THAT WE ARE ON THE GOLD STANDARD NOW.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I do not recognize that we are on the gold standard in this country; and if we are upon the gold standard in this country, the Democratic party carried the last Presidential election by a false pretence. It elected its President upon the declaration that, "We hold to both gold and silver as standard money of the country, and to the coinage of both metals without discrimination." We could not hold on to it if we did not have it, and there was not a political party in the United States, neither Populist, Democratic, nor Republican, nor was there a Democratic Senator upon this floor, who, prior to this session, ever pretended that we were upon a gold standard.

Now, I ask the Senator a question which I hope he will not respond to with a speech, unless he makes it in his own time. I ask him, if the United States is to-day upon a gold standard, when it got there?

Mr. GRAY. I can answer, without making a speech, that the United States is on a gold standard just so long as it maintains all the silver money and all the paper money of the United States on a parity with gold, the bullion value of the silver money not being equal to gold.

Mr. DANIEL. I have just as much right to say that we are upon a silver standard because we maintain gold at a parity with silver.

Mr. GRAY. Yes; but silver bullion is not equal to gold bullion in commercial value.

OUR LAWS SHOW THAT WE ARE NOT ON THE GOLD STANDARD.

Mr. DANIEL. I look to our laws to find what standard we are upon; and, in reply to the Senator's question or assertion, I say that we can not destroy the gold standard, because we are not upon it. Our original mint law made the silver dollar the unit of coinage, and in providing for the coinage of both metals based our currency upon the double standard in the year 1792. It is true that we did not coin but 8,000,000 standard silver dollars prior to 1873, and it is also true that on the 12th of February, 1873, we stopped the coinage of these dollars, and on June 20, 1874, by the Revised Statutes, we made the silver coins of the United States a legal tender for payments not exceeding $5. But it has been truly stated that, while this made all silver dollars coined prior to 1873 legal tender only in sums not exceeding $5, it was evidently an oversight, and that this error was eliminated by the Bland-Allison Act of 1878, which provided for the restoration of the full legal-tender quality of all of the silver dollars theretofore coined by the United States of like weight and fineness to those whose coinage was provided for under that act. So that now all the silver dollars of the Government which ever possessed the legal-tender feature possess it to an unqualified extent. I take this sentence from the excellent book of Mr. Armistead C. Gordon, of Staunton, Va., on Congressional Currency, and there should be added to it "unless otherwise stipulated in the contract."

My contention is that we are upon the double standard in all transactions except when otherwise stipulated in the contract, and if you stipulate in a contract to pay gold dollars, that is on the gold standard; if you stipulate to pay silver dollars, that is on the silver standard; if you stipulate simply to pay dollars, according to the general usages of trade and as in the vast mass of our transactions, you are upon the double standard, and may pay in either.

Mr. President, if we were to go to silver coinage we should not destroy any gold standard. If we were temporarily thrown upon the sole use of silver, as soon as the spasm of alarm was over the gold and silver would mingle together and gold would be brought to us by the rising prices of our products abroad. We are upon the mixed standard of gold, silver, and paper, of limping, humpbacked bimetallism, with a supplement of paper money. It is the mass of legal-tender money that constitutes the standard. If we appropriate money to build ships in an appropriation bill in this body, if we appropriate for the salary of an officer, if we estimate for the cost of a Navy, we make those estimates and assessments in the double standard of gold or silver, supplemented by paper. We can not be upon the gold standard, nor has any political party in the United States as yet so imagined or so declared.

THE SOPHISM THAT SILVER MONEY IS SUSTAINED BY GOVERNMENT CREDIT OR REDEMPTION.

Mr. President, in this connection, and as cognate to the question which the Senator from Delaware asked me, in reply to those who declare that our silver money is sustained as a subsidiary money in this country by the credit of the Government, as is often stated—and the undertone of such a suggestion lies in the assertion of the Senator from Delaware that we are upon a gold standard—I will say that in 1894, in the canvass in the city of Richmond, I was met by the same suggestion by some of my critics; and in order that I might be possessed of official documents to answer it, I wrote to the Secretary of the Treasury, and I have here a copy of his letter, of the letter which he sent me, which I publish to show the ingenuousness and sincerity and veracity of my statement. He says:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., October 18, 1895.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 12th instant, and to inform you, in reply to first, second, and third questions therein contained, that there is no statute or practice of this Department under which any of the standard silver dollars coined by this Government can be converted into gold at the Treasury.

In answer to your fourth question, as to whether there is any method by which gold dollars may be converted into silver dollars at the Treasury, I have to state that there is no established method, but that the Department would not refuse to receive gold dollars in exchange for silver dollars, when requested to make the exchange, if at the time of such request there should be in the Treasury a sufficient amount of silver dollars above that required to be held for silver certificates and Treasury notes outstanding.

Respectfully, yours,

J. G. CARLISLE, Secretary.

Hon. JOHN W. DANIEL, Lynchburg, Va.

So that the silver dollars of the United States to-day stand upon their own bottom, not looking to any redemption, but fighting and achieving their own way throughout the world by the demand of the people for their possession and by their equal function of debt-paying, tax-paying, and purchasing power.

THE SOPHISM THAT SILVER WILL NOT CIRCULATE.

It was suggested by one of the Senator's colleagues who is in near unison with him upon this subject, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS], that our silver would not circulate; and we have often the sneering finger of the monometallist pointed to the Treasury and to the heaps of silver piled up there, with the declaration that our dollars will not circulate. I have here the statement of the Treasury, dated the 1st of April, 1896. Since then it has not varied, but that was the day upon which I made my figures. If you will examine that statement you will see that more silver dollars in proportion and their representatives are in circulation to-day in the United States than gold. Here is the statement:

April 1, 1896.

GOLD.

Total:
Coin	$588,743,303
Bullion	29,054,663
	617,797,966
In Treasury	142,831,047
In circulation:
Coin	445,912,256
Certificates	43,239,249

SILVER.

Total:
Coin	426,289,916
Subsidiary coin	78,216,677
Bullion	122,187,306
	626,693,899
In Treasury:
Coin	371,497,164
Subsidiary coin	15,246,374
	386,743,538
Silver certificates	122,187,306
	508,930,744
In circulation:
Coin	$54,792,752
Subsidiary coin	62,970,303
Silver certificates	337,032,436
Treasury notes of 1890	103,728,956
	558,524,447

Thus it will appear that of our whole stock of gold—that is, $617,797,966—there are $489,151,505 in circulation; and that of our whole stock of silver—that is, $626,693,899—there are $558,524,447 in circulation.

Let no one be deceived by the fact that so many standard silver dollars are in the Treasury. They are represented, every one of them except a few, by an outstanding silver certificate.

There are $386,743,538 of silver coins in the Treasury and there are outstanding $440,763,492 of certificates. So there are not enough silver dollars there to meet outstanding demand upon them. There is more money based on silver in circulation in the United States by over $50,000,000 than there are silver coins in the Treasury, and more by about $70,000,000 than there are standard silver dollars in the Treasury, and far more silver proportionately in circulation than gold. Yet we are met upon the floor of the Senate with a bald assertion that "silver will not circulate" and that we are on the gold standard.

THE SOPHISM THAT CHEAPNESS IS A BLESSING.

Mr. President, as the Senator here is so heartily at work to put down the price of American land and American produce, I know he feels that he is bent upon a benevolent and patriotic service. He is one of the gentlemen who believe that cheapness is a blessing. I should like to analyze the proposition of cheapness a little and see upon whom it dispenses its fruition.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] a few days ago took up the same song.

Is it an evil—

He asked—

which mankind should defend against that the prices of those things which make for human comfort and joy should decrease? Is it lamentable that the family which depends for bread, clothes, and education on the toiling father's wages should be able to buy now for one day of his labor many times as much of all the means of happiness as he could have thus provided in past generations? * * *

Falling prices!—

He exclaimed—

May they continue to fall until everything of excellence shall be within the reach of all deserving men; till mankind shall revel in abundance. Falling prices means shorter hours of labor, longer hours of enlightenment. It is the hope of the good and wise that looks to a coming time when all the earth affords for the needs and happiness of those man loves and toils for shall be so abundantly and cheaply provided that the curse of toil may vanish in the blessing of labor, which is only beneficent.

Such is the stream of eloquence which is poured forth from the lips of the eloquent Senator from Wisconsin, and which I have heard time and again from the eloquent Senator from Delaware. Let us argue a little. To put all the comforts and luxuries of life easily within the reach of man is a laudable undertaking. But to make one set of things dear and another set of things cheap by operation of law is to place society into two classes and is to organize class legislation.

The millennium day, which the Senator seems to behold in a vision, will be slow coming, I fear, under a system which is manifestly working out this evil. The people who are to buy cheaply, and whom the Senator has in mind, must get money to buy with. They were not born with silver spoons or with gold dollars in their mouths. They must first get money in the process of evolution of the purchase of work and by selling the produce of their labor. If their produce gets cheaper and cheaper, how in the name of sense are they to get anything without great cost of labor and without great volume of production? The trouble with the Senator's idea is that it is only one-sided. If bonds were cheap, we would all buy them and live on their interest. If money were cheap, we would all get it easily and with little labor. The trouble is that the system which the Senator advocates makes money and bonds dear by the constant appreciation of money, and labor is made cheap and its produce cheap, so that those who have the money and bonds are constantly getting richer and those who have labor to produce are constantly getting poorer. There is not a usurer upon the face of the earth who grinds the faces of the poor whose heart would not thrill with delight to hear the Senator's praise of falling prices. The mortgages are not falling, the bonds are not falling, the taxes are not falling, but it is the labor and prices that are falling. Only the means of meeting them and redeeming them are falling, and with every new weight of burden that is put on the toiler's back the Senator claps his hands and shouts with joy and says, "How prices are falling"; and the producer is going down. Rothschild rejoiced at the Brussels conference at the cheapness of wheat. What did that mean to the American farmer who supplies him and his country with it? Where are the farmers and where are the laborers who are rejoicing in the cheapness of all they produce and sell? Can the Senator point me to any constituency of that kind clamoring for the gold standard or tell me who is sustaining it out in the country?

THE LONDON TIMES REJOICING IN CHEAPNESS FOR BRITONS.

Mr. President, the Senator still keeps in pleasant chime with his admirable English friends. The London Times not long since had this remark:

It seems impossible to get bimetallists to understand that there is quite a large number of us for whom a general rise of prices has no charms whatever. We like them low, and the lower the better. If they all went down to half their present figures we should rejoice—

That is, we Britons, Englishmen, people who are buying—because we have nothing to sell and a great many things to buy.

So the London Times answers the question which the Senator put to me as to what was the difference between Great Britain and America, and he shows you why Great Britain is getting rich—"because they have nothing to sell and a great many things to buy"; and the reason why we are getting poorer is because we have so many things to sell that we are selling to them cheaper, cheaper all the time.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator does not believe any such statement?

Mr. DANIEL. I believe it is a little extravagant, as the Senator's assertion and as many of our assertions are, but it is a rough draft of a great truth.

WHAT CHEAPNESS IS.

Cheapness is a low degree of commercial value, commercially speaking. It is that which requires but little labor. It is a relative term. There is no such thing as positive, absolute, invariable cheapness, as there is no such thing as positive, absolute, invariable value. Time, place, circumstance, demand, and supply must settle what is cheap, as they must settle what is valuable, in a commercial sense. If the price of an article falls with relation to other articles you call it in a condition of cheapness. For instance, if a peace is declared arms are cast aside. They have all the intrinsic qualities that they had in war, but they become cheap because no longer needed. The bicycle is invented; the demand for horses lessens, and they become cheap. Spring dawns with warm suns; and winter clothes become cheap. The question of cheapness or dearness depends in its interest to you upon which side of the counter you are on. Being upon the American side of the counter, where an active and industrious and working nation is pouring the fruits of its toils into the markets of the world, I want them to be dear that we may get the British gold for which they would then sell.

THE PRESIDENT ONCE MOURNED OVER DECLINING LANDS AND INCREASING DEBTS.

Nor, sir, have I always been without friends amongst those who admire and who share the Senator's philosophy. Let me ask the Senator to turn to President Cleveland's message of 1888, and he will perceive that a flash of the truth that I am now preaching went across the Presidential mind:

Our farmers, long-suffering and patient, struggling in the race of life with hardest and most unremitting toil, will not fail to see, in spite of misrepresentations and misleading fallacies, that they are obliged to accept such prices for their products as are fixed in foreign markets, where they compete with the farmers of the world; that their lands are declining in value while their debts increase; and that, without compensating favor, they are forced by the action of the Government to pay for the benefit of others such enhanced prices for things that they need that the scanty returns of their labor fail to furnish their support or leave no margin for accumulation.

The President of the United States, eight years ago, deplored a condition which was forcing down the value of American land and American produce, but to-day his defenders and champions upon this floor exalt the glory of cheapness and rejoice that the millennium of falling prices has come.

HOW THE BRITISH ARE WORKING US.

I do not know that I have the same piece from the London Statist which my friend from Georgia referred to, but I could read all day from the London press and from the London propaganda of the gold standard the doctrines upon which they rely in their commercial conquest of the world. I will read a little piece from it of January 11, 1896:

In 1895 we purchased—

Says the London Statist—

15,688,000 hundredweight of raw cotton, against 16,013,000 hundredweight in 1890, a diminution of 345,000 hundredweight or 2 per cent; but we paid for our raw cotton supplies £12,327,000 less in 1895 than in 1890. Had we purchased the same quantity in both years the benefit to this country from the fall in the price of cotton would have been £11,500,000. In 1895 we purchased 100,118,000 hundredweight of wheat and flour, as against 76,247,000 hundredweight in 1890, an increase of 23,871,000, or 31 per cent, while we have actually paid about £2,451,000 less in 1895 than in 1890, the value of our wheat and flour imports in 1895 having been £32,207,000, against £23,361,000 in 1890. In other words, at the 1890 level of prices we should have paid £42,880,000 for our wheat and flour supplies in 1895, whereas we have actually paid only £30,207,000, a benefit from the lower price of no less than £12,600,000. Our imports of wool for 1895 exceeded those of 1890 by 142,000,000 pounds, or 22 per cent; but in 1895 we actually paid £830,000 less than we did in 1890—that is to say, we have paid £23,321,000 for wool in 1895 which at the 1890 level of prices would have cost us £33,100,000, a benefit of about £9,800,000. In 1895 we imported 31,157,000 hundredweight of sugar, as against 25,093,000 hundredweight in 1890, an increase of 5,404,000, or 21 per cent, and with this enormous increase in quantity we have actually paid £390,000 less in cash, the cash value of our sugar imports in 1895 having been £17,685,000, as against £18,075,000 in 1890. At the 1890 level of prices we should have paid for sugar imported in 1895, £21,870,000, as against the actual cost of £17,685,000, a benefit from the fall in price of over £4,000,000.

London is rejoicing and pressing its policy and propagating the gold doctrine because they say, behold how the oil and the wine and the riches of the earth are flowing into our hands under this British gold-standard process.

THE SOPHISM THAT GOLD IS THE MONEY OF CIVILIZATION.

Mr. President, we are sometimes told that gold is the money of civilization. I reply that silver is also the money of civilization, for there is not a civilized country in all the world that does not use it, and not one that proposes entirely to abolish it. We are then told that the civilized nations are making gold the standard of value and simply using silver as subsidiary coin. I reply that the masses of the plain people in these civilized nations are paying very dearly for their whistle, and that America, which has free idea, more so than any of them, should lead them, and not be led by them. All the great civilized nations of the world, Great Britain, France, Germany, Russia, Prussia, Italy, and so on, were under the rule of monarchs when we declared our national independence. We set the liberty ball in motion and have had great influence in liberalizing other institutions as well as our own. Their conspiracy of kings was organized when Monroe taught them by his doctrine that America was no longer a field for their exploitation. What they sought to accomplish by steel, the kings of the earth are now seeking to accomplish by gold—by the most subtle art of gold. There is not an autocrat of Europe who is not firmly fixed upon his throne to-day through the work of America in foolishly following his policy. Napoleon was wont to declare that British gold was often the more potent factor in deciding the destinies of the European nations than the largest armies led by his ablest generals. It is British gold that has reversed the governments of liberty; and stanch American principles ought to resist it just as they would resist British bayonets upon our shores and British ships upon the ocean. Civilization has always moved in cycles. Herbert Spencer, indeed, teaches that all motion is undulatory and that all civilization has certainly been so, sagging down now and then in deterioration and then blooming out in long periods of prosperity. Nothing has so impeded the progress of this age as the disorganization of its money system and our sagging down and giving way from virile American principles; and if it shall be persisted in it will not end until standing armies are invoked to stamp out the uprisings of the people.

Mr. President, I have another speech before me that was made in the British House of Commons on the 17th of March last by Mr. Balfour, who in that address set forth the same theory that Sir W. Holdsworth set forth in his remarks at the Brussels conference, and who went on to show his British brethren that the world was not going very long to submit to it, in his opinion. He said:

The whole trend of civilized opinion is in the direction of a double standard [cries of "No!" and cheers]; and I confess that I look forward to a period when it will be accepted not merely by the great commercial nations of which I have been speaking, not merely by the great manufacturing classes of Lancashire, and by the vast majority of the representatives of agriculture, but also by the great body of opinion within this great commercial center of the Empire. [Cheers.]

THE SOPHISM THAT WE MUST SUSTAIN THE CREDIT OF THE GOVERNMENT BY GOLD PAYMENTS.

Mr. President, we are sometimes taught that we must sustain the credit of the Government, with an implied intimation that there is some one on this side of the Chamber or some portion of the American people who are not sensitive to the obligations of their Government, and who are faltering in rendering it the due and loyal support it should have from every citizen.

An axiomatic principle like this declaration I will take no issue with. I think the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] spoke truly and rightly when he said that the honor and credit of this Government should be as sacred as a soldier's grave. But I resent the imputation that I am doing anything or would do anything or am capable of thinking or desiring anything that would be against the honor and credit of the American Republic, one of whose sons I am. I challenge the specification. What is credit? Credit is faith. What is faith but a reliance that a promise which has been made will be observed? It is not an assurance that something else than the promise will be done. What is the greenback promise? Here it is; read it. Let your Supreme Court interpret it to me. Let the intelligence and honor of the world sit in judgment upon it, and I will abide there. Our Supreme Court have said that the greenback is redeemable in silver dollars, and yet some of us are to be reproached because we comply with the honest text of the paper and with its fair exposition by the judges who are called upon to interpret it.

THE SOPHISM THAT FREE COINAGE IS "ONLY FOR THE MINE OWNERS' BENEFIT."

Mr. President, this great cause and its advocates are sometimes attempted to be belittled by the declaration that they are only fighting for the mine owners' benefit. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], and many of their confreres are continually urging us to do something for the sheepowners' benefit by levying taxes upon those who wear woolens. The New England men in this body never tire in their endeavor to regulate taxes and commerce to favor their fishermen and their manufacturers. Louisiana men have manifested no entire indifference to the sweetness of sugar. All States are up in arms to protect—by which they mean to tax others to protect—their wage earners and their pockets by national legislation. But the silver-mine owner is not one of the elect amongst the great protected classes. If it were true that the mine owner wanted protection and the whole silver movement was a mere movement of protection, tell me, ye gentle shepherds of Ohio, and Vermont, and Pennsylvania, and of the Western pastures, and all the Eastern factories, tell me why the mine owner is not as rightly entitled to protection as your flocks and your production. Furthermore, let me ask, is it not just as well to protect our American mines as to protect British gold mines? All the value which we have taken by our policy out of the silver mines of the West we have simply transferred, as through a legislative pipe, into the gold mines of Australia and South Africa and all other parts of the world.

Look at the statement of the production of the Witwatersrand mines in South Africa. See how they have developed—494,869 ounces of gold in 1890, and are annually increasing the output as follows: In 1891, 729,238 ounces; in 1892, 1,210,868 ounces; in 1893, 1,478,473 ounces. Then the Sherman law repeal struck in and closed the American silver mines. Ships were loaded with new mining machinery in the English ports, and went steaming on their way to exploit the British mines. The next year—1894—2,024,159 ounces were produced, and the Englishman took the profit out of his gold mine that we had destroyed in the American silver mine.

PROTECTION FOR THE MASSES IN FREE SILVER COINAGE.

The great injustice of the protective tariff system lies in the fact that it does not and can not protect all alike. In making this analogy or comparison between silver and other products I did not mean to say that I advocated that system or gave my adhesion to it. The question of silver is not one of protection, as presented to my mind, for the mine owner, but one for the comprehensive and entire benefit of all the American industrial classes of every kind—farmer, merchant, manufacturer, and taxpayer in every State, in every county, and in every community of the United States—and if it be a protection it is one in which every American citizen except some greedy usurer will have equal stock and equal benefit.

THE SOPHISM THAT "WE MUST HAVE MONEY GOOD ALL THE WORLD OVER."

We are told that we must mint money from our mints that is good all the world over. In a certain sense I do not dissent from this, but the money of different nations circulates but little beyond their borders. We never see English money in America, nor seldom see American money in Europe. It is but a small proportion of the money of Europe that comes here and a small proportion of our money that goes there. Obligations are settled by exchanges and commodities, and it is in goods that they are mostly paid. Money that would be good in America would be good all over the world, for here there is more demand for it than anywhere else in the world, and at any other place the difference in value could only be measured by the cost of transportation.

THE SOPHISM THAT "WE MUST HAVE THE BEST MONEY IN THE WORLD."

Mr. President, we are told that we should have the best money in the world. This leads me to inquire, What is the best money in the world? The judgment of three thousand years of civilization is in favor of both gold and silver as constituting the best money in the world. The fact that they are the best money in the world is attested by the further fact that all civilized nations in all times have so regarded them, and that no one proposes wholly to exclude silver. The question now raised does not concern the value of a specific silver coin, but concerns the quantity of the coin, and as to the method of employing them, and as to their particular function. The dearest money in the world is thought by no nation, and by no people, and by no person that I know of to be the best. Were this otherwise, we should coin money out of some metal dearer than gold. The best money in the world is that which the world has been long accustomed to; that which has been made or employed in its outstanding contracts and obligations; that which in its nature shows that it is fitted for the uses of the world, and is eagerly sought by all classes of people in the world all the world over.

The best money in the world is that money which will discharge any debt or obligation, public or private, of the country which creates it. This is another definition which I give of the best money in the world; and we have no such money here in the United States to-day either of silver or gold, for the Supreme Court of the United States, that marvelous body of mystics which makes and unmakes constitutions, and has recently discovered that it has been wrong for a hundred years—the Supreme Court has decided that we have no such money.

What do I mean by this declaration? I mean this: That the Supreme Court has decided that if a man enters into a contract to pay dollars of one metal of certain specific fineness, he can not discharge the debt by paying any other kind of dollars. It results from this decision that if a man promise to pay greenback dollars he must pay them and them only; if he contracts to pay silver dollars, then he must pay them only, and if he contracts to pay gold dollars, he must pay them only. This decision has undermined our bimetallic system. It has overturned our Constitution, and has put the metals that make the dollars at the mercy of speculators.

It is at the root of our disordered currency, for it enables the speculator and usurer to corner our metal at any time he pleases and force it out of circulation.

The idea of our Constitution in reposing in Congress the power to coin money and to regulate the value thereof, and that no State should make anything but gold and silver legal tender, was to put the two metals into a legislative melting pot, and to have the dollar as an ideal composed indifferently of either; and when the court parted the two metals in legal association it laid the groundwork of disintegration, and with $1,500,000,000 of money in circulation, there is not a whole, solid dollar in the whole mass that will discharge any debt or any tax which may become the burden of a citizen.

THE SOPHISM THAT "PARITY OF UNITS MUST BE SUSTAINED BY GOLD PAYMENTS OF SILVER OBLIGATIONS."

We are told in this connection that "all the units of our currency must be at parity." We are told that all our monetary units must be at parity with each other. So say we all—that is, just so far as the law can make them so. Greenbacks and gold have been at a premium recently. Silver dollars were at a premium of from 3 to 5 per cent at the very time when the Sherman law was repealed. We can not make a currency system embracing hundreds of millions of dollars, operating throughout the commerce of 70,000,000 people, operate with the nicety of a stop watch. But one thing is clear, that we can never maintain the unities of the volume of currency at a parity with each other without giving to all the units "unity of function," without giving to each unit all the functions that we give to another unit. It is the functions that the law imparts to money by which it gains its power. Money has a threefold function: First, the power to pay debts; second, the power to pay taxes; third, the power to purchase. The dollar of debt is also the equivalent to the dollar of debt or taxes that has to be paid, but the purchasing power, which is largely derived from its functions, can never be a fixed and unvariable force.

Two things are absolutely certain. First, that it is not by any of the shifts of the Treasury that we now maintain the parity of our silver money. Not one of the dollars issued under the Bland-Allison Act of 1878 has ever been redeemed in gold, and the Secretary of the Treasury has no discretion to redeem any of them in gold, nor can he either exchange a gold dollar for a silver dollar. Notwithstanding all this, silver dollars and silver certificates are now and have ever been at par, sustaining themselves as such simply by their debt and tax paying power and by the purchasing power of the silver dollar possessing such legal-tender function. Second, the pretense that the Sherman certificates and the greenbacks which are payable by law either in silver or gold must be maintained at parity by giving the holder the right to demand them in gold is a mere pretense and nothing more. The Bland certificates and dollars are just as good as they are without any such pretense existing in respect to them, and it is plain that to transfer to the holder the option which the Government possesses by law to demand either gold or silver is to stand the pyramid upon its apex and to reverse the whole system of bimetallism. So long as the holder does not know whether he will get silver or gold if he presents his greenback or Sherman silver certificate, he has no motive to exalt silver or gold the one before the other, but the moment that he is informed at the Treasury that he will be paid gold if he demands it he is given the motive to demand it whenever he fancies it is better than silver. Thus the demand for the dearer metal is increased at a time when, to preserve their equilibrium, demand should be centered upon the weaker metal. Thus reenforcement is given to a raid upon and the desire for gold at the very moment when they should be resisted. The two hundred and sixty-two millions of debt which we have already piled up is a monumental warning against a policy so professedly illogical and so obviously ruinous, and should be a warning to other ages against the inventions of modern sophistry, against the experience of ages.

THE SOPHISM OF "THE HONEST DOLLAR."

They say that the silver dollars of free coinage would not be honest dollars. I answer, the reverse of this proposition is true. It is dishonest to deny to those who have contracted debts the right to pay them in dollars that conform to the contract, and dishonest to prevent them from paying them by stopping coinage, so as to enhance the difficulty and increase the burden of paying it. There is downright wickedness in moving to the gold standard and leaving outstanding to be paid on it obligations solvable in the double standard—the wickedness that the Master denounced when He said, "The love of money is the root of all evil."

The moralists of the stock exchange turn in abhorrence from the idea of a debtor paying a cheap dollar to his creditor. At the same time they rejoice in compelling him to pay a dearer dollar than he contracted to pay. What sort of morality is this? We can not measure great matters in apothecary scales, but Justice walks in the middle of the road without diverting its footsteps to the one side or the other. It would not clip the dollar and let the debtor pay less than he contracted to pay, neither would it pad the dollar and make him pay more than he had contracted to pay. Free coinage is right because it acts without discrimination upon both the dearer and the cheaper metal; because it walks in the middle of the way; because it is the nearest proximity to justice on all sides that can be attained.

Wherein the silver dollar is dishonest is not discernible to the naked eye of a clear conscience. It was provided for by the first coinage act of the United States. It was recommended by Hamilton and Jefferson, and approved by Washington. It is the same dollar in 1896 that it was declared to be in 1792, containing as many grains of silver, maintaining its parity with gold, filling its office with as perfect functions as any piece of machinery in the economy of States, and passing everywhere, without discount or discredit, for exactly what it purports to be. It has fought in every war of the Republic, and has been the vade mecum of the people through all the days of peace.

I would like those who are prating of "honest" dollars to read Balfour's speech in the House of Commons on the 17th of March last, and see the clear statement of an honest Englishman. He said:

> I will tell the right honorable gentleman why. The right honorable gentleman tells us, and tells us truly, that the debts of this country are paid in commodities which are estimated upon a gold basis, and that the result of the appreciation of gold, which has gone on during the last twenty years, is that the creditor country paid in commodities gets a very much larger proportion of commodities than on the original gold value of the commodities it had the slightest right to. Does the right honorable gentleman think that this creditor argument is one which commends itself to those who have got to pay debts in this country? What they ask and what we ask is that some standard of debts which could be valid over a long period of years should be adopted not only between individuals but between countries. We hold—and this is held by the best scientific economic opinion of every party all over the world—that this would be more effectively secured by the bimetallic system than by the monometallic system. [Cries of "No"!] I do not say that that opinion is right, but I do say that it is the opinion of all economic authorities. ["No!" No!"] If foreign countries hold, as they do hold, that the single standard has the result of artificially increasing the burden of their debts to this country, they will think, and think truly, that the right honorable gentleman is not so much occupied in maintaining what is called an honest currency as with the object of obtaining a currency which will get more than their just debts from our debtors.

THE SOPHISM THAT "DEMONETIZATION OF SILVER WAS NOT INSPIRED BY GREED."

It is said that the demonetization of silver in 1873 was not inspired by the greed of capital because silver was then a dearer dollar than gold. I may answer, first, that the fact that it was a dearer dollar than gold—worth a 3 per cent premium as proved—does not show that it was not demonetized, as so many contend, because it was a cheaper dollar. It was worth a premium because France was free coining silver at 15½ to 1 while we put 16 of silver to 1 of gold in a dollar. I reply, second, that the demonetization was inspired by greed if we may believe the popular declarations of the English propagandists. It mattered little to them, originally, whether they demonetized silver or gold. They selected silver as the metal to be dishonored for two reasons: First, because great mines of silver had recently been discovered in the West in America and they anticipated from them a great outflow of silver into the mints; and just as Europe organized a raid against gold when gold was discovered in California, so now it egged on a raid against silver because it had been discovered in large quantities in America.

OF EQUAL INTRINSIC VALUE.

We are also told by the same school of sophists that all the units of money must be of equal intrinsic value. I will reply first by the phrase, "If you will put the dollar in the silver bullion, you will find the intrinsic value in the dollar." I reply further that value is not a substance. It is the relation of substance and of function to demand and to use. That word "intrinsic" and that word "value" are used in most misleading and deceitful senses.

It is an admitted fact that the action of law is a factor in fixing the value of money. This is demonstrated by the fact that all agree to the proposition that the consensus of nations, "international agreement," as it is called, could establish a ratio between gold and silver and maintain that ratio. So universally is it admitted that the law is a factor in determining money value that I deem it needless further to argue it.

But it is said the United States can not alone determine the value of gold and silver so far as to fix and maintain a ratio between them. I shall not insist that it is certain that the United States can do so.

Here is a United States dollar coined at a ratio of 16 of silver to 1 of gold. We are told that it will buy two Mexican dollars, each of them containing more silver than the United States dollar, and it is argued that our dollars will go down to the value of Mexican dollars if we have the free coinage of silver. I draw very different deductions from this fact: (1) It conclusively answers the argument that the value of money is proportioned to its intrinsic qualities—or "value," as these qualities are sometimes called. It shows to me that the demand for money to pay debt and taxes is so great in the United States that it gives to the dollar fully one-half of its value; (2) it shows to me that the demand for money in the United States is at least twice as great as the demand for money in Mexico; (3) it shows that the mere function imparted to the bullion by the United States mint gives that bullion 50 per cent of its worth in exchange.

THE SOPHISM THAT "LAW CAN NOT CREATE VALUE."

And yet we are told that law can not create value; that only Deity can create it. If value were a material thing this would be true; for it is a fact, as stated by Edward Atkinson, that "man can create nothing; he can only move something." Yes; men can think and men can move things, and his change of the relation of things by their transposition is what creates value. Meissonier takes a brush, a few dollars' worth of paint, and a little canvas, and by transposing their relations makes a picture of Napoleon which sells for $75,000. Who will say that he did not create value? An artist and a chisel convert a marble stone into a Venus de Medici, and the nations vie for its image. Is not that value? Bell takes a wire and a tube, and there is a telephone. Are not the machines that spring from his thought value? Value is not a simple idea. It is a complex one. We can conceive of a single horse, of a single tree, of a single grain of sand, of a single lump of gold, of a single lump of silver, but we can not conceive of any value inherent in any one of these things by itself. We can conceive of two horses, two trees, two grains of sand, two lumps of gold, and two lumps of silver, but no reduplication of objects in our vision gives rise to the idea of value. We must conceive first of the thing, and then of the person, and third of the use or desire or need that a person has for the thing and what he is willing to do or give for it before the idea of commercial value enters into the mind. Value is therefore a relation between (1) a person, and (2) a thing, and (3) the desire of the person for the thing, and (4) the labor or whatever the person with the desire will do or give for the thing demanded or desired; and what a person is willing to do or give for the thing demanded or desired is the measure of value which he attaches to it.

A mind that can not fuse into a composite idea these four elemental ideas can not conceive of commercial value, and takes refuge in some vague notion that it is only a divine gift.

That the law can create value is an axiom of political economy. It is a self-evident fact. Protectionists know that the law can create value, and are therefore in favor of putting a high tax on the entrance of foreign articles into our ports in order that domestic articles of like character may supply the demands of our people and have a higher value attached to them by the exclusion of foreign competition. By concentration of popular demand on the domestic articles they increase their prices. Free traders and revenue-tariff men know that law creates value and diminishes value. They know that if a farmer has $500 to spend and can get his goods at 30 or 40 per cent less than he is paying for them by free trade you have created that additional value to his commodity and to the land that produced it. The law creates value in gold and silver by giving it privileges of coinage or taking it away. A piano is a musical instrument, but it is not music. Neither commodity nor money is value by itself, though both are instruments of value and valuation. When the piano comes into relation with a performer, who touches its keys, the product of the mechanism of the performer and the mechanism of the instrument is music. When the commodity or money comes into relation with one who needs and demands them, the product of the demand in the person and the supply in the thing makes the value of their relation to each other.

THE DOUBLE SOPHISM THAT FREE COINAGE OF SILVER "WILL CONTRACT THE CURRENCY BY DRIVING OUT GOLD" AND "WILL DELUGE US WITH CHEAP MONEY."

But we are told, and told for the thousandth time, in the face of the contradictions of our history, that if we have free coinage we will contract our currency by driving out our gold, and with the words yet warm upon the lips of him who utters this statement we are told that we will be deluged with cheap silver dollars. We can not have a drought and a deluge at the same time. We can not expand and contract at the same time. We can not go both ways at once. One of these propositions might possibly be true, but both of them can not possibly be true. I do not believe that either is wholly true. It is obvious that the free coinage of silver would cheapen gold, for when two things can be used for the same purpose instead of one, it takes the demand from the one and distributes it amongst the two. Gold would come down and silver would go up in value. The silver dollars would not be cheap, and the gold dollars would not be so dear as they are now. The two would be brought together by the magnetic influence of an equal function in the discharge of debts and taxation.

They say that free coinage will drive out gold. Out of what? Out of the country? Should such be the case would not the volume of gold going into other countries increase the currency there? Would it not consequently increase prices there? Would we not therefore get more for the hundred million dollars of products which we sell? Would this not strengthen our balance of trade with foreign nations? Would not this pour wealth back into our coffers? It is evident that it would. But do they mean that it would simply drive it out of circulation and into hoards and safes and banks? If so, just as soon as property began to rise as the silver volume flowed in it would yield to that temptation which always brings money from its hiding places. It would leap forth to get an advantage of rising prices. If it were to retire for a little while it would come forth again. But the fact is, the free coinage of silver in this country has never driven out gold. It was said by the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] that fifty millions of silver would drive away gold, but the Bland-Allison Act was passed, and we had $50,000,000, and now we have $500,000,000. Never yet has it driven away gold, nor has gold gone away for any other purpose than to discharge our debts and to meet a superior demand in Europe to any demand we made. After the Sherman law of 1890 was enacted gold continued to come to us, nor did it leave until the panic in Europe compelled the sale of securities and carried it back. Money attracts money the world over. "To him who hath shall be given."

WHERE THE GOLD GOES NOW.

In the New York Journal Mr. George Rutledge Gibson, a well-known financial authority, shows that for five years Europe has been gaining gold, while the United States has been steadily losing it. From 1890 to 1896 Europe has gained $561,100,000 in gold, besides the gold we have mined in those years. The Journal gives Mr. Gibson's figures, and they are very interesting reading in the face of the education which is being carried on by the gold bugs:

The last five years have witnessed a struggle for gold among the nations, and Europe has obtained possession of the new supplies of the yellow metal coming from the mines, and besides a part of our Treasury and bank reserves. The aggregate gold holdings of European banks covered by monetary statistics at the end of each year, beginning with 1890, is as follows:

December 31, 1890	$970,900,000
December 31, 1891	1,112,400,000
December 31, 1892	1,232,000,000
December 31, 1893	1,217,000,000
December 31, 1894	1,400,000,000
December 31, 1895	1,532,000,000

Here is an almost continuous increase in the gold resources of these banks, while the gold holdings of our associated banks of New York and the net Treasury holdings have declined during this period as follows:

December 31, 1890:
Treasury net gold	$148,972,000
Associated banks of New York, specie, mostly gold	77,812,000
		$220,784,000
December 31, 1895:
Treasury net gold	63,262,000
December 27, 1895:
Associated banks of New York, specie	67,114,000
		130,376,000
Loss within five years		96,408,000

Thus we see that in the race for the possession of gold within this period the European banks have increased their holdings from $970,900,000 in December, 1890, to $1,532,000,000 in 1895, or a gain of $561,000,000, while our chief depositories have lost $96,000,000. Europe not only relieved us of this amount of gold, but of all the gold produced during that period within our borders not consumed here in the arts. The production of gold in the United States in the years 1891, 1892, 1893, 1894, and 1895, according to Wells, Fargo & Co.'s estimates, was $189,500,000.

These figures tell a tale of gold grabbing in Europe, distrust there of American securities and their return here in vast quantities, of immense sums spent abroad by traveling Americans, large payments to foreign shipowners for passengers and freight, and of the utter lack of any power in the American banks and Treasury to attract and accumulate gold. The scramble for gold, which has been a monomania in Europe, is doubtless the result of the general preparations for war by the great state banks, particularly those of France, Germany, and Russia.

If anyone will read the following statement he will see, first, that the Bland-Allison Act of 1878 did not drive gold from us as the gold men declared it would. On the contrary, the year of its passage was the first year that gold began to flow to us, and we received from abroad in 1878 over four millions. In 1879, over a million; in 1880, seventy-seven millions; and in 1881, ninety-seven millions, and so on, until 1884 and 1886 the tide flowed the other way; but in 1887 and 1888 gold flowed to us again and continued to flow to us until the rising monetary disturbances of that year in Great Britain caused it to flow backward. In 1889 nearly fifty millions went away from us because of the increasing disturbances in Great Britain, and since then it has continued to flow abroad on account of the demand created by European nations moving to the gold standard and by reason of the widespread panic that spread from Argentina to Australia and Great Britain.

Clear it is that gold must continue to go from us and pay interest to foreign investors on American stocks and securities, and we may not be able to prevent it by any system of currency here. The trouble is that if it goes away and we do not have silver to take its place it will leave us bereaved and naked and poor indeed.

Here are the figures as to our imports and exports of gold, and they are worthy of study:

THE SOPHISM THAT "SILVER MONEY WOULD BE FIAT MONEY."

We are also put down amongst the creatures of the air who are for fiat money. I answer that all money is fiat money. Gold is fiat money to-day. There is such a thing as natural food for man—the roots of the earth, the fruits of the trees, the grain of the field, the domestic animals; there is natural drink for man, such as water and milk and the juices of natural products. There is natural shelter for man, but there is no such thing as natural money. The wampum beads, made of shells or other commodities of ornament, have been used by nations as a kind of circulating medium. They facilitated exchanges and acted in a crude way as money acts, but they were not money. The law said, "let there be money," and there was money, and without it there can be none.

As money is the only commodity created by law, so it is the only one which a man is compelled to possess by law.

There is a fiat of law in creating money; there is fiat of law in compelling its possession.

Money is the one species of property that all civilized governments compel its citizens to possess under heavy pains and penalties.

Government is sustained by taxation. Taxation consists in the levy of a compulsory contribution from the citizen by government. This contribution, according to our usages, is required to be made in money. If a man owns land he is not permitted to cut off a piece of it and accede it as his contribution. If he owns flocks and herds, mines, goods, wares, merchandise, or what not, he can not requite his contribution by giving a portion of them. He must have money. If he has not got it he must convert his property into it by sale, and if he does not do this, government confiscates and sells enough of his property to get the money that it has called upon him to pay.

No matter who he is, or what he is, he must be taxed, and the tax must be paid in money. Money is therefore the one species of property that law compels the citizen to possess; else to suffer confiscation.

As Government thus imposes upon the citizen the duty to possess money, at the forfeiture of his property, the Government is a robber if it does not itself produce enough money to afford him the opportunity to contribute it without the sacrifice of his property and his home; and the trouble in this country to-day is that with the most wideawake and progressive nation in the world, there are revenue bills and billion-dollar Congresses which exact from the people contributions of money, and do not furnish the volume of currency to supply the demand without driving the citizen into cruel hardship and into enervating and crushing sacrifice.

THE SOPHISM THAT "THE POOR MAN'S DOLLAR MUST BE AS GOOD AS THE RICH MAN'S."

Ah, Mr. President, we are told by the same school of sophists that the poor man's dollar must be as good as the rich man's dollar. It goes without saying, and is so much matter of course that to say it carries insinuations.

It is a fact, however, that the poor men of our country hardly ever see a gold dollar. So far as the mints and our legislation are concerned, we have long since stopped coining the gold dollar piece, and the metallic dollars which go in circulation are nothing but silver. Let us see what the law does with the rich man's dollars, which are in gold coins or certificates of large denominations, and the poor man's dollar, which can never be anything but silver, because no longer are gold pieces produced. Let the rich man drop his dollar into a fire. The law insures its life. He may pick it up an unsightly lump and carry it to the mint and it will be turned back into a new dollar for him. But let a poor man drop a silver dollar into the fire or have it crushed by some heavy vehicle running over it, and the life of the dollar has gone, and it has gone forever, for he may take it to the mint, which will only refuse to do for it what it does day in and day out, year in and year out, for the rich man.

I am for treating all of these dollars alike. Let the man who has the silver take it to the mint and have it coined as from 1792 to 1873, and if it loses its life by accident, let the Government insure it by reimparting its dollar character to the disfigured metal.

THE SOPHISM THAT "OVERPRODUCTION OF SILVER HAS DEPRECIATED IT."

Some say that overproduction of silver has caused its depreciation. They have not read history, or else have not digested it. They do not know the A B C of money. They have not used their reason, else they could not think or say so. It will be admitted that when there is a bountiful supply in proportion to demand of the perishable articles which must be consumed in the season which produces them, such as fresh fruit and vegetables, such as wheat and corn and rye, the value will go down just in proportion as the supply exceeds the demand. But silver and gold are not the perishable products of the spring or summer, nor are they an ice crop of winter, that melts when the sun returns. The silver money which existed a thousand years before Christ is as good silver to-day as if it were minted yesterday, and so the gold. The silver and gold that are plucked from the ruins of Troy or from under the lava of Pompeii are just as good as if they came yesterday from Colorado. A larger production of silver or gold for one year or for ten years or twenty years is but a small addition to the stock of gold and silver accumulated through centuries and centuries. Hence the so-called overproduction for a particular period can not affect the market like the overproduction of green groceries.

One of my distinguished predecessors upon this floor, a scholar and thinker, Hon. R. M. T. Hunter, once a Senator from Virginia, said in a valuable report which he made on this subject:

It seems that for fifty years, from 1750 to 1800 (see Document No. 117, page 50, first session Thirty-first Congress), the quantity of silver raised was to that of gold as 40 to 1, and yet during that period the value of gold was not more than fifteen times as great as that of silver.

The amounts of gold and silver money actually in existence are estimated as follows:

	Gold.	Silver.
1800	£120,000,000	£260,000,000
1848	150,000,000	280,000,000
1880	700,000,000	490,000,000

So, again, we see it was no overproduction of silver money that led to demonetization in 1873 or to any derangement in the par of the metals.

From 1831 to 1840 only £28,000,000 of gold was produced and £52,000,000 of silver. That is nearly two to one of silver to gold.—Schoenhoff on Money and Prices, page 381.

Yet mark the fact that during this period gold and silver kept close together on coinage.

I read a sentence from Schoenhoff, an author quoted a few days ago by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY]:

From 1850 to 1880 the very opposite occurred in regard to production. The world produced more than $2 worth of gold for every dollar's worth of silver.

Yet it was during this period that silver was demonetized on the ground, as alleged by the sapient expounders of monometallism, that silver was overproduced.

There is no authentic table as to the production of the two metals that does not show that it has not been the overproduction of the one or the other that has created the divergence between them, but it is plain that it took place immediately, almost instantaneously, under the process and action of the law.

THE SOPHISM THAT OVERPRODUCTION OF COMMODITIES BY INVENTION HAS DERANGED PRICES.

We are told that the overproduction of commodities through the mechanical inventions that have stimulated the energies and enlarged the powers of man is the cause of their cheapness. The steam engine pours into New York from over the land, and then into Liverpool over the ocean, the wheat crops of the Dakotas. The reaper and mower make a Briareus of every farmer, and it is true that mechanical invention has greatly increased all the productions of the earth and supplied them for the use of man. This accounts for their plentifulness, but it does not account for their continual cheapening, for mechanical invention has moved on an equal line in bringing gold from Alaska and Australia, and in opening the mines in South Africa. If we were to stop the production of commodities by law, does not everyone know that they would become dearer, because mechanical invention could not longer multiply them? Now, we have stopped the production of money by law; we have put a ligature upon the mint, and said you can not coin a silver dollar. We have put a stopper in the silver mine, and said no matter how much silver you produce you shall bring not a dollar to the mint for coinage. By leaving mechanical forces free to produce marketable commodities, and by stopping them from the equally free production of metallic money, we have increased the supply of the commodities and lessened the supply of the money. Hence, that which has been lessened has become dearer by the inevitable law of supply and demand, and that which has multiplied has become cheaper by the same law.

THE SOPHISM THAT GOLD HAS NOT APPRECIATED.

But we are told that gold has not appreciated. Not so thinks the honorable gentleman who now occupies the position of Secretary of the Treasury, and not so thinks his honorable predecessor, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], who once filled the same chair.

Let me read to the Senate two articles from each of these distinguished gentlemen. In the Treasury Department in 1878 the then Secretary of the Treasury, who is now a Senator from Ohio, went on to explain how at one time he had been deluded into the advocacy of the single gold standard. He says, under date of July 15, 1878:

During the monetary conference in Paris, when silver in our country was excluded from circulation by being undervalued, I was strongly in favor of the single standard of gold, and wrote a letter which you will find in the proceedings of that conference, stating briefly my view.

Having made this confession, the Senator then went on to announce his conversion back to the double standard, and to state his reasons therefor.

At that time—

Said he—

the wisest of us did not anticipate the sudden fall of silver or the rise of gold that has occurred.

Mr. President, the trouble with all these gentlemen who are advocating the single standard is that they do not ever seem to have anticipated anything that happened after the country was deluded into taking their advice.

This uncertainty—

He went on to say—

of the relation between the two metals is one of the chief arguments in favor of a monometallic system, but other arguments, showing the dangerous effect upon industry by dropping one of the precious metals from the standard of value, outweigh in my mind all theoretical objections to the bimetallic system.

Mr. President, an ounce of experience is worth many pounds of theory; and in view of the sad experience, ruinous and disastrous beyond all the anticipations of those whom this country has been beguiled and deluded to follow, shall we not accept the wisdom of the Senator from Ohio, thus so sententiously and so powerfully stated? Shall we not renounce those who have led us almost back to the door of the gold standard, and allow our experience to outweigh all the theoretical and sophistical objections to the bimetallic system?

SECRETARY CARLISLE'S EXPOSITION OF THE EVILS OF APPRECIATING GOLD.

The fall of silver and the appreciation of gold were the text of this sermon. Now we have another, sir, from the mature and clear and able mind of the distinguished gentleman who is now Secretary of the Treasury. I shall make no fling at him because he has changed his opinions. It is the privilege of everyone to change his opinions; and any honest mind that undergoes a change of opinion will always be courageous and open enough to announce it. It is not to his opinion but to his reason and to his judgment as an expert and as a man of knowledge to which I now appeal. I read a little extract from his speech made in the same year the Senator from Ohio renounced the gold standard and announced himself as reconverted and rebaptized in the waters of bimetallism. Said Mr. Carlisle:

I shall not enter into an examination of the causes which have combined to depreciate the relative value of silver and to appreciate the value of gold since 1873, but I am one of those who believe that they are transient and temporary in their nature, and that when they have passed away or have been removed by the separate or united actions of the nations most deeply interested in the subject, the old ratio of actual and relative value will be reestablished on a firmer foundation than ever. I know that the world's stock of precious metals is none too large, and I see no reason to apprehend that it will ever become so. Mankind will be fortunate indeed if the annual production of gold and silver coin shall keep pace with the annual increase of population, commerce, and industry. According to my view of the subject, the conspiracy which seems to have been formed here and in Europe to destroy by legislation and otherwise from three-sevenths to one-half the metallic money of the world is the most gigantic crime of this or any other age.

So thinking, Mr. President, I shall decline to join the criminals. Said Mr. Carlisle, further:

The consummation of such a scheme would ultimately entail more misery upon the human race than all the wars, pestilence, and famine that ever occurred in the history of the world. The absolute and instantaneous destruction of half the movable property of the world, including horses, ships, railroads, and all other appliances for carrying on commerce, while it would be felt more sensibly at the moment, would not produce anything like the prolonged distress and disorganization of society that must inevitably result from the permanent annihilation of one-half of the metallic money of the world.

With the opinion of these able and experienced men, I do not think it necessary or desirable that I should elaborate the fact that gold has appreciated.

THE SOPHISM THAT SILVER WOULD REDUCE US TO THE LEVEL OF INDIA, MEXICO, CHINA, AND JAPAN.

Mr. President, our pride as a nation and our pride as men is appealed to. I am afraid it is a species of vain pride that goeth before destruction; but there are those who tell us that we must scout and reject silver money because it would reduce us to the level of Mexico, China, Japan, and India. I reply to this sophism that we have been already reduced to the level of India. By behest of our British financial masters the free coinage of silver in India was suspended in the summer of 1893. And it was in response to their behest, and by the voice of a propaganda that was organized against America simultaneously with that against India that the Sherman law was repealed in America a few months afterwards. The fact is that there was but one movement directed against the two countries, and the subjugation of America soon followed that of Great Britain's other province on the other side of the globe.

But, Mr. President, as to Mexico, China, and Japan, what is there in the cry that we should refuse silver money because they are employing it? I have before me the article of the minister of Mexico, who shows how Mexico is thriving upon her silver. We have recently seen the astonishing exploit of Japan in war and are witnessing it equally manifested in manufacture, and are we not old enough and wise enough and experienced enough to judge these questions upon their own merit without being diverted from the weight of the argument by any such catch phrases as being reduced to the level of Mexico or India or China or Japan?

THE SOPHISM THAT WE HAVE $21.65 PER CAPITA OF CIRCULATION.

We are told that we have some $21.65 per capita in the United States, and that this is more money per capita than we have ever had before, and the deduction is drawn from this fact that we do not need more money. In point of fact we had $25.57 per capita in November, 1893, when we repealed the Sherman law, and there is no logical principle ever yet discovered by which we can determine how many dollars per capita a nation needs, so diverse and complicated are the circumstances which must solve the question. But it does not follow, because we have $22, or $24, or $25 per capita, that therefore we have enough.

First. There is more for money to do in this age than there ever has been for money to do before. We were never burdened by so many debts or by more exacting demands of taxation heretofore.

Second. Mr. President, it must be remembered, in comparison with former years before the war, that for a long time foreign coins were money in the United States, and that fact is not taken into consideration in estimating the per capita volume of our circulation.

Third. It ought to be remembered that the State bank circulation of the United States is left totally out of consideration, and that when the civil war commenced there were $212,000,000 of State bank circulation that was doing service for the people.

Fourth. It is to be noted that our present estimated per capita is a very unreliable one at best. We count in it all the dollars which we have minted from the beginning of the Government, and which are unaccounted for by any knowledge of what was done with them; those which have been burned, those which have gone down in the sea, those which have been lost amid the myriad casualties of life, are all counted as part of our volume of per capita money. We are told that in some places all the dead men on the registration lists are voted, and in the per capita circulation of the gold monometallist all the destroyed and dead and ruined dollars are still doing work for their cause.

Fifth. It should also be noted that much of our gold is held as reserve by national banks, and can not fairly be counted as "circulation."

And I may observe, too, that in 1860 there was $1 in circulation for every $37 worth of property; that is to say, with $435,407,252 of money, we had $16,159,616,068 of property, but now we have but $1 to every $45 of property, showing that our ratio of money to property has much decreased, and if we take the ratio as compared to the taxes and indebtedness which the dollars must redeem, it is much greater.

THE SOPHISM THAT THE PRINCIPAL DEBTORS ARE NOT THE POOR PEOPLE BUT THE CORPORATIONS.

But we are told that the principal debtors in this country are the great corporations, not the poor people. It is contended that the chief persons who hold the obligations of the country are the railroad companies, the banks, the life insurance and fire insurance companies, and other associations. It is the very rich men, it is claimed, who would derive some temporary advantage from the free coinage of silver; but the moderately well-to-do people, the widows and the orphans and the laboring classes, would be those who would suffer from its free coinage. The banks and other loan associations and insurance companies undoubtedly are largely in debt, but they have more due them than they owe to their customers, otherwise they are insolvent to begin with. It would be well for those who are seeking to curtail our volume of currency to realize what an immense body of debt there is upon the American people and how little prospect there is of its payment if you take away the opportunity of the people to get money for their property and labor wherewithal to pay.

I have before me a tract issued from the Department of Labor, known as House Document No. 33. In that it is shown that the minimum debt of the United States, public and private, is $20,227,170,546; that the annual interest upon that debt alone is the mighty sum of $1,166,101,303. In other words, it will require every dollar of gold, every dollar of silver, every dollar of greenbanks, and every national-bank note we have to be used to pay one year's interest upon the accumulated debt of the people of the United States. If this astounding and startling fact does not arouse the attention of the gold-standard men to the dread deed they are seeking to accomplish, then I believe they would not be convinced even though one should rise from the dead.

THE SOPHISM THAT LOW INTEREST INDICATES ABUNDANCE OF MONEY.

We are told that the low rate of interest which is commanded by money in the central market of exchange is an indication that money is plentiful. Let me read in reply what the Royal British Commission not long since said on that subject:

The rate of interest on permanent investments is also declining, for reasons, it is urged, similar to those which have been described above as affecting the rate of discount. When gold is scarce and commercial activity is checked by the resulting fall of prices, the demand for permanent investments increases and the price of such security rises. Owing either to the actual or apprehended scarcity of gold there is a tendency to invest in securities bearing a fixed interest payable in gold, which raises their price and reduces the net return obtainable from them.

The very fact that money is piled up in the vaults and is being loaned out at such a low rate of interest is the sign of the distrust of the capitalists in all property and in all industry, and it alone is a species of congestion which ought to warn the patient of his diseased condition.

THE SOPHISM THAT BUT 5 PER CENT OF BUSINESS IS TRANSACTED ON MONEY.

But we are told that we want but very little money; that only 5 per cent of the business is done by actual money payments, so vast is the use of checks and clearing-house certificates to offset one debt against another and to carry balances to the creditor's account. If it be true that only 5 per cent of the business of the country is done by money, then the displacement or loss of a single dollar must produce a vast disarrangement and displacement of business, for if every dollar is carrying a credit of $19 in the amount of business the loss of a dollar in cash is the proportional loss of $19 in business credit. The cessation of the coinage of $4,500,000 per month or $54,000,000 per year under the Sherman law therefore eliminated the superstructure of $85,500,000 per month of business or $1,026,000,000 in volume of business per year.

THE SOPHISM AS TO AMOUNT OF OUR SILVER COINAGE BEFORE DEMONETIZATION.

We are often told that we only coined $8,000,000 of silver before 1873; but let the whole truth and not a part of it be told, for we coined at the same time $77,000,000 in other denominations than dollars. The exact amount of legal-tender silver in the United States from the opening of the mint until silver was demonetized in 1873 was $84,700,000, and these figures can be found in detail in the Report of the Mint for 1894. At the same time it ought also to be remembered why it was that we were coining so few of those dollars. The reason that we did not coin more silver was because the silver metal could go into European mints, the French and other mints, at a less ratio than in our own; and in swelling the volume of international money in Europe it left our mints open to be occupied by gold; and whether the one species of metal went to one mint or another, there was an uninterrupted flow of both metals into money and into the swelling of the world's currency and the sustenance of the world's prices.

THE SOPHISM THAT JEFFERSON STOPPED SILVER COINAGE.

We are told that Thomas Jefferson stopped silver coinage. This is another half fact which should be told in connection with the other half. If Secretary Carlisle may be believed, he has stated in a recent speech that in May, 1806, President Jefferson stopped the coinage of the silver dollar, but not silver, which was still coined in small denominations.

Mr. STEWART. And was a full legal tender.

Mr. DANIEL. And was a full legal tender, as the Senator from Nevada says.

THE SOPHISM THAT "JEFFERSON AND HAMILTON WERE FOR FREE COINAGE OF BOTH METALS AT THE COMMERCIAL RATIO."

It is true as a fact that Jefferson and Hamilton tried to fix the coinage at the commercial ratio of the two metals. But at that time there was a commercial ratio in the value of the two metals, and that was 15 to 1, which was adopted in our first mint law. Now there is no commercial ratio between the value of silver bullion and gold bullion whatever. Gold bullion has a coinage value fixed by law, and silver bullion has no coinage value fixed by law. The law has destroyed the ratio, and silver bullion bobs up and down on the market like any other commodity. In 1792 the ratio of 15 to 1 existed because free coinage of gold and silver existed in the great European nations. When the United States divested silver of its coinage right in 1873 it divested it of its legal and commercial ratio to gold.

We can not reestablish a ratio between the metals without reestablishing free coinage in the United States—coining both metals "without discrimination." If we must change the ratio of 16 to 1, it should be done after and not before free coinage.

THE SOPHISM OF THE SILVER DELUGE.

That the silver deluge is a mere fancy is too obvious to those familiar with the subject to need much notice. Mr. Windom showed, when he was Secretary of the Treasury, that there was no accumulated stock of silver in the world.

Edward Atkinson, who was sent to Europe by President Cleveland in his first Administration, showed in his report that Europe was much more afraid of an avalanche of silver, from our discontinuing the use of silver and throwing our discarded stock upon its market, than of any other course we might take, and it has been demonstrated that the great body of silver in the world is in use in the coinage of other nations, which they can not afford to part with.

THE SOPHISM THAT OUR STOPPAGE OF COINAGE WOULD SQUEEZE EUROPE.

Ten years ago we were urged to demonetize silver on the ground that it would create such a tight money market in Europe as to compel the European nations to sue to us for an international agreement. The objection to the argument was that while we were squeezing the bear, the bear might, perhaps, take it into his head to squeeze us, and that we would feel the squeeze in all probability much more severely than the bear. But finally, in 1893, we entered into the squeezing business. The bear has been squeezing ever since, but has not yet cried "enough" to our squeezing. It is highly probable that if we continue to squeeze for eight or ten years and go through contracting greenbacks, destroy the rest of the silver we have, and keep up the panicky feeling in Europe as toward silver, that the world will at last become so outraged and indignant that there will be a restoration. So astute and bright a man as Cernuchi predicted such a final result in his little tract entitled Monetary Diplomacy, in 1878. He urged the United States to stop coining silver, and declared that "the United States will have a grand revenge to take on England with the United States coining no more silver. Let them repeal the Bland bill and England will be in consternation."

Ten years ago, Mr. President, these were the arguments which were used in the House of Representatives and were exploited through the press of the United States against any attempt to restore silver; and Mr. Cernuchi's pamphlet, which was at that time very much circulated, added this prediction:

The very day when no particle of silver is longer coined either in Europe or the United States monometallism will fall powerless, and it will be in its own cradle on the banks of the Thames that it will draw its last breath. The transition from monometallism to bimetallism in England will be effected without the slightest difficulty.

THE RESULT OF THE SQUEEZING PROCESS.

Mr. President, we have tried the squeezing process; we rudely cut off silver by the unconditional repeal of the Sherman law. The bear has not cried "Enough!" and I am afraid that on our part it is not a success. It may be that if Europe and if America are continually squeezed and squeezed that some future generation will come which will rise in the fire of revolution, and that under its inspiration silver may be restored. I wish to avert this hard and rigorous process and this fatal consummation. It is by the slow and patient step of reiterated argument, it is by the constant appeal of truth and justice to the unrighteous judge, that right and justice and truth go to their final triumph in this world; and I had rather see that triumph won by peaceful and moderate methods than by forcing the world into a fatal catastrophe.

HOW GREAT BRITAIN AND THE UNITED STATES ARE OPPOSITELY AFFECTED BY THE GOLD STANDARD.

But meanwhile, while we are waiting for Great Britain to cry "Enough!" and for monometallism to die, according to Cernuchi's prophecy, upon the banks of the Thames, it would be well for us to remember that such are the different attitudes of these two great nations that Great Britain can afford to support the gold standard, and that we can not. Great Britain has been, is now, and doubtless will be for years to come, the leading nation in attempting to force the world from a bimetallic to a gold basis. Her object is plain; her object is proclaimed; and her object is threefold: First, to enhance the purchasing power of debts due her as the great creditor nation; second, to enhance the value of gold mines in British possessions and owned by British subjects; and third, to lower the price of the produce and raw material which other nations sell and which she buys and consumes.

For her to succeed in the consummation of her object is to strengthen her autocratic institutions at the expense of popular institutions, to establish her commercial supremacy in all quarters, and to make herself, in short, the primate nation of the world.

She is a great creditor nation and the United States is a great debtor nation. Great Britain has in her colonies large gold mines and few silver mines, and we have large silver mines and gold mines alike. The United States is the largest silver-producing nation in the world. Great Britain does not produce the wheat, the corn, the cotton, or anything of the kind which she consumes. The United States is a large producer of all those articles, and sells much of them in the British market. The issue is, therefore, an international issue between Great Britain, chiefly, upon the one side, and the United States on the other; an issue in which British interests seek to increase the value of British credits at the expense of American debits, to increase the value of British gold mines at the expense of American silver mines, and to decrease the value of American mining and agricultural produce for the benefit of the British consumer.

BRITISH CAPITAL VERSUS AMERICAN LABOR.

The issue, broadly stated and summarized in a sentence, is, British capital against American labor; and I take the American side. For Briton or for American—that is the question; and that question ramifies into all our internal and domestic concerns. Like to like, the wide world over. The creditor sections of the United States draw sympathetically to the side of the British creditor. The sections which produce no silver show a tendency to minimize the subject to a mere mining question. The American capitalists tend to the side of the British capitalists. American bankers who are largely under pressure from British bankers tend to their side. The great cities with congested populations tend also to dear money and cheap produce, because they have proportionately more money, and only manipulate what others produce, instead of being themselves producers of raw materials and provisions. On the other hand, the instinctive intelligence of the country people puts them on the American side as the side of their interest. The instinctive intelligence of the industrial classes in cities as well as in the country puts them also largely on the same side. Thoughtful and reading commercial men see that the ultimate effect of the gold policy is to contract and reduce their business, and to make it tributary to British interests, and many of them tend to the American side.

Scholarly men, just men, everywhere resent the injustice of the gold standard; and lovers of free government see in it the most powerful and subtle enemy of free institutions. Taxpayers nearly everywhere see that it means depressed prices for property and increased burden of debts and taxes. Wage earners know by sad experience that it depresses industry and curtails the number of employees as well as the wages of those who are employed.

Mr. President, I have thus attempted as best I could in the hours at my command to state plainly what I conceive to be the true bearings of this question. I know that those of us who advocate the money of the Constitution, the money of the fathers, and the money of the plain people face a battlefield which will require men of mettle to stand up to its duties. With a full comprehension of the power of our enemy, knowing that fashion and wealth and caste and office are all against us, I yet, sir, would be untrue to my duty as an American citizen and to my manhood as a man if I did not thus declare the truth as I see it, and pray God to give me the strength to vindicate it. Whatever may betide, I take my place in the ranks of the plain masses of the American people who appreciate their institutions and intend to defend them at whatever cost. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, at this late hour, I think if I am not interrupted I shall probably conclude what I have to say in about thirty or forty minutes. I would not have taken part in the discussion of this bill at all had it not been that some things have been said which I think demand my attention. I will come to those things after a short time.

The discussion that has followed the introduction of the bill has taken a very wide range. Silver in all its phases has been discussed ably. Gold monometallism has been treated with considerable ability. Both sides of almost every economic question have been considered. But the only argument which has been presented in opposition to the passage of the bill was that of the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], which was that it is a Populist measure.

It appears that the time has come in our history when in the American Senate the merits of a measure are to be determined by the politics of the Senator who proposes it. I ask if that is Democracy, if that is Republicanism, that because a Senator who is the equal of all his colleagues introduces a bill trenching upon a particular line of party politics it must be discarded, it must be hounded and beaten and abused and ridiculed without touching the merits of the subject involved?

I assert, Mr. President, that in all of our eventful history no President before the year 1894 ever undertook or proposed to undertake to sell a Government note or a Government bond without express authority of Congress before that time enacted.

I repeat, in all our history, never until 1894 were Government bonds or notes issued or sold without express authority from the legislature for the particular act. Every one of the American colonies, at times when they were without gold or silver coin, prepared, issued, and used paper money. The seven years' war of the Revolution was fought to successful conclusion on paper money; and our new Government began the issue of paper before it was three years old. Bank notes were issued in 1791, and Treasury notes followed quickly after the first bank charter expired in 1811. Treasury notes were issued in 1812, 1813, 1814, and 1815.

The second United States bank was established in 1816, continuing twenty years, to 1836. Treasury notes were issued in 1837, 1838, 1840, 1841, 1842 (two issues), 1843, 1846, 1847, 1857, 1860, and 1861. For every one of these issues there was express authority previously granted.

During our great war there were many issues and sales of bonds and notes of the Government; and afterwards, down to 1877, there were many million dollars' worth of bonds issued and sold, every bond being expressly authorized by law previously enacted.

In 1875 the last grant of authority to issue and sell bonds was given in the resumption act, and that was for a purpose plainly stated in the law, namely, "to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and provide for the redemption in this act authorized or required."

It was not a measure for the purpose of maintaining specie payments; it was a measure simply to provide funds in order that the resumption of specie payments might be effected. I will not stop to read the law, because it has been repeatedly read in the presence of the Senate.

But even allowing all the force that is given to that act by the friends of the present custom of bond issues, three years later, and before the resumption was to take effect, Congress passed an act positively prohibiting the withdrawal and the cancellation of the Government notes.

The resumption law has been obsolete seventeen years. I say obsolete. I mean by that that it has no force either in law or in fact; that it served its purpose; and that the act of 1878 made its further application absolutely unnecessary. But even, repeating my words, if we give it all the force that is claimed by the friends of the present bond-issuing custom, still it has no effect at this time for the purposes for which bonds are now being issued.

If good for any purpose it is only to maintain a coin fund and we have never lacked in that respect, having all the time had plenty of coin on hand and millions of dollars to spare.

But the President goes back to an older law than that, the act passed in 1862—a law that served its purpose and passed into oblivion long, long ago, and was never recalled until the President of the United States has revived it for the purposes of this Administration. That act was passed for a particular purpose, and that particular purpose was clearly expressed in the language of the law. I will read that act, for I have observed that no Senator has ever yet referred to it in the discussion of this subject, whether upon the present bill or when some other subject was pending.

It is an act of Congress approved on the 17th day of March, 1862, entitled "An act to authorize the purchase of coin, and for other purposes." It is composed of four sections. I read the first section:

> That the Secretary of the Treasury may purchase coin with any of the bonds or notes of the United States, authorized by law, at such rates and upon such terms as he may deem most advantageous to the public interest; and may issue, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, certificates of indebtedness, such as are authorized by an act entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue certificates of indebtedness to public creditors," approved March 1, 1862, to such creditors as may desire to receive the same, in discharge of checks drawn by disbursing officers upon sums placed to their credit on the books of the Treasurer, upon requisitions of the proper Departments, as well as in discharge of audited and settled accounts, as provided by said act.

That section is one entire paragraph; it is one entire sentence, and only one. There is a division at the word "interest," the division being marked by a semicolon. I will now read to that semicolon, repeating—

> That the Secretary of the Treasury may purchase coin with any of the bonds or notes of the United States authorized by law, at such rates and upon such terms as he may deem most advantageous to the public interest—

Semicolon. It so happens that that sentence was incorporated into the Revised Statutes of 1874 as a complete paragraph and a complete section. It is known as section 3700. The President of the United States, in contracting through the Secretary of the Treasury with the gold syndicate in the beginning of last year, referred to this particular sentence which I have just read as his authority for making the contract.

Mr. President, I insist that section 3700 of the Revised Statutes has no more force in the connection in which it has been used by the President than would a passage of law authorizing the funding of the national debt; that it has absolutely no connection whatever with the transaction; that it gives no authority for the sale of bonds in 1895. It was not intended for that purpose, but for a wholly different one. It served its purpose in 1862, and has never been of any force from that day to this.

An act was passed March 1, 1862. I read its title: "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue certificates of indebtedness to public creditors."

There is no mistaking the meaning of that act. It is to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue certificates of indebtedness, and it says so.

I turn to the next preceding act, the act of February 25, 1862, and I read its title: "An act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for the redemption or funding thereof, and for funding the floating debt of the United States."

There can be no mistaking the meaning of that act.

I turn to the next one preceding, which was approved February 12, 1862, entitled "An act to authorize an additional issue of United States notes."

So wherever you go, through all the acts that were passed during that terrible period, you will find that the title in every instance expresses the object for which the act was enacted.

In this case the act of March 17, 1862, provides for the purchase of coin and for other purposes, and in providing for the purchase of coin provision is made as to the manner of purchasing coin, what sort of proceeding shall be had, and it is this:

> With any of the bonds or notes of the United States authorized by law.

Such notes, such bonds as had already been provided by law. They are the notes and they are the bonds, and they alone, that the Secretary was authorized to issue for the purpose of purchasing coin to pay interest on the public debt and other coin obligations, not for a reserve fund, not to maintain specie payments, or to provide for specie payments, or anything of that kind.

Now, coming back again to this particular act, if it were proper that section 1 of the act of March 17, 1862, which I have read, should in 1874 be incorporated in the Revised Statutes for purposes in future, the whole section ought to have been copied.

But it may be said that I am estopped from questioning the propriety of the transaction for the reason that Congress passed upon the compilation and the revision after it had been made. I am willing to concede all of that, but that does not authorize the Secretary of the Treasury or the President of the United States or any other official to violate the plain letter and spirit of the law which they and the law officers of the Government, if they were consulted, certainly ought to have known was enacted originally for an altogether different purpose, and that it must certainly have been an oversight upon the part of Congress in 1874, for at that time there was no expectation of there being any trouble in the future requiring that bonds would have to be issued for any purpose whatever. The bond-issuing period at that time had been passed and it was presumed then that nothing further along that line would be required.

Mr. HARRIS (at 5 o'clock p. m.). Mr. President——

Mr. PEFFER. I see the Senator from Tennessee is rising.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senator from Kansas if he will be inclined to yield for a motion to adjourn, or if he desires to proceed now?

Mr. HALE. Let us go on for another hour.

Mr. PEFFER. I am entirely willing to leave that matter to the comfort and convenience of Senators, so far as I am personally concerned.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Kansas leaves it to me, I shall move to adjourn, but I will not do so of course without the consent of the Senator.

Mr. PEFFER. I think it would be better that I should go on and conclude my remarks this evening, if Senators are willing to remain; and if they are not, I shall be left so that I can make the motion to adjourn when I conclude.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas will proceed.

Mr. PEFFER. The point that I make upon this section is that it is utterly valueless for the purposes for which the President of the United States has called it into action. Lest there may be some mistake, I read from the message of the President of February 8, 1895, as follows:

> In the judgment of those especially charged with this responsibility—

The President was speaking at this particular point of the troubles we were experiencing in our financial affairs. He says:

> In the judgment of those especially charged with this responsibility, the business situation is so critical and the legislative situation is so unpromising, with the omission thus far on the part of Congress to beneficially enlarge the powers of the Secretary of the Treasury in the premises, as to enjoin immediate Executive action with the facilities now at hand.

The President plainly intimates between the lines that the authority under which he and the Secretary are acting is of doubtful validity, and nothing but the acquiescence of Congress and of the people of the United States could under any circumstances justify it. Now, he proceeds:

> Therefore, in pursuance of section 3700 of the Revised Statutes, the details of an arrangement have this day been concluded with parties abundantly able to fulfill their undertaking, whereby bonds of the United States, authorized under the act of July 14, 1875, payable in coin thirty years after their date, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, to the amount of a little less than $62,400,000, are to be issued for the purchase of gold coin amounting to a sum slightly in excess of $65,000,000, to be delivered to the Treasury of the United States, which sum, added to the gold now held in our reserve, will so restore such reserve as to make it amount to something more than $100,000,000.

The President uses section 3700 of the Revised Statutes, which was an act originally passed for the purpose of authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase coin to pay interest on the public debt, and to pay other little coin demands that were then in force against the Government.

Here is the contract. I shall not stop to read it, but I will have it inserted as a sort of supplement to the message:

> This agreement entered into this 8th day of February, 1895, between the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, of the first part, and Messrs. August Belmont & Co., of New York, on behalf of Messrs. N. M. Rothschild & Sons, of London, England, and themselves, and Messrs. J. P. Morgan & Co., of New York, on behalf of Messrs. J. S. Morgan & Co., of London, and themselves, parties of the second part.
> Witnesseth: Whereas it is provided by the Revised Statutes of the United States (section 3700) that the Secretary of the Treasury may purchase coin with any of the bonds or notes of the United States authorized by law, at such rates and upon such terms as he may deem most advantageous to the public interests; and the Secretary of the Treasury now deems that an emergency exists in which the public interests require that, as hereinafter provided, coin shall be purchased with the bonds of the United States, of the description hereinafter mentioned, authorized to be issued under the act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, being bonds of the United States described in an act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt."
> Now, therefore, the said parties of the second part hereby agree to sell and deliver to the United States 3,500,000 ounces of standard gold coin of the United States, at the rate of $17.80441 per ounce, payable in United States 4 per cent thirty-year coupon or registered bonds, said bonds to be dated February 1, 1895, and payable at the pleasure of the United States after thirty years from date, issued under the acts of Congress of July 14, 1870, January 20, 1871, and January 14, 1875, bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, payable quarterly.
> First. Such purchase and sale of gold coin being made on the following conditions:
> (1) At least one-half of all coin deliverable hereinunder shall be obtained in and shipped from Europe, but the shipments shall not be required to exceed 300,000 ounces per month, unless the parties of the second part shall consent thereto.
> (2) All deliveries shall be made at any of the subtreasuries or at any other legal depository of the United States.
> (3) All gold coins delivered shall be received on the basis of 25.8 grains of standard gold per dollar, if within limit of tolerance.
> (4) Bonds delivered under this contract are to be delivered free of accrued interest, which is to be assumed and paid by the parties of the second part at the time of their delivery to them.
> Second. Should the Secretary of the Treasury desire to offer or sell any bonds of the United States on or before the 1st day of October, 1895, he shall first offer the same to the parties of the second part; but thereafter he shall be free from every such obligation to the parties of the second part.
> Third. The Secretary of the Treasury hereby reserves the right, within ten days from the date hereof, in case he shall receive authority from Congress therefor, to substitute any bonds of the United States, bearing 3 per cent interest, of which the principal and interest shall be specifically payable in United States gold coin of the present weight and fineness for the bonds herein alluded to, such 3 per cent bonds to be accepted by the parties of the second part at par, i. e., at $18.60465 per ounce of standard gold.
> Fourth. No bonds shall be delivered to the parties of the second part, or either of them, except in payment for coin from time to time received hereunder; whereupon the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States shall and will deliver the bonds as herein provided, at such places as shall be designated by the parties of the second part. Any expense of delivery out of the United States shall be assumed and paid by the parties of the second part.
> Fifth. In consideration of the purchase of such coin, the parties of the second part and their associates hereunder assume and will bear all the expense and inevitable loss of bringing gold from Europe hereunder; and, as far as lies in their power, will exert all financial influence and will make all legitimate efforts to protect the Treasury of the United States against the withdrawals of gold pending the complete performance of this contract.
> In witness whereof the parties hereto have hereunto set their hands in five parts this 8th day of February, 1895.

This bill has been treated by Senators as if it were the first of the kind ever proposed. But that is error. We—and when I use the word "we" I do not use it editorially, but I mean those of us who are charged with the paternity of bills of this kind—have not been derelict in our duty. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], coming here nearly two years after the bond-trading business began, very properly seized the first opportunity to press the subject on the attention of the Senate, and it is greatly to his credit that he has been able to accomplish so much this soon. I allude to the matter only for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that early, even before the first sale was made, immediately, the next day after the proposition to sell was made, I offered a resolution reciting the facts and asserting as the sense of the Senate that the whole proceeding was in violation of law. The next day I addressed the Senate on the subject. A few days later the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] delivered a forcible argument to show that such issue of bonds is illegal, and we have not lost an opportunity from that time until the present to denounce the whole proceeding as a grievous usurpation of power.

On the 18th of January, 1894, I offered a resolution, which became Miscellaneous Document No. 39, Fifty-third Congress, second session, which reads as follows:

> "Whereas on the 17th day of January, 1894, the Secretary of the Treasury did prepare and publish the following notice:
> "TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
> "Washington, D. C., January 17, 1894.
> "By virtue of the authority contained in the act entitled 'An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments,' approved January 14, 1875, the Secretary of the Treasury hereby offers for public subscription an issue of bonds of the United States to the amount of $50,000,000, in either registered or coupon form, in denominations of $50 and upward, redeemable in coin at the pleasure of the Government after ten years from the date of their issue, and bearing interest, payable quarterly in coin, at the rate of 5 per cent per annum.
> "Proposals for the whole or any part of these bonds will be received at the Treasury Department, office of the Secretary, until 12 o'clock noon on the 1st day of February, 1894. Proposals should state the amount of bonds desired, whether registered or coupon, and the premium which the subscriber proposes to pay, the place where it is desired that the bonds shall be delivered, and the office, whether that of the Treasurer of the United States or an assistant treasurer of the United States, where it will be most convenient for the subscriber to deposit the amount of his subscription. Failure to specify the above particulars may cause the proposal to be rejected.
> "As soon as practicable after the 1st day of February, 1894, the allotment of bonds will be made to the highest bidders therefor, but no proposal will be considered at a lower price than 117.223, which is the equivalent of a 3 per cent bond at par, and the right to reject any and all proposals is hereby expressly reserved. In case the bids entitled to allotment exceed the bonds to be issued they will be allotted pro rata.
> "Notices of the date of delivery of the bonds will be sent to the subscribers to whom allotments are made as soon as practicable, and within ten days from the date of such notice subscriptions must be paid in United States gold coin to the Treasurer or such assistant treasurer of the United States as the subscriber has designated; and if not so paid the proposal may be rejected.
> "The bonds will be dated February 1, 1894, and when payment is made therefor as above accrued interest on both principal and premium from February 1, 1894, to date of payment, at the rate of interest realized to the subscriber on his investment, will be added.
> "All proposals should be addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C., and should be distinctly marked 'Proposals for subscriptions to 5 per cent bonds.'
> "J. G. CARLISLE, Secretary.

"And whereas there is nothing in said notice to show that there is immediate or prospective need for the sale of bonds to accomplish the object sought by Congress in the enactment of the resumption law of January 14, 1875; and

"Whereas the Secretary of the Treasury has no authority to issue and sell bonds for any other purpose than that set out in said resumption act: Therefore,

"Resolved by the Senate, That in the opinion of this body the Secretary of the Treasury has no lawful authority for issuing and selling bonds as proposed in the notice aforesaid."

Some time afterwards I offered a resolution instructing the Committee on Finance to report a bill repealing all laws which authorize the issue and sale of bonds, if there were any such authority. That is known as Miscellaneous Document No. 128, Fifty-third Congress, second session, and reads as follows:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and it is hereby, instructed to prepare and report as soon as practicable a bill to repeal all laws authorizing or permitting the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds or other interest-bearing obligations of the Government, and to prohibit any and all such issues in future without express authority by act of Congress first had and obtained."

Later on I offered a resolution instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire whether there was any lawful authority for the issue and sale of bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury. It is Miscellaneous Document No. 3, Fifty-third Congress, third session, and is as follows:

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and it is hereby, instructed to inquire and report whether the acts of the Secretary of the Treasury in issuing and selling United States bonds in the months of February and December, 1894, were authorized by any act or acts of Congress then in force."

The resolution was referred to the committee, but no report has yet been made by the committee. A similar resolution was referred to the House Committee on the Judiciary with exactly similar result.

On the 4th day of December, 1894, the very day when Congress met, I introduced the bill (S. 2330) to repeal that part of the act of January 14, 1875, commonly known as the resumption act, which authorized the sale of bonds. It provided:

That so much of the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, as provided for the sale of bonds of the United States is hereby repealed.

On December 3, 1895, I introduced a bill to repeal all laws authorizing the issue and sale of bonds:

That so much of the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, as provides for the issue and sale of bonds, section 3700 of the Revised Statutes, and all laws or parts of laws that authorize the sale of bonds of the United States, are hereby repealed.

On the 7th day of January, 1896, I proposed an amendment to House bill 2904, to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, etc. It provided:

That all laws and parts of laws authorizing the issuance and sale of bonds of the United States are hereby repealed.

So we have not been sleeping on our oars.

Not only have the bonds been illegally issued, but there was no necessity for their issue, because there was an abundance of funds in the Treasury at the time of the sale of the bonds to pay every debt that was due from the United States, whether we paid it in gold or in silver. There was an abundance of coin in the Treasury with which to redeem all the greenbacks which had been offered at that time, so that absolutely and positively no necessity for the issuance of bonds existed, except only to accommodate the speculators and the gold gamblers in New York and London.

In proof of that—it is not a mere idle assertion—I took occasion in a speech, delivered by me January 15th last, to collect the figures from the Treasury. It appears that, beginning in 1879 with $128,000,000, we go on down to 1884, when there was $154,000,000. In 1889 there was $229,000,000; in 1890, $249,000,000, the largest amount in any one year. Then we come down to the last of January, 1895, with $51,000,000. On the last of January, 1894, when the first of the last three issues was made, there was $65,000,000 of gold coin lying in the Treasury.

Statement showing the amount of gold coin (excluding bullion) in the Treasury on the last day of January each year since and including 1879.

Year.	Amount.	Year.	Amount.
1879	$128,792,903	1888	$185,906,571
1880	96,463,601	1889	229,051,535

1885	172,747,344	1894	65,490,319
1886	179,402,994	1895	51,343,230
1887	189,122,038	1896—September 30	80,216,756

I have here a statement showing the amount of net gold in the Treasury at the end of January of each year since 1878. Beginning with 1879, it was $116,000,000; coming on down to the largest amount in any one year, it was $202,000,000 in 1888, and in January, 1894, the amount was $65,650,175. That was when the first issue of the last three issues was proposed and the sale was made. There was then $65,000,000 of gold in the Treasury.

It may seem almost revolutionary, and I have no doubt that if my good friend the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] were here he would regard it as revolutionary, as infamous, and anarchistic, but I yet insist with all candor, with all earnestness, and with a patriotic devotion which I do not believe any Senator will doubt, that there was no other demand upon the Treasury at the time when the bond issues were made except, and except alone, from the speculators in Wall street, New York, and their confreres in the city of London, on the other side of the Atlantic. I have asserted again and again that the United States Goverment has been forced into partnership with these men, that we are in fact the silent partner. We are expected only to tax the people and raise the money that these men want.

The only need that the Government has for money is to pay its debts. We promised to pay our debts in coin, and I have shown by the figures that we had an abundance of coin to do it.

Here is a tabulated statement showing the net gold in the Treasury on the last day of January in each year, from 1878 down to the time when the compilation was made, showing the gold, and the silver, and the amount of each and the amount of both that was on hand at the time:

I am frequently asked what are we going to do with individual persons and corporations who have promised to pay their indebtedness in gold, and whose debts are due on the other side of the Atlantic. My answer is that it is none of our business about the contracts of private individuals or corporations. If they have made contracts to pay their debts in gold, it is their business to get the gold. It is not the business of the United States to supply them with gold any more than it is the business of the Government to supply me with flour, or sugar, or coffee, or a pair of shoes when I happen to need them. If these men have promised to pay in gold let them procure their gold just as I would procure wheat and corn—by going out into the open market, where those articles are for sale. The banks have gold to sell. They have it to exchange.

That is one of the legitimate functions of banking, but the Government of the United States ought not to be called upon to furnish gold for these speculators and traders.

A good deal of talk has been indulged in here about revenue. It is insisted that our trouble all comes from the lack of revenue.

But Senators surely know that there is very little gold being collected now in the way of revenues, whether it be from customs duties or from internal taxes; that silver certificates are just as good as gold for the payment of duties on imports. United States notes, although the law provided that they should not be used in the payment of customs duties nor as interest on the public debt, are used for those purposes. They were so used in 1878 by direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and very properly, I think. All of our paper money is now used in the payment of customs duties and in the payment of internal-revenue taxes, so there is no gold being collected in that way.

Now, we may pile up our money derived from revenues mountain high, and, as the President says, it will not cure our troubles because it is not in gold.

Here is what the President says about it in his message on January 28, 1895:

> It will hardly do to say that a simple increase of revenue will cure our troubles. The apprehension now existing and constantly increasing as to our financial ability does not rest upon a calculation of our revenue. The time has passed when the eyes of investors abroad and our people at home were fixed upon the revenues of the Government. Changed conditions have attracted their attention to the gold of the Government. There need be no fear that we can not pay our current expenses with such money as we have. There is now in the Treasury a comfortable surplus of more than $63,000,000 but it is not in gold, and therefore does not meet our difficulty.

The whole trouble—and the President of the United States is right about it—comes from the demand for gold, and it is not because the people of the United States demand gold—I mean the great body of the people of the country. They are not asking for gold. They care nothing about gold coin. They hardly ever see a gold coin. Probably ninety-nine out of every hundred would be unable to distinguish at first sight between a quarter eagle and a half eagle in gold coin. The demand for gold comes from one class exclusively, and that is the speculative class—the money changers, the bankers, and, it is an ugly term to use, the gold gamblers. I can not think of a better word to use, because it is gambling, the same as gambling on a stock exchange or a race course.

The President in his message of December 20, 1895, and again in the one I have just read from, speaks about the folly of men either in this country or in any other country suspecting or questioning the solvency of the people of the United States. The whole trouble, the President insists, and the Secretary with him, is the lack of gold, and then when we buy gold and get $100,000,000, $50,000,000, and $100,000,000, it goes out almost as fast as it comes in. It was about six months, I think, before all of the gold on account of the next to the last purchase was delivered to the Treasury, and it went out about that fast. We see now the reserve is nearly down to the one-hundred-million-dollar mark, notwithstanding the fact that it was up to $130,000,000 a short time ago. We are pouring the gold in with the sale of bonds, and in a little while we are pouring it out in the laps of the speculators, and so this revolving process goes on.

The object of the pending bill is to stop that kind of work, to tie the hands of the President, if he can not use them in accordance with the law which he has held up his hand and sworn before God faithfully to execute. We—perhaps I had better speak for myself—I denounced it upon this floor as a usurpation of authority for which, if it had been perpetrated in the better and earlier days of the Republic, the guilty one would have been impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors. I heard a democrat Senator say on this floor, "Why do you not impeach him?"

This is not the place to impeach him. At the time the bonds were issued the President was Democratic, the Senate was Democratic, the House of Representatives was Democratic by a large majority, and there is the place to begin impeachment proceedings.

But it is said, and that comes chiefly from this side of the Chamber, from old veteran Republicans, that this bill is opening up the avenue to repudiation, that it means repudiation. I appeal to Senators, especially to Republicans, a class of men with whom many of the best years of my life were spent, and not until the last six or eight years did I feel it to be my duty to separate from them on account of the tendency of that great organization toward the policy we are now pursuing. They charge me, and they charge the rest of us in this Chamber who are Populists, with attempted repudiation. No, Mr. President; the legislature that sent me to this body was composed almost wholly of men who had been Republicans within two years. There were 95 Populists in the house of representatives. Every one of them voted for me. Out of the 95 Populists 83 had been active, earnest Republicans up to and after the year 1883. They and I all voted for Benjamin Harrison. Out of those 83 old Republicans 41 had spent from two and one-half to three of the best years of their lives in the Union Army, in our great struggle to suppress the most tremendous rebellion known in human history. All of my ambition is to serve this great country. There is nothing that I venerate more highly, more intensely than I do the flag of our country. The great body of the Populist party in the Northern and Western States were Republicans only a few years ago, and there are more old Union soldiers in our party to-day in proportion to the aggregate membership than there is in the great organization of Republicans.

I resent that imputation indignantly. It is unworthy of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] and the other Senators who have uttered the sentiment upon this floor. I have said, and I do now say, that you men who are insisting upon this policy will drive the people to repudiation in the end. I would stop repudiation; I would stop all dishonor; I would stop all revolution, by taking from the hands of the usurpers the power they are improperly exercising. That is the object of the bill. I have said upon the public platform, in the presence of the people, as I say here in the Senate, that this proceeding is not only without authority of law, but it is one of the most dangerous proceedings, the most dangerous exercise of power that has ever befallen the American people.

But it is utterly impossible, certainly impracticable, to pay our obligations in gold. We have now out bonds running from ten to thirty years amounting to $747,277,300, and notes payable on demand and to be reissued and kept in circulation, to be again redeemed and again issued, and so on interminably, to the amount of $490,347,296, bonds and notes making a total debt of $1,237,624,596, all payable in coin—gold and silver—and our stock on hand is utterly inadequate.

This bonding of the people of the country in order to procure gold and then letting the gold go out again, at the rate of about $100,000,000 a year, will drive the people of this country into revolution. We have not lost the courage of our ancestors, and all this noise that we hear and all this tumult that you see—these quarrels and confusion, this commotion that we see in the political conventions that are being held over the country in regard to the question of silver coinage—there is something still deeper, far deeper than the silver question, that even the silver men themselves have not yet taken hold of. It is the beginning, the rumblings in the distance of a revolution that will shake the throne when the time comes if these usurpations are not stopped.

It has been argued, and I think wisely, that the Secretary of the Treasury is not only authorized to redeem all the outstanding notes, but the bonds as well—in silver as well as in gold. When the House of Representatives a year or more ago called the Secretary before the Committee on Appropriations the Secretary was asked this question: What objection could there be to having the option of redeeming either in silver or gold lie with the Treasury instead of the note holder?

The answer was this:

> Secretary CARLISLE. If that policy had been adopted at the beginning of resumption—and I am not saying this for the purpose of criticising the action of any of my predecessors, or anybody else—but if the policy of reserving to the Government, at the beginning of resumption, the option of redeeming in gold or silver all its paper presented, I believe it would have worked beneficially, and there would have been no trouble growing out of it, but the Secretaries of the Treasury from the beginning of resumption have pursued a policy of redeeming in gold or silver, at the option of the holder of the paper, and if any Secretary had afterwards attempted to change that policy and force silver upon a man who wanted gold, or gold upon a man who wanted silver, and especially if he had made that attempt at such a critical period as we have had in the last two years, my judgment is it would have been very disastrous. There is a vast difference between establishing a policy at the beginning and reversing a policy after it has been long established, and especially after the situation has been changed.

That means it would have been very proper in the beginning—just as Populists have been asking all the time since they have been organized—that the notes should be redeemed with silver whenever it was more convenient to the Treasury, more convenient to the Government, and not with gold. But the Secretary says inasmuch as a bad or unwise policy was begun, that therefore it must be continued. The Populist wants to stop this policy, the Populist wants to go back to correct principles, to go back where we began, to take up the thread where we dropped it, and regain our lost privilege.

Mr. President, I quote again some matter which I incorporated in the speech referred to a while ago. It shows what our people are thinking all the time—that coin for redemption purposes means the coin of the contract. I procured from the Register of the Treasury, J. F. Tillman, a copy of the reading matter on the face of the bonds that are now being issued. Here is his letter and certificate for a one-thousand-dollar bond:

> TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE REGISTER,
> Washington, D. C., January 4, 1896.
> SIR: Your letter of the 27th of December, 1895, addressed to the Treasurer of the United States, having been referred to this office by the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, I have the honor, in compliance with your request, of transmitting herewith "a certified copy of the reading matter appearing on the face and on the back of a United States bond issued under provisions of the refunding act of 1870."

You will observe I have copied the text of a $1,000 bond. The only difference to be found between this text and that of other denominations of the same loan, lies in a change of the wording relative to the denomination of the bond. That is to say, on a $100 bond the words "one hundred dollars" would appear wherever the words "one thousand dollars" appear in the copy submitted.

Respectfully, yours, J. F. TILLMAN, Register.

This bond is issued in accordance with the provisions of an act of Congress entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt, approved July 14, 1870," amended by an act approved January 20, 1871, and is redeemable at the pleasure of the United States, after the first day of July, A. D. 1907, in coin of the standard value of the United States, on said July 14, 1870, with interest, in such coin, from the day of the date hereof, at the rate of four per centum per annum, payable quarterly, on the first day of October, January, April, and July in each year. The principal and interest are exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form, by or under State, municipal, or local authority.

Mr. President, in addition to quoting the matter appearing upon the face of the bond, I have matter which recites the history of proceedings interpreting the meaning of the word "coin," which occurred in the Senate and House of Representatives in 1878.

It seems strange that there can be now, or that there ever should have been, any question on this point. But because there seems to be now some doubt about it, I have dwelt upon the subject more at length than it would otherwise warrant. And I have not done with it. There is some official interpretation of the language and some authoritative construction of the law relating to the subject.

The present senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], when he was Secretary of the Treasury, raised the point, and asked the opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States as to whether the coinage act of 1873 in any way affected the terms of our contract to pay the bonds in coin. I read his letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., April 21, 1877.

SIR: I beg leave to call your attention to, and ask your opinion upon, the following questions growing out of the refunding act of July 14, 1870, to wit: Can I stipulate in the body of the 4 per cent bonds about to be issued that they shall be redeemable in coin of the present standard value—that is, the standard value at the date of their issue, or must it be the date of the law?

I submit a statement, prepared by the Hon. H. M. French, Assistant Secretary, having reference to the laws.

It may become important to the public interests to make the new bonds payable in coin of the present standard—that is, gold coin. Some doubts have been expressed upon whether previous bonds issued under acts passed prior to 1873 are not legally payable in silver coin. This question may become important, as any doubt upon the legal terms of a public security affects its value.

Very respectfully, JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

Hon. CHARLES DEVENS,
Attorney-General.

In answer, the Attorney-General wrote this letter:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, April 26, 1877.

SIR: In answer to your letter of the 21st instant requesting my opinion upon the following question growing out of the refunding act of July 14, 1870, to wit, "Can I stipulate in the body of the 4 per cent bonds about to be issued that they shall be redeemable in coin of the present value, that is, the standard value at the date of their issue, or must it be the date of the law?" I have the honor to reply:

The act provides for the issue of bonds "redeemable in coin of the present standard value." The word "present" undoubtedly refers as a matter of date to the time when the act was passed, and not to the time when the bonds were thereafter issued. It contemplated that a long period would elapse before it would finally be carried into effect, and that changes in the coinage of the country might occur during that period.

Whatever changes in the coinage should occur, these bonds were, however, to be redeemed in coin of the standard value as it existed at the date of the act. By this provision the holder was guarded against any depreciation that might take place in the value of the coin, and the Government would not be compelled to pay the additional value should the coinage be appreciated. All the bonds issued under the act were to stand alike, no matter what was the date when such bonds were issued. Each was to be redeemable in coin which was included in the authorized coinage of the country at the date referred to, it being of the standard value as it then existed. Since the law was passed no change has taken place in the standard value of the coin. It is understood that there has been a certain change in the coinage of the country, and that silver dollars have now ceased to exist practically as coin.

It has been further provided by the statute of February 12, 1873 (Revised Statutes, sections 3585, 3586), that "the silver coins of the United States shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $5 in any one payment."

Notwithstanding this practical change in the coinage of the country and the passage of this act in regard to legal tenders, the form of bond to be issued by you should not be changed so far as the mode in which it is to be redeemed is concerned. It was not intended that this should be varied according to the changes which might be made in the coinage, because a definite rule was given by reference to the coin of a particular date. That which will pay the bonds heretofore issued under this act will pay the bonds which you may hereafter issue.

It can not be authoritatively said that the words "payable in coin" or "payable in gold" are equivalent to the words used by the statute. Even if this leaves open for discussion the question whether bonds issued under this act are or are not redeemable in silver coin of the character and standard which existed July 14, 1870, it is not a doubt which it is in your power to remedy by the use of words in the bond other than those which this statute provides.

While I comprehend the difficulty suggested in your letter and the convenience that there might be in removing any question upon this matter, I am, therefore, of opinion that it would not be safe to issue the bonds except as redeemable in coin of the standard value of July 14, 1870.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHAS. DEVENS, Attorney-General.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN,
Secretary of the Treasury.

This correspondence took place during April, 1877. Mr. Secretary Sherman, seeing that the law officer of the Government construed coin the same as it had always been construed in the United States, and desiring to make the bonds more salable by making them a more desirable investment for men who make a business of lending money in large amounts, asked Congress to authorize him to make the bonds redeemable in gold coin. The request is in the form of a recommendation in his report under date December 3, 1877, in these words:

If, therefore, the public interests demand the issue of silver dollars—a subject hereafter discussed—it is respectfully submitted to Congress that an express exception be made requiring that gold coin alone shall be paid for principal or interest on bonds issued to public creditors since February 12, 1873, the amount of which is $502,990,700. These bonds have entered into the markets of the world. If the market value of the silver in the new coin is less than the gold dollar, a forced payment in the new coin is a repudiation of a part of this debt.

The point that was suggested by the then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Sherman, was that in case at the time the bonds were to be paid the amount of silver in the silver dollar should be of less value than its coin value, and creditors were forced to take it, it would be to that extent the repudiation of the debt.

Congress did not act on this recommendation. One would suppose this fact to be notice, if any were necessary, to the officials of the United States that Congress did not agree with the Secretary in his interpretation of the case, whether upon the law or the facts. Congress did not see that either the law or the equities required any readjustment. Congress knew, as all men knew, that the bondholders had taken very good care of themselves already, and had in 1870 provided for full, and more than full, payment by the passage of the provision for payment in coin of either metal.

Quoting from page 260 of Senator JONES's admirable speech of 1893—

People who buy bonds do not buy them from altruistic motives. They buy them for their own profit and advantage. They buy bonds of the United States as they buy all bonds, only after careful scrutiny of the terms on the face of the bonds, and of the laws by authority of which these bonds have been issued.

And I have read the words printed on the face of the bonds.

They look sharply to the figures which show the dates of payment of principal and interest, but above all, and rising beyond all other considerations, they look to the medium, or, as they term it, the standard in which the payment is, by the terms of the bond, to be made.

To suppose that such a feature is neglected would be to suppose that public creditors, the keenest of men, had lost their cunning. Every bond ever issued has, in plain terms, stated on its face the authority for its existence. It contains a clear citation of the law or laws which constitute the reason for its being. These laws are open to public inspection. No class of persons better than public creditors so well understand the limitations which the laws of all civilized nations place upon the functions of executive officers with respect to issuing bonds or incurring debts or obligations on behalf of their country. They know that the duties of those officers in connection with loans are specified in the laws by which the loans are authorized to be effected. Hence these loans are examined as with a mental microscope to see that no doubt exists as to the authority of the officer who executes the securities, and as to all other particulars concerning payment of the obligation. If they did not observe on the bond the plain printed statement that it was payable in the standard coin of the United States of July 14, 1870, they must have been blind indeed.

I have never heard a denial by anyone having knowledge of the legislation under which the bonds were issued that it is the legal right of the United States to pay those bonds in either gold or silver coin. It is said that at the time of the negotiation of the bonds silver money was out of use in this country. The sufficient answer to that is that gold was equally out of use. It is said that the bonds were sold to citizens or subjects of countries in which silver was not recognized as money. This was certainly not true of Germany, in which country early and considerable sales were made.

Germany was on the silver standard until December, 1871, and had considerable silver in its coin for a long time after that. Besides, our bonds were not, either by their terms or by implication, payable in foreign countries or in the money of those countries. They were payable within the United States, and it was distinctly affirmed on their face that they were payable in dollars of the United States.

While Congress took no action on the recommendation of Mr. Secretary Sherman, it did take action of its own motion. In order to place the matter beyond possibility of doubt or peradventure, this whole question as to whether the bonds of the United States were lawfully payable in either gold or silver, at the option of the United States, was thoroughly discussed by the representatives of the people in both Houses of Congress in 1878, prior to the passage of the silver-purchase law of that year. On the 16th of January, 1878, the Hon. Stanley Matthews, then a Senator from the State of Ohio, in view of the claims of the bondholders and their representatives in Congress that the bonds were legally payable in gold alone, submitted to the Senate a concurrent resolution designed to call forth the views of the members of the House and Senate nine years after the passage of the act of March 18, 1869. That was time enough for second thought. The preamble of the resolution recites the condition of existing laws relating to the payment of United States bonds. I read it just as it was presented:

Whereas by an act entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit," approved March 18, 1869, it was provided and declared that the faith of the United States was thereby solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the interest-bearing obligations or the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of such obligations had previously provided that the same might be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold or silver; and

Whereas all the bonds of the United States authorized to be issued by the act entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," approved July 14, 1870, by the terms of said act were declared to be redeemable in coin of the then present standard value, bearing interest payable semi-annually in such coin; and

Whereas all bonds of the United States authorized to be issued under an act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, are required to be of the description of bonds of the United States described in the said act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt"; and

Whereas at the date of the passage of the said act of Congress last aforesaid, to wit, the 14th day of July, 1870, the coin of the United States of standard value of that date included silver dollars of the weight of 412½ grains each, declared by the act approved January 18, 1837, entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled 'An act establishing a mint and regulating the coins of the United States,'" to be a legal tender of payment, according to their nominal value, for any sums whatever: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That all the bonds of the United States issued or authorized to be issued under the said acts of Congress hereinbefore recited are payable, principal and interest, at the option of the Government of the United States, in silver dollars of the coinage of the United States, containing 412½ grains each of standard silver; and that to restore to its coinage such silver coins as a legal tender in payment of said bonds, principal and interest, is not in violation of the public faith nor in derogation of the rights of the public creditor.

An effort was made by Senator Edmunds, of Vermont, to have the resolution modified in favor of gold payments when demanded by the creditor, but the amendment was voted down—yeas 18, nays 48—and the resolution passed the Senate by a large majority. It was at once sent to the House, where in like manner similar amendments were defeated, and the original resolution passed by 189 yeas to 79 nays.

Mr. President, in the face of the situation that now confronts us, in face of the fact that the President himself is not clear about his authority to issue bonds and avails himself of every opportunity to cast the responsibility upon Congress, where it properly belongs; in view of the fact that the gold which is purchased with the bonds of the people is going out of the Treasury just about as fast as it is coming in; in view of the fact that the people of the entire country from Maine to Washington and from Minnesota to Florida are exercised as they never were before upon this great question, I ask who, in the face of this condition of things, can oppose the passage of this bill, which proposes to take away from the Executive one of the highest and most important prerogatives of the legislative department of the Government? I ask Republicans, they who revere the memory of Lincoln, Seward, and Chase, are they willing to turn over to an executive officer of the Government the power to sell bonds ad infinitum, and to tax the people for their payment in the years to come, when most of us will be gone to our reward and our children will have these debts to pay?

I regard this proceeding, Mr. President, as not only dangerous, but as the stepping stone to monarchy, authorizing the President of the United States to exercise one of the supreme powers granted by the people to Congress, and to Congress only. I ask Democrats who revere the name of Jefferson and Jackson, how they can face the people if they vote against this bill, and how they can explain their conduct?

Mr. President, I now come to the only argument which has yet been made against this bill, that is, that it is a Populist measure, and I want to detain the Senate a few minutes while I talk to them about this Populist party, how it came into existence, what its creed is, and what it proposes to do.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Would not the Senator just as soon do that to-morrow morning? It is getting a little late.

Mr. PEFFER. I shall leave it entirely to the convenience of the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I should like to transact a little business before we adjourn.

Mr. PEFFER. I am sure what I have to say will not occupy more than fifteen minutes, if I am not interrupted.

Mr. CULLOM. Does the Senator want to go on now or in the morning?

Mr. PEFFER. I had rather finish now; and, as I have already suggested, if Senators do not remain, I shall be here to move to adjourn. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, about twenty years ago the Southern farmers—the cotton farmers—were in trouble by reason of exorbitant charges which were made by merchants for supplies furnished on credit to them, and by reason of the exorbitant charges of warehousemen for storing cotton, and by reason of high rates of interest for the use of borrowed money. They organized themselves into what they called the Farmers' Alliance. That was in Texas, in 1875. Their object was to relieve themselves from those extortions, and they proposed to effect this reform through the establishment of public warehouses in which they could store their cotton, and use the warehouse certificates as local currency for 80 per cent of the market value of the cotton deposited, the currency to be canceled and destroyed when surrendered and the cotton removed. This was the origin of the "subtreasury" plan.

The Alliance spread through all the Southern States, and finally came northward, reached Kansas, Nebraska, and Colorado, and grew to a tremendous membership of about four million in 1890.

In 1889, at the city of St. Louis, they met in a delegate assembly. Delegates were present from the Knights of Labor, from the Farmers' Mutual Benefit Association, and from the Grange or Patrons of Husbandry. They adopted a declaration of principles, taking to themselves the name of the Farmers' Alliance and Industrial Union.

The next year at Ocala, in Florida, they met and adopted the following platform, which I shall read:

ORIGINAL OCALA PLATFORM, 1890.

1. (a) We demand the abolition of national banks.

(b) We demand that the Government shall establish subtreasuries in the several States, which shall issue money direct to the people at a low rate of tax, not to exceed 2 per cent per annum, on nonperishable farm products, and also upon real estate, with proper limitations upon the quantity of land and amount of money.

(c) We demand that the amount of the circulating medium be speedily increased to not less than $50 per capita.

2. We demand that Congress shall pass such laws as will effectually prevent the dealing in futures of all agricultural and mechanical productions; providing a stringent system of procedure in trials that will secure prompt conviction, and imposing such penalties as shall secure the most perfect compliance with the law.

3. We condemn the silver bill recently passed by Congress, and demand in lieu thereof the free and unlimited coinage of silver.

4. We demand the passage of laws prohibiting alien ownership of land, and that Congress take prompt action to devise some plan to obtain all lands now owned by aliens and foreign syndicates; and that all lands now held by railroads and other corporations in excess of such as is actually used and needed by them be reclaimed by the Government and held by actual settlers only.

5. Believing in the doctrine of equal rights to all and special privileges to none, we demand—

(a) That our national legislation shall be so framed in the future as not to build up one industry at the expense of another.

(b) We further demand a removal of the existing heavy tariff tax from the necessities of life that the poor of our land must have.

(c) We further demand a just and equitable system of graduated tax on incomes.

(d) We believe that the money of the country should be kept as much as possible in the hands of the people, and hence we demand that all national and State revenues shall be limited to the necessary expenses of the Government economically and honestly administered.

6. We demand the most rigid, honest, and just State and national governmental control and supervision of the means of public communication and transportation, and if this control and supervision does not remove the abuse now existing, we demand the Government ownership of such means of communication and transportation.

7. We demand that the Congress of the United States submit an amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people of each State.

Mr. President, that is the much-talked-of Ocala platform adopted by the Farmers' Alliance and Industrial Union at Ocala. It was adopted, I think, in December, 1890.

The next spring, in May, a conference of the labor organizations of the country was held at Cincinnati. I had the honor of presiding over that assembly. There were between 1,400 and 1,500 delegates from 26 States of the Union. After a free and full conference, as we say here in our conference committee reports, they agreed that the time had come when it was proper that the reform forces of the country should be organized into the People's Party of the United States. That conference appointed a committee to meet at St. Louis in February, the 22d day of that month, in the next year, 1892. The conference met on that day and organized themselves, as they were authorized to do by the resolutions adopted at Cincinnati. They appointed a time for holding a national convention.

The national convention was to be held July 4, at Omaha, Nebr., and it was held. At that convention a platform was adopted which slightly modifies the Ocala platform. There was a very long preamble—a sort of stump speech—as is usual on such occasions, which I shall not read:

THE OMAHA PLATFORM.

First. We declare the union of the labor forces of the United States, this day accomplished, permanent and perpetual. May its spirit enter into all hearts for the salvation of the Republic and the uplifting of mankind.

Second. Wealth belongs to him who creates it. Every dollar taken from industry without an equivalent is robbery. "If any will not work, neither shall he eat." The interests of rural and urban labor are the same; their enemies are identical.

Third. We believe that the time has come when the railroad corporations will either own the people or the people must own the railroads. And should the Government enter upon the work of owning and managing any or all railroads, we should favor an amendment to the Constitution by which all persons engaged in the Government service shall be placed under a civil-service regulation of the most rigid character, so as to prevent the increase of the power of the National Administration by the use of such additional Government employees.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator will excuse me, but he is skipping some very important points, I think.

Mr. PEFFER. No, I am not. I want to keep it all together, and when I get through I will answer any questions the Senator may wish to ask.

Mr. HAWLEY. I should like to have it all read.

Mr. PEFFER. The platform continues:

Fourth. We demand a national currency, safe, sound, and flexible, issued by the General Government only, a full legal tender for all debts, public and private, and that without the use of banking corporations, a just, equitable, and efficient means of distribution direct to the people at a tax not to exceed 2 per cent—

The word "tax" was used in place of the word "interest"— as set forth in the subtreasury plan of the Farmers' Alliance, or some better system. Also by payments in discharge of its obligations for public improvements.

Fifth. We demand that postal savings banks be established by the Government for the safe deposit of the earnings of the people and to facilitate exchange.

Sixth. We demand that the amount of circulating medium be speedily increased to not less than $50 per capita.

Seventh. We demand the free and unlimited coinage of silver and gold at the present legal ratio of 16 to 1.

Eighth. We believe that the money of the country should be kept as much as possible in the hands of the people, and hence we demand all national and State revenues shall be limited to the necessary expenses of the Government, economically and honestly administered.

Ninth. We demand a graduated income tax.

Tenth. The land, including all the natural resources of wealth, is the heritage of all the people, and should not be monopolized for speculative purposes, and alien ownership of land should be prohibited. All lands now held by railroads and other corporations in excess of their actual needs, and all lands now owned by aliens should be reclaimed by the Government and held for actual settlers only.

Eleventh. Transportation being a means of exchange and a public necessity, the Government should own and operate the railroads in the interest of the people.

Twelfth. The telegraph and telephone, like the post-office system, being a a necessity for the transmission of news, should be owned and operated by the Government in the interest of the people.

Then follow a series of resolutions.

Now, if the Senator from Connecticut has anything to suggest about an omission, I will hear him.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not know the platform from which the Senator has been reading, but it seemed to me as if he omitted some of the parts and did not read them in order. Is it the Nebraska platform from which he has been reading?

Mr. PEFFER. I have been reading from the platform as it was printed at the time of the proceedings. I have saved it and have had it pasted in this little book for a number of years.

Mr. HAWLEY. Is it the Omaha platform?

Mr. PEFFER. Yes; the Omaha platform. I observe there are quite a number of versions, as there are of the Old Testament. There are different versions of it, but they are substantially the same, I will say.

I will not stop to comment, for I shall not have the time, further than to say that the money that the People's Party demand is gold, silver, and paper. Populists believe in the unlimited and free coinage of both the metals, and if there is not enough of coin money in the country, supplement it with paper money. The difference between the Populists and the Democrats and the Republicans is this: That we do not believe in bank notes; we do not believe in private notes of any kind to circulate as money; we do not believe in the Government of the United States or the Congress of the United States delegating its authority "to coin money and to regulate the value thereof" to any class of people under heaven. We believe it is a function of government, and a sovereign function, to prepare and to issue its own money—its own gold money, its own silver money, its own paper money—and then we have good money all the time.

The question of redemption in gold comes up and we talk about it frequently. The redemption idea is the product of a bad system; that is, the system of banks issuing paper money. The bank is a private corporation and its paper represents a private debt—the Bank of Johnstown will pay the bearer $10, the Bank of Smithville will pay to bearer $1, and so on—and the law says, correctly, that there should be some safety, something back of, something that the people have confidence in behind these notes, and hence they were to be redeemed in coin.

But now when the Government comes to issue its own paper, what sort of sense, I ask, Mr. President, is there in requiring any redemption fund at all? Our Republican friends and our Democratic friends both say that we want money of which the different kinds of dollars shall be exactly equal, each dollar as good as every other dollar. If that be true, what in the name of common sense do you want any redemption for? Will you redeem a gold dollar with a silver dollar? Will you redeem a silver dollar with a gold dollar? And if paper money is as good as gold, why redeem it in gold?

There is where we differ in respect to the redemption matter, and it is a vital difference, I say to Senators. As long as we have national-bank notes we want them redeemed in money that the people have faith in. They have no faith in the private note of the banks, because they have been robbed time and time again by bank notes, and that is the reason why this idea of redemption has come. What do you want with the redemption of greenbacks? That is what is giving us all of our trouble now, although if the Secretary would redeem in silver, as he is authorized to do, and as he ought to do, we would have no trouble, because we would have an abundance always on hand to redeem the notes. Nobody would want them redeemed. Any man would rather have a five-dollar bill than five silver dollars in his pocket, and particularly would he rather have a ten-dollar Government note than ten dollars of silver in his pocket. It is for no other purpose under heaven that this redemption business is now going on at such a rapid rate than to serve the personal purposes of speculators and gamblers in gold.

Populists want no reserve fund to redeem their money—no redemption fund for the benefit of stockbrokers and banking syndicates. We believe Government paper is a safer money than metal of any kind. We want Government paper, not bank notes; we want money that is as good as the nation's credit—money that needs no redeemer; money as good in the hands of the poor as in the tills of the rich; money worth its face in the products of labor; money that will not slink away when trouble comes; money that speculators can not corner; money that will pay debts and taxes; money based on the people's property and the public credit; money that the Government will receive at par; money that will be good as long as the Republic endures.

Mr. President, the growth of the Populist party has been phenomenal. The New York World, which publishes an annual almanac containing a vast amount of useful statistical information, a few months ago published the following editorial showing the rapid growth of this new party:

GROWTH OF POPULISM.

As the strength of the Populists is chiefly in the West and South, it is not to be wondered at that so little attention has been paid to their movements in those parts of the country exempt from their influence.

In 1892 they cast a total of 1,041,028 votes for their Presidential candidate, Weaver, out of a total of 12,110,636 for all candidates. If they had given no evidence of growth in the meanwhile they would not cut much of a figure in the calculations of the present year. But a remarkable feature of the elections of 1894 was the great increase in the Populist vote which accompanied the overturning the Democratic candidates. In the leading States in which a Populist organization was in the field in 1892 and in 1894 the following table shows their gains:

State.	1892.	1894.	State.	1892.	1894.
Arkansas	11,831	24,541	Missouri	41,213	42,463
California	25,325	51,304	Montana	7,794	15,240
Illinois	22,207	59,706	Ohio	14,850	52,675
Indiana	22,208	29,388	Oregon	26,965	26,033
Iowa	20,595	32,118	Tennessee	23,447	23,002
Kentucky	23,500	16,911	Texas	99,698	159,224
Michigan	19,892	30,012	Washington	19,165	25,140
Minnesota	20,315	87,931	Wisconsin	9,909	25,604

These results were on straight tickets. In addition, the Populists in a fusion with the Democrats increased in Colorado from 53,584 to 82,111. In Georgia, where they cast 42,937 votes in 1892, a Republican fusion gave them 96,888 in 1894. In Kansas a Democrat fusion gave them 163,111 votes for President in 1892, and separately they cast 118,327 in 1894. In Nebraska a straight vote of 83,132 for Weaver in 1892 was increased by Democratic fusion to 97,815 in 1894.

In North Carolina a fusion with the Republicans on chief justice in 1894 increased their vote from 44,736 (in 1892) to 148,344, or more than the total Republican and Populist vote of 1892. In Virginia a similar fusion increased the vote from 12,276 to 81,239.

In Alabama the fusion vote of 85,182 in 1892 only fell off on a straight vote in 1894 to 83,283. In Mississippi the vote was substantially unchanged. In North Dakota a fusion vote of 17,700 in 1892 was reduced to a straight vote of 9,354 in 1894.

It must be borne in mind that the vote in the off year is uniformly less than in a Presidential year.

If the Populist vote increased so largely from 1892 to 1894, it becomes an interesting question to know whether it has gone on increasing? It will undoubtedly be a factor in the results of next November, especially if there should be a fusion with the free-silver bolters from one or both of the old parties.

Now, Mr. President, I have detained the Senate long enough, and I will conclude by reading a selection, not from the Psalms, but from an article that I prepared some two years ago for the North American Review. I think it appeared in the December number of 1893 or 1894, and it concluded in these words, and perhaps Senators who listen will get as much Populism in these words as they will get anywhere else in the same number:

The Populist party is an organized demand that the functions of government shall be exercised only for the mutual benefit of all the people. It asserts that government is useful only to the extent that it serves to advance the common weal. Believing that the public good is paramount to private interests, it protests against the delegation of sovereign powers to private agencies. Its motto is: "Equal rights to all; special privileges to none." Its creed is written in a single line of the Declaration of Independence—"All men are created equal."

Devoted to the objects for which the Constitution of the United States was adopted, it proposes to "form a more perfect union" by cultivating a national sentiment among the people; to "insure domestic tranquility" by securing to every man and woman what they earn; to "establish justice" by procuring an equitable distribution of the products and profits of labor; to "provide for the common defense" by interesting every citizen in the ownership of his home; to "promote the general welfare" by abolishing class legislation and limiting the Government to its proper functions; and to "secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity" by protecting the producing masses against the spoliation of speculators and usurers.

The Populist claims that the mission of his party is to emancipate labor. He believes that men are not only created equal, but that they are equally entitled to the use of natural resources in procuring means of subsistence and comfort. He believes that an equitable distribution of the products and profits of labor is essential to the highest form of civilization; that taxation should only be for public purposes, and that all moneys raised by taxes should go into the public Treasury; that public needs should be supplied by public agencies, and that the people should be served equally and alike.

The party believes in popular government. Its demands may be summarized fairly to be—

1. An exclusively national currency in amount amply sufficient for all the uses for which money is needed by the people, to consist of gold and silver coined on equal terms, and Government paper, each and all legal tender in payment of debts of whatever nature or amount, receivable for taxes and all public dues.

2. That rates of interest for the use of money be reduced to the level of average net profits in productive industries.

3. That the means of public transportation be brought under public control, to the end that carriage shall not cost more than it is reasonably worth and that charges may be made uniform.

4. That large private landholdings be discouraged by law.

Populists complain of legislation in the interest of favored classes. At the very time when the homestead law was passed a scheme was hatching to absorb the public lands by railway corporations. Scarcely had the great war begun when a plan was laid to establish a system of national banking based on the people's debts; and while customs duties were raised to increase the public revenues, cheap foreign labor was brought in under contract to man the factories. Banks have been specially favored. When it was to their interest to withdraw their notes it was done with impunity. They have been permitted to openly violate the law which authorized their existence, and this without rebuke. The United States Senate shields them from exposure. When the Treasury was flush public moneys were lavishly left with the banks to use without interest, and when the great banks in New York City needed funds to relieve the stringency in the "money market" there they had only to ask and they received. And now that the Treasury is running short in gold reserves, there is a demand for more bonds to purchase more gold to be used in redeeming Treasury notes which the law requires to be redeemed in silver, thus again reducing the reserves, making another bond issue necessary to procure more gold; and so on, as the "money market" may require. These "Napoleons of finance" are playing a bold game.

* * * * * * *

Rapid accumulation of wealth by a few citizens, as we have seen it in the United States during the last thirty years, is evidence of morbidly abnormal conditions. It is inconsistent with free institutions. It is breeding anarchy and trouble. No man can honestly take to himself what he does not earn; and if he does no more than that riches will come to him slowly. It is only when he gets what he does not earn that his "success" attracts attention. Fortunes running into millions of dollars must be made up of property and profits mostly produced and earned by persons other than those who claim them.

No man ever earned a million dollars. If he was moved to great undertakings, nature's God inspired him. And if in the play of his ambition he marshaled effective forces his equipment cost him little. To a great mind success is compensation. The value of its labor can not be measured with money. A strong man's intellect moves as easily as a blacksmith's arm. Both are gifts.

The best men are content with little. Vast enterprises which move the world are maintained by contributions from the labor of the poor. Leaders do but organize and direct; the rank and file do all the rest. Apply the "iron law of wages" equally to all that work and you scale down the salaries of many useless people. If the Republic is to endure we must encourage the average man.

That is all, Mr. President.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I merely wish to take the floor on the subject of the pending bill. I will proceed with my remarks to-morrow. I will now yield to Senators who have other business to transact.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7664) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes; further insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 8, 10, 13, 15, 16, 17, 23, 24, 25, 28, 32, 61, 91, 92, 93, 94, 96, 97, 109, 111, 112, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 139, 140, 141, 146, 147, and 161 to the bill; agrees to the further conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CANNON, Mr. HAINER of Nebraska, and Mr. SAYERS managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House insisted upon its amendments to the bill (S. 2928) to extend the routes of the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway Company and of the Belt Railway Company of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BABCOCK, Mr. RICHARDSON, and Mr. CURTIS of Iowa managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution authorizing the Committee on Enrolled Bills of the two Houses to correct the enrolled bill (H. R. 5731) entitled "An act to regulate the practice of medicine and surgery, to license physicians and surgeons, and to punish persons violating the provisions thereof in the District of Columbia"; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PRACTICE OF MEDICINE AND SURGERY.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate a concurrent resolution which has come from the House of Representatives for the purpose of correcting an error in the enrollment of a bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUBOIS in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Committee on Enrolled Bills of the two Houses be authorized to correct the enrolled bill (H. R. 5731) entitled "An act to regulate the practice of medicine and surgery, to license physicians and surgeons, and to punish persons violating the provisions thereof in the District of Columbia," by striking out, in section 3, lines 1 and 2, "1st day of July, 1896," and inserting "passage of this act"; also, in section 12, after the word "Columbia," strike out "nor to medical students who have matriculated in any medical college in the District of Columbia prior to January, 1896."

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the resolution be now considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HILL. What is the resolution?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that it is simply to correct an error made by the enrollment clerk of the House of Representatives in the bill to regulate the practice of medicine and surgery in the District of Columbia.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and concurred in.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the message of the House of Representatives in relation to the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives, agreeing to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments to the bill (H. R. 7664) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, insisting upon its disagreement to certain amendments, and agreeing to the further conference asked by the Senate.

Mr. HALE. It requires no action, as the Senate has asked for the conference.

JOHN N. QUACKENBUSH.

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6739) for the relief of John N. Quackenbush, late a commander in the United States Navy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of law regulating appointments in the Navy by promotion in the line, and limiting the number of commanders to be appointed in the United States naval service, are hereby suspended for the purpose of this act only, and only so far as they affect John N. Quackenbush; and the President of the United States is hereby authorized, in the exercise of his discretion and judgment, to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint said John N. Quackenbush, late a commander in the Navy of the United States, to the same grade and rank of commander in the United States Navy as of the date of August 1, 1883, and to place him on the retired list of the Navy as of the date of the approval of this act: Provided, That he shall receive no pay or emoluments except from the date of such retirement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request for unanimous consent that the bill be now considered?

Mr. SMITH. I should like to ask if the bill was reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs?

Mr. LODGE. It was reported unanimously by the Judiciary Committee, to whom it was referred.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. It was reported from the House

Judiciary Committee and sent to the Judiciary Committee in the Senate. A similar bill has been before that committee heretofore on several occasions and has been reported unanimously.

Mr. LODGE. A similar bill passed the Senate heretofore.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. It is a House bill, a very meritorious bill, I think, and that seemed to be the judgment of each member of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. HAWLEY. I never before knew a bill of this character to be referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. SMITH. That is the reason why I raise the question as to its reference.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. A similar bill has been before the Judiciary Committee heretofore at various sessions of the Senate.

Mr. HAWLEY. It suspends the number of commanders to be appointed in the United States naval service "for the purpose of this act only, and only so far as they affect John N. Quackenbush, and the President of the United States is hereby authorized, in the exercise of his discretion and judgment, to nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to appoint said John N. Quackenbush, late a commander in the Navy of the United States, to the same grade and rank of commander in the United States Navy as of the date of August 1, 1883."

The Committee on the Judiciary has probably done the right thing, but it is not the committee to which the bill should go.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. There are some legal questions involved in the case.

Mr. LODGE. I think it purely a legal question that was involved in this case.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] said he knew all about the matter, and I think that was one reason why the measure was referred to our committee.

Mr. HAWLEY. There are a good many Senators who have been obliged to learn all about it for several years past. Some of them are on the Naval Committee.

Mr. SMITH. I have no desire to object to the bill. I merely raised the question as to the committee which had it under consideration.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not know that I have an objection to the bill, but I do protest against its coming from the Judiciary Committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to the present consideration of the bill, and——

Mr. SEWELL. I should like to know from the Senator from Massachusetts what date the pay accrues from, whether from 1883 or from the passage of the bill?

Mr. LODGE. From the passage of the bill. If it does not so provide I will have it amended.

Mr. SEWELL. It seems to me that it dates back to the time of retirement.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. It carries no back pay or anything of that kind.

Mr. LODGE. It carries no back pay.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That is particularly guarded against.

Mr. SEWELL. Let the clause at the end be read.

Mr. LODGE. If it does not so provide it should be amended. I understood that it was so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the proviso, as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That he shall receive no pay or emoluments except from the date of such retirement.

Mr. SEWELL. That would carry it back to 1883. It should be amended so as to read: "except from the date of the passage of this act."

Mr. LODGE. I suggest that the bill be so amended.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Let that amendment be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out, in line 17, the words "such retirement" and insert "passage of this act"; so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That he shall receive no pay or emoluments except from the date of the passage of this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether it would be necessary for the President to send his name to the Senate for confirmation or if the bill makes him an officer to be placed on the retired list without confirmation?

Mr. LODGE. No; the appointment would have to be sent to the Senate for confirmation. It simply gives the President the power to appoint him in his discretion.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I think the bill should be amended so that the pay shall begin after the date of the confirmation by the Senate rather than from the passage of the act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests to the Senator from Iowa that all this discussion is out of order. Unanimous consent has not yet been given for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. I do not object to its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BATE. I do not think the bill should be taken up now under the circumstances. I do not know that I oppose it. I do not want it understood that I oppose the bill, but I object to the irregularity by which it comes here from another committee when it is the universal custom of the Senate to send a military bill to the Military Committee and bills relating to matters of the Navy to the Committee on Naval Affairs. That committee has not seen it. I know it comes from a good committee, of course, but it is irregular; it is out of the usual course, and I do not think the bill ought to be considered in a slim Senate, as is the case this evening.

Mr. LODGE. I trust the Senator from Tennessee will not object. A similar bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary in a former Congress. It went to the House Judiciary Committee, and therefore it was referred to the Judiciary Committee of the Senate. No objection was made to the reference.

Mr. BATE. Will the Senator give me any reason for sending the bill to the Judiciary Committee instead of the Naval Committee?

Mr. LODGE. There is no reason that I am aware of except that it came from the House Judiciary Committee and was referred at the desk as a matter of course to the Judiciary Committee of the Senate. There was no objection made at the time. There was no objection made subsequently. The Judiciary Committee dealt with it. There was no objection made by any member of the Naval Committee. There is no objection made now, so far as I am aware. The bill has been considered in the Senate several times before, always favorably, and it always passed. I hope that the Senator from Tennessee will allow it to be considered and the amendment made, so that it may be sent back to the House with the amendment and go into conference.

Mr. BATE. It is certainly a bad precedent to send bills of that nature to the Judiciary Committee. It is setting a precedent here which will certainly be very bad in its operation.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The Senator will see that it is a bill which has always been considered by that committee in both Houses.

Mr. BATE. I do not want to interpose any objection to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] suggested that it should be amended so as to read "from the date of confirmation by the Senate," which I think is a proper amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the proviso, at the end of the bill, it is proposed to strike out the words "such retirement," after "date of," and insert "his confirmation by the Senate."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon, Mr. LODGE, and Mr. PUGH were appointed.

Mr. HILL. I call the attention of the Chair to the very dangerous precedent that has been established this afternoon, namely, the appointment of a Senator who is not a member of the committee which reported the bill as a member of a conference committee. The bill was reported from the Judiciary Committee. The Judiciary Committee had charge of it. Following the universal rule, the members of the Judiciary Committee should have been appointed, whereas the Chair appointed the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. Mr. President, I congratulate the Senate upon the establishment of that precedent. It is a very good one and ought to be followed in the future.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from New York that no new precedent has been established by the Chair. It has been the custom of the Senate for a great many years to appoint other than a member of the committee reporting a bill on the conference committee.

Mr. HILL. I am very glad to hear it, Mr. President. I was looking in vain for a precedent.

Mr. CHANDLER. Particularly where they take great interest in the bill——

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. It is no new precedent.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then the Presiding Officer ought to go outside of the committee which nursed the bill.

Mr. HILL. I think he ought to go outside of the committee most of the time. That is my judgment about it. I congratulate the Chair upon following previous precedents, but not late precedents.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that he has not established any new precedent.

B. F. DOWELL.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 715) for the relief of B. F. Dowell. It is a brief bill for a constituent of mine. It is very short.

Mr. BATE. I do not want to interfere with that bill, but it is nearly half past 6 o'clock, and time to adjourn. There are not many Senators here.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I hope the Senator from Tennessee will not object.

Mr. BATE. I do not; but I give notice now that after the Senator gets his bill through I shall make a motion to adjourn.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. All right; I will join the Senator then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill indicated by him. Is there objection?

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The preamble recites that the United States, by B. F. Dowell, prosecutor, recovered judgment against W. C. Griswold in the district court of the United States for the district of Oregon, under section 3490 of the Revised Statutes, for the sum of $35,228 and costs, and upward of $15,000 is still due B. F. Dowell on the judgment, and the United States has compromised its half of the judgment without including the following-described appropriation, namely: By House Executive Document No. 30, Forty-fifth Congress, third session, and by an act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1879 (18 Statutes, page 481), there was due, allowed, and appropriated for W. C. Griswold the sum of $2,104.32, and on the 21st of June, 1891, this sum was turned into the Treasury as a special fund that should be set off against the judgment against Griswold and paid to B. F. Dowell according to the statute in such case made and provided.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to set off the sum of $2,104.32 against the judgment against Griswold, and provides that the sum shall be paid out of the special deposit to B. F. Dowell.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BATE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, May 29, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 28, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. KEM. If in order, Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. HARDY. I object. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER, having counted the House and ascertained the presence of a quorum, directed the Clerk to read the Journal.

The Journal was read and approved.

SHELTER FOR HOMELESS CITIZENS OF ST. LOUIS.

Mr. JOY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized to lend to the mayors of the cities of East St. Louis, Ill., and St. Louis, Mo., and vicinity, under such regulations and restrictions as he may deem proper, a sufficient number of tents to temporarily shelter such citizens of said cities as may have lost their homes by the tornado of yesterday, and to render such other relief in the premises as he may deem necessary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution? It requires unanimous consent. [A pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. There having been no objection made to the consideration of this resolution, I hope it will be adopted. I called on the Secretary of War this morning in company with my colleague [Mr. HUBBARD], and was assured that if Congress would give the necessary authority, the War Department would place eight or ten boats——

Mr. KEM. I rise to a point of order. We can not hear what the gentleman is saying.

The SPEAKER. The House seems to be in order.

Mr. KEM. I hope the gentleman will speak louder.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I was saying that the Secretary of War, or rather his assistant (he himself not being present), assured my colleague [Mr. HUBBARD] and myself this morning that eight or ten boats, which are now used for the purpose of Mississippi River improvement near Jefferson City, Mo., could be sent to St. Louis immediately to render such aid and relief as may be possible. For this reason I trust that Congress will, by the adoption of this resolution, give the War Department the necessary authority.

I shall also on behalf of my colleague and myself ask the House for leave of absence. My colleague, being a medical man, will probably be able to render valuable individual assistance; because our information is to the effect that the physicians there are unable to attend to the needs of the wounded. I trust the resolution will be adopted.

The question being taken, the resolution was adopted.

On motion of Mr. BARTHOLDT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent to be allowed two minutes for the purpose of making a statement in reference to the misquoting of the RECORD of the Fifty-first and Fiftieth Congresses, as it appears in the RECORD of this morning.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. LEWIS and Mr. KEM objected.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LEWIS] and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KEM].

Mr. LEWIS, proceeding to make some remarks, was called to order by

The SPEAKER, who said: The gentleman after making objection can not discuss the matter himself. The Reporters will not put the gentleman's remarks in the RECORD.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CANNON. I now call up the conference report on the sundry civil appropriation bill. The House was dividing yesterday on a motion to concur in the Senate amendment appropriating $5,000 for approaches to the court-house at Martinsburg, W. Va. The presence of no quorum was developed, and the House adjourned.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For court-house and post-office at Martinsburg, W. Va.: For completion of approaches, $5,000.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion that the House recede from its disagreement to this amendment and concur with the amendment.

The question being taken, the motion was agreed to; there being—ayes 92, noes 25.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next amendment on which a separate vote is demanded.

The Clerk read as follows:

For court-house at Savannah, Ga.: For continuation of building, $25,000; and the limit of cost of said building is increased $100,000.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman from Georgia, who asked a separate vote on this amendment, desire any time?

Mr. LESTER. I would like a few minutes to discuss the matter.

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman five minutes, or so much time as may be necessary to explain the amendment.

Mr. LESTER. Mr. Speaker, this amendment relates to the construction of the public building in the city of Savannah, Ga., and my motion is that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment and concur in the same.

This is one of the amendments in the sundry civil bill, and proposes an increase of the limit in the construction of the court-house and post-office building in the city of Savannah. The limit fixed by the original act providing for this building (and it has been about ten years under construction and is partly finished at this time) was fixed at $400,000. When bids were called for for the purpose of facing the building, alternate bids were had both for brick and marble. It was discovered on an investigation of the bids for the marble coating that they involved more than the amount authorized by law for this expenditure by the Treasury Department to the extent of about $100,000. The bids to finish it with brick were accepted. It was understood that the bids for marble would be accepted if Congress within a certain time (that is, by the 1st of June, 1896) would extend the limit of the appropriation so as to permit the structure to be of marble, as it ought to be, instead of brick.

The amendment of the Senate now proposes to extend the limit of the cost of the building from $400,000 to $500,000, in order that the finishing may be of marble instead of brick. It was the contemplation and expectation of every one concerned in the matter (and the whole people of the United States are concerned in this, because it is a public building of the United States) that this building should be finished with stone or marble as a building of that character and size ought to be constructed. Brick is not a proper material (and in that suggestion I think the House will agree) out of which a structure of this kind should be finished. But in order to have marble and not brick it is necessary to extend the limit of cost to the amount contemplated in this amendment.

In August last, when it was discovered that the limit of appropriation was not sufficient (and the cause of its not being sufficient, I may state, was due to the fact that the site was changed and much money lost on that account, a loss to the building, for otherwise the $400,000 would have been sufficient to finish it in marble; but, as I have said, the money was expended on another site, the location having been changed)—but in August last, when it was discovered that the appropriation was not sufficient, a communication was addressed by the Secretary of the Treasury to the contractors, to which I will refer in a moment, upon this subject. So the situation now is whether this building shall be of brick or of marble. All will agree, I think, that it ought to be of marble, and in order to provide marble for it the extension of the limit is necessary. That is the purpose I have in view in asking the House to recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment.

In August of last year bids were advertised for to do the finishing. The groundwork and under structure had already been finished of stone. These bids were sent in and (I think it was in August) were accepted. Now the Secretary of the Treasury, concurring in the view that this building should be of marble or stone, addressed a letter to the contractors for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not they would stand by their alternative bids for marble instead of brick—they having already received the contract for the brick, and were about to begin the work. They replied that they would do so, and the Secretary of the Treasury made an arrangement with the contractors to withhold their right to carry on the contract until the 1st of June of this year, so that if this Congress would extend the limit the structure could be finished in marble. They agreed to do it, and that is the present situation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, on the 1st day of June the time expires, and unless Congress extends the limit the building will have to be finished of brick, as I am sure all will agree it ought not to be. I would be very glad, and would consent cheerfully, to join with gentlemen who say that they can not have their public buildings this session of Congress for certain reasons, and would be perfectly willing to wait until the next session of Congress to urge this matter if it were not for the facts I have stated, namely, that unless the limit is extended before the 1st of June nothing can be done thereafter on the subject, but the building will have to be finished of brick.

I ask the House, therefore, to recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment and concur in the same for the reasons stated.

Mr. POWERS. How much is the appropriation proposed in the amendment?

Mr. LESTER. This proposes to increase the limit of the appropriation from four hundred thousand to five hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. CANNON. I yield now five minutes, or so much time as he may desire, to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HENRY].

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, this case, it seems to me, is not such a one as requires the House to step outside of the ordinary rule and make an exception in its favor. The limit of cost is provided at $400,000 for this building. Now, it is sought by the adoption of the Senate amendment to extend this limit to $500,000, for the purpose, it is said, of making it a stone building instead of a brick one. There is no reason why the Department could not wait until the next session of this Congress, if they desire to do so, in letting the contract for the finishing of the building. There are many towns and cities in the land that would be glad to have a limit of $400,000 for a building, instead of $500,000.

Mr. LESTER. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. LESTER. I know the gentleman does not wish to misrepresent anything. He says there is no reason why the Secretary of the Treasury should not wait until another time before giving out these bids. The truth about the matter is, that the bids have already been taken and the contract has already been signed. It was only by an agreement to extend the time for commencing the work from last August until June that the matter has been delayed this long. On the 1st of June, unless action is taken before that time, the contractor will go on with the construction of the brickwork, and the Secretary of the Treasury can not prevent it.

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. The gentleman has answered the objection himself. The contractor has agreed to wait until the 1st of June in order that he may build a stone building. If he is willing to do that, he will be willing to extend the time. It is by mutual agreement and common consent.

Mr. LESTER. If the gentleman will make that arrangement, I shall say nothing more about this business.

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. I am not making the arrangements. I am not managing the building of that structure and shall not go into that part of it; but, Mr. Speaker, the point is here: No exception should be made of this case. Let it stand where it is. If they want to continue it longer than the 1st of June, to have it considered further at the next session of Congress, all well and good. Or if, on the contrary, they want to go ahead and build a brick building, let them do that; but let us not make an exception at this late day in the session, when we can not properly consider these questions.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, one word. This is on all fours with the Camden building, except that the Camden building has not been commenced and this has.

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. No, it has not been commenced

Mr. TATE. Yes, it has.

Mr. CANNON. But I want to say, when I asked for two minutes this morning and the gentleman from Nebraska objected, when I wished to make a statement in reference to the quotation made by the gentleman from Tennessee from the RECORD, I had to submit, as I always do when somebody objects and he has the right of it at the time; but I thought a little later I could get the two minutes, and I take the floor in these two minutes to call attention to a matter which was quoted by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] in the RECORD of this morning. If you will turn to page 5816 you will find that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON]——

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, let us have order. I can not hear what the gentleman says.

The SPEAKER. Will the House please be in order? Will gentlemen in the aisles take their seats and cease conversation?

Mr. CANNON. On page 5816 the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] had the floor and did me the honor to quote from the RECORD of the Fiftieth Congress, reading from my remarks touching certain French spoliation claims then pending before the House on a general deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. LEWIS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. LEWIS. Is a parliamentary inquiry in order?

The SPEAKER. Not without further definition than the gentleman has given. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. LEWIS. If I have the opportunity I will state it. Unanimous consent was asked this morning to go into a discussion of this matter and I objected, and I desire to know what effect the objection has.

The SPEAKER. The effect which the objection had was to stop the gentleman from Illinois proceeding.

Mr. LEWIS. He is going on now with the same matter. It seems that the objection amounted to nothing.

The SPEAKER. That objection was at a different time.

Mr. LEWIS. Well, I object again.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will have to put it in proper shape if he desires——

Mr. CANNON. I will try to proceed in order. I believe I have an hour, if I insist upon it. I think I shall occupy about three minutes. I want to say to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LEWIS] that I recollect the occurrence of yesterday, and I beg to assure him now that it was without the slightest desire to offend him or to discriminate against him that, being in charge of the bill, I made the motion for the previous question. I want to disclaim any desire to in any way wound his feelings or to discriminate against him. Having said that much, I want to say now in two or three minutes that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] read a part of what I said in 1889. What he read left the impression upon the House that I was advocating the adoption of an amendment upon the deficiency bill away back in 1889 that would pay the French spoliation claims. What the gentleman read was as follows:

I believe from the best lights I can get the Government of the United States three generations after these claims are due and payable ought to pay them.

Here is what he did not read:

When I say that, however, I want to say there is room enough for gentlemen honestly to disagree with me in that conclusion. I stand ready, under the light of full discussion, with this measure resting on its own merits, and its own merits alone, to vote for the appropriation of money necessary to pay these claims; but while I say that, I want to say I doubt the propriety in the closing hours of the session of putting this amendment upon a bill which carries pensions and bounty and back pay, and for the service of the Government for the remainder of this year all along the line, and saying those items shall not pass unless these claims shall pass.

For one I am willing to vote on concurrence, or I am ready to vote to insist, but I believe it is the part of wisdom in these the closing hours of this Congress that the House shall send this bill back into conference, and let the ninety years of waiting add another year to the investigation of these claims under circumstances where they can be fully and fairly investigated and discussed, and stand or fall upon their own merits alone. [Applause.]

I voted against the loading of that batch of spoliation claims in a lump on the deficiency bill, as I voted yesterday against a large batch that was added to the other claims.

Now, touching for a moment the matter that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] referred to yesterday, in which there was a garbled extract read—I do not speak offensively—and laid to me, when it was not my words at all, but those of another member, I can excuse the gentleman from Ohio. I recollect that Rule XXXIV, in spite of the efforts of the Speaker, is almost impossible of enforcement; and I am reliably informed that ex-members of Congress were upon the floor yesterday, belonging to the lobby, dog-earing books, utilizing the employees of the House to send them about, and no wonder that members made mistakes. I do not seek to fight the battles of yesterday over. When a fight is on on this floor I make the best fight that I can while it is on, but when it is concluded, as I always have in the past, and expect to do in the future, when the majority of the House acts, whether I agree with the wisdom of its action or not, I always bow in obedience, without grumbling and without scolding. I felt it proper that I should call attention, to do simple justice to myself, to the fact that in the haste of debate the gentleman from Tennessee did not do me justice in only putting in a part of my remarks. We recollect the man who made a wager to prove by the Bible that there is no God; and he read it, "There is no God." "Hold on," said the preacher, "'The fool hath said in his heart.' You did not put it all in." So he did not make the proof.

Now, then, it does not make much difference what I said in the Fiftieth or Fifty-first Congress, or what I may have said in debate in twenty years. When somebody gets up and challenges me about it I do not know. It has passed from my mind. I know generally that I perform my duty from time to time in this House when it is necessary to act, following my judgment and conviction. I do not know how many times I have crossed my path in twenty years; and where questions are coming up under different circumstances from time to time I do not care. If I can follow my judgment in the present the past will take care of itself.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I only want a word in reply to the gentleman from Illinois. I can assure him and the House that nothing would be further from my mind than intentionally to do him an injustice, after serving with him as I have in this House for ten or twelve years. I had no disposition yesterday to do him an injustice; but, Mr. Speaker, I think I legitimately and fairly quoted what he said in the Fiftieth Congress. I thought so then; I think so now. I did not undertake to quote all he did say, because I had only ten minutes, and it would have taken five minutes' time to read all he said, and to have done so would have used half of my time. I insist that I did not do him an injustice. I simply quoted an opinion he expressed, which was that the claims should be paid. I asked the gentleman's attention to this while he had the floor and had unlimited time. I rose with a RECORD in my hand and sought while he had the floor to call his attention to what he had said. Then he could have read it all; but the gentleman declined to yield to me.

Mr. CANNON. Not this morning.

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; yesterday. He yielded to the gentleman from Ohio, some gentleman in front of him, the gentleman who now sits at my right [Mr. ADAMS], and did not give me time to get in his statement. I wanted to give him the full benefit of it while he had the floor. It was not any intention on my part to take any advantage of him or to do him any injustice, I assure him; and I think, if he will take all the circumstances into consideration, he will not conclude I did do him injustice in what I said in my remarks. I said, "This was not all the gentleman said." I said, "He went on to make other remarks about these claims." I did not undertake to say that was all; but I gave him the benefit of stating that he said other things in respect to these claims. I did not have time to put it all in at that time. And, Mr. Speaker, what I did then say, and I repeat now, was that he took the position that the spoliation claims should be paid, and that the House was then "within fourteen hours of final adjournment." I called attention to the fact that that was not the condition now, and that his committee would have ample time to thoroughly, fully, carefully, and exhaustively investigate these claims, and that after doing that then he could make such a report upon it to the House as would govern us in our conclusions. I do not think I did him an injustice; and I again assure him that I did not intend to do so.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, as I have the floor, just a word. I am content if the gentleman from Tennessee is. After he read a part of my remarks, and I challenged what he had read, he went on to say that that was not all I said, and then he made me say that this was "within fourteen hours of adjournment of Congress" and "that we ought to pass these claims." Yes, he did quote me that much further, but failed to quote the remainder of my remarks, which, taken with what he quoted, made my position entirely different. Now, then, I am content with it. I am satisfied with it. I could not challenge it yesterday by calling attention to the RECORD, because then there was a real fight on over 700 items grouped in one amendment, amounting to $2,000,000, covering the public service and stale claims for three generations back, and which were walking through this House out of order. I was gunning for bear then. This morning it is mere play. It makes no difference, in fact, whether I was quoted fully or not.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am inclined to think, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman protests too much about not intending to fight the battle over again to-day. [Laughter.] There is such a thing as protesting too much.

The question was taken on concurring in Senate amendment numbered 16; and the Speaker declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. LESTER. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 44, noes 77.

Mr. LESTER. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were refused, only 34 members voting in favor thereof.

So the House refused to concur in the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For making certain proposed alterations in the post-office building in New York City, and for improving, arranging, and furnishing certain rooms therein in accordance with plans prepared by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, to be done under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, the sum of $60,000, such sum to be immediately available.

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DANIELS].

Mr. DANIELS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House again, as it was done on Saturday, to the effect and necessity of this amendment. On that occasion the House declined to concur with the Senate by a majority of only 2 votes. Now, when members understand fully the condition of things in this building in the city of New York they will see that the adoption of this amendment is exceedingly important. All of the public business of the United States in the city of New York is done in this building. All the United States courts are held there, and those courts have increased in number since the passage of the act creating the circuit court of appeals. When the building was erected the three court rooms in it were built two stories in height from the floor to the ceiling, and it is found that a floor can be put halfway up, thus doubling the number of court rooms and giving ample room for the transaction of business.

The purpose of this amendment is to authorize and provide for making the necessary improvements by putting this flooring between the ceiling and the existing floor, thereby increasing the number of court rooms from three to six. The business in the United States courts there is larger than anywhere else in the country, unless it may be in the Supreme Court here in Washington, and a larger number of appeals are brought to the Supreme Court of the United States from that district than from any other. The business of the United States must be delayed unless additional court room can be supplied; and everyone will understand that this delay in cases that are not yet tried will of course be exceedingly perilous, because we all know that the longer the trial of a case is postponed after it has been put at issue the greater the risk of losing witnesses and of the witnesses failing to preserve their memories in such condition as to do justice by their testimony to the parties to the controversy.

This improvement is so important and so necessary for the facilitation of the public business that all of the United States judges in that district have agreed to urge upon Congress that the appropriation be made and the changes authorized. All the judges of the circuit court of appeals, Judge Wallace, Judge Lacombe, Judge Shipman, and the district judge, Judge Brown, have agreed to urge this matter upon the consideration of Congress. So has the postmaster of the city of New York, whose letter I have here. So has the district attorney. It should be remembered, too, that a larger revenue comes to the Government from that district than from any other in the United States. What is asked is simply that this amendment shall go through for the purpose of securing the convenience of the courts and the convenience of the use of the library which the judges now have. That library belongs to the institute of the city of New York, but it will necessarily be removed from the building for want of room unless these alterations are made. This is really a case of urgent necessity, so much so that a bill was introduced into the Senate in the early part of the session to authorize this work. It was passed there and sent to the House. We referred it to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, but it has never come back from that committee. It will be seen, therefore, that this amendment is in a different position from any other public building amendment that the House is now asked to sanction.

This is simply a struggle on the part of the public authorities there, and of no one else, to secure these additional conveniences for the proper transaction of the public business in the city of New York. In addition to the advantages I have stated, these changes will give the post-office one additional room, and will thus help to facilitate the transaction of the business of that great office, which has overflowed the existing conveniences of the building as at present divided. The matter is certainly a very important one, and I ask this committee to so regard it, in view of the evidence, uncontradicted by anybody, that these alterations are absolutely needed to facilitate the business of the courts, and thus secure an earlier determination of the litigation pending in those courts.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I want to say just a word about this motion. I want to call the attention of the House to the difference in principle involved in the public building amendments that have been put on this bill by the Senate. Take the Savannah case, for instance; there is $400,000 authorized for that building and the building has been commenced, but Savannah wants the limit broken a hundred thousand dollars so that the building may cost half a million, thus giving a better finish to the structure. Take the case of Kansas City; they want the limit broken there. Omaha did want to get on the bill with a broken limit. St. Paul wanted to get on in the same way. Several other places wanted to get on when this bill was under consideration in the House, but were ruled out on points of order. The Senate has put on limit-breaking amendments in the cases of Savannah, Kansas City, Camden, and other places.

Then they have put on several other amendments for the improvement or alteration of buildings that are now in existence and occupied. For instance, take the case at Los Angeles, where the Senate put in an amendment appropriating $12,000 to change the basement of the building so as to afford quarters for the post-office in addition to the public accommodations already afforded. The House concurred in that amendment, because it was not the breaking of a limit substantially as these others were, but it was along the line of the public service—utilizing that which we had, and by the small expenditure of $12,000 saving many thousands on account of rent which would have to be paid if the officers thus accommodated were obliged to go out of the building.

Now, I want to be exactly fair. Take this New York case. The building is occupied. There is not enough room for the courts. It is proposed to put in another floor, making two rooms where there is now only one. They could paint the building, they could repair the roof or the stairways, if the roof were burned off they could put on a new roof, from the general appropriations for repairs to public buildings. But when you come to laying a new floor and making such alterations as will double the present capacity of the building, that general appropriation for repairs is not, under Bowler, available. [Laughter.]

Now, it is for the House to say whether there is a substantial distinction between this case and the Camden case and the Savannah case. To my mind there is.

Mr. SHAFROTH. What amount of money is involved?

Mr. SULZER. Sixty thousand dollars.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I want to be exactly fair——

Mr. SAYERS. Does the gentleman think there is any substantial difference between this case and the Little Rock case?

Mr. CANNON. I was going on to say—and if the gentleman was listening he must have noted that I said, "I want to be exactly fair." I was about to say that the Little Rock case goes on all fours with this case.

Mr. SAYERS. I think this amendment ought to be concurred in, and also the amendment in relation to the building at Little Rock.

Mr. CANNON. The Little Rock building has been occupied many, many years; and in connection with that building the question is merely as to the alteration of the building so as to make it halfway large enough for the courts. There is no proposition for the erection of a building; it is not the breaking of a limit; but the object is to make such alterations that the United States will not be obliged to go outside and rent rooms. I think that technically there may be no difference between the two classes of cases; substantially there is. "The letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life."

Now, let me state what I think it would be well to do and what I am willing to do: Vote to adopt the amendment for the alteration and improvement at New York City; and if that is done, I shall then move in simple justice that we go back to the Little Rock item, reconsider our action, and concur in that amendment. That is all I want to say.

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. I should like to occupy a moment.

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I am surprised at the position which the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has taken; and in what I shall now say I shall not so much discuss this item as make a statement in reference to the situation in which we find ourselves. By the rules of the House, when this bill was originally under consideration by the House, no member was allowed, under the objection of the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, to present an amendment of this character. It made no difference how urgent the case was; it was of no importance whatever how the public service was suffering. Nothing of that kind could have any effect. On each and every occasion when an effort was made to insert an amendment of this kind, there stood the gentleman from Illinois, like a stone wall, objecting to any amendment for any improvement upon any public building or for increasing the limit of cost on any public building. And now, forsooth, because the Senate has proposed an amendment to this bill, all things have changed. Let us look at the situation for a moment. In what sort of a plight do we find ourselves? As that branch of the legislative body which comes latest from the people and, as we claim, stands nearest to the people, shall we tie our hands so that we can not legislate on matters of this kind? Shall we say, "We can not put an amendment upon an appropriation bill, however important it may be"; yet, when the bill comes back from the Senate with an amendment, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will not only get entirely out of the way, but will absolutely advocate an amendment which he would have protested against had it been offered on the floor of the House?

Now, Mr. Speaker, not so much with reference to this case, but in justice to all this class of legislation, this House owes it to itself to stand by the position which it has taken in this matter. It owes it to itself to say, "We will not put such amendments upon these general appropriation bills." Until we do take that stand and adhere to it firmly, positively, and all the time, we can not expect to have equal-handed justice in legislation of this character.

This case, I want to say, Mr. Speaker, is no more urgent than many other cases that have come before the committees of this House. Urgent in some respects it may be; but I could, if I were willing to take up the time of the House, show at least a dozen cases where there is more urgency than in this. Yet it is proposed that we shall take this case entirely out of the class to which it belongs and make it an exception. For this reason, Mr. Speaker, I protest against concurring in the Senate amendment.

Mr. QUIGG. The gentleman surely does not wish to be understood as saying that because one good thing has not been done another good thing should not be done?

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. I do not say that this is a good thing to do. On the contrary, it is an absolutely vicious thing to do. The public service is not suffering for want of this improvement any more than it has been in the past; and to pursue this class of vicious legislation is, in my judgment, the thing which we ought not to do.

Mr. DANIELS. The cases are constantly running behind in New York because of the lack of facilities in this building. They have not force enough to do the business, and even take the judges from the eastern and northern districts to help them.

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, it is a very strange thing that this condition of affairs has come so suddenly upon New York. Be it far from me to say anything against that great State or city; but it is not entitled to any more consideration than all of the other cities of the Union east or west of the Mississippi River. What we need to do is to follow a fair and a just course with reference to all of these matters, and for that reason I insist that no exception should be made here.

Mr. CANNON. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNETT].

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not deem it necessary to stand up here in defense of the great State of New York and make reply to the arguments advanced by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HENRY]. Nor do I think it necessary to answer the assertion that New York is not entitled to any more consideration than any other State. We do not ask anything of the kind. This question presents itself before the House solely on its merits. It is an entirely different question from that of asking consideration for the State of New York.

I need not appeal to any lawyer who has ever practiced in the United States courts in New York, or who has ever had occasion to transact any business in the Government building there, to answer the assertion that this work is not absolutely essential. Any one of them will appreciate the absolute necessity for the improvement called for by the Senate amendment in the bill under consideration. It is an improvement that has been asked for by the judges and public officials in order to facilitate the transaction of the public business. It will necessitate, in case the appropriation of the Senate is not concurred in by the House, a removal of the public library beyond the reach of the judges of our United States courts, and compel them to go outside of the building for the purpose of consulting the records; and I am sure there is no member of this House who would vote to cause or continue such a condition of affairs as that.

I trust, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment of the Senate will be concurred in by the House.

Mr. CANNON. I yield five minutes to my colleague on the committee [Mr. BLUE].

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Speaker, if this course of procedure is to be indulged in, then it will resolve itself at last into the diligence of Senators.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HENRY] is eminently right when he seeks to prevent the enactment of these measures in this way. If this course is to be pursued, what is the necessity for the existence of the Committee on Public Building and Grounds?

At the inception of this session of Congress it was deemed wise and proper not to enter upon the policy of making appropriations for public buildings. This measure is not one seeking to secure an appropriation for the purpose of protecting a building which has been unroofed or partially destroyed by fire, or anything of that kind. Nothing will suffer by reason of delay until the next session of Congress; and to my mind it is an argument with but little force when it is claimed here that the public library will have to be removed if the appropriation is not made at this time. It seems to me that in the few months intervening between now and the next session of Congress there will be no very serious inconvenience in this matter, certainly not such as would warrant us in breaking a rule that seems to be an eminently wise one.

Mr. NORTHWAY. And vacation time is near anyway.

Mr. BLUE. And, as the gentleman from Ohio well suggests, vacation time is at hand, and our very much overworked judiciary will doubtless avail itself of that vacation.

I claim, therefore, that there is no good reason for making an exception in this case. It ought not to be done.

Mr. PAYNE. Is not vacation time a very good time to do the work, so that they can have the buildings for the courts next winter, when they reassemble, and not have to wait until February?

Mr. BLUE. There might be something in that if it were impossible to use the present building, but it is being used now.

Mr. DANIELS. That is the very thing that is desired to be done; to get the building in readiness for the sessions of the court in the fall.

Mr. BLUE. And the other gentleman from New York suggests that that is just what is desired. Yet this does not convince me, Mr. Speaker, that there is any imperative necessity demanding the appropriation at this time and in this way.

Mr. PITNEY. Let me ask the gentleman from Kansas if he knows anything whatever of the merits of this amendment?

Mr. BLUE. Only what has been stated by the gentlemen from New York [Mr. PAYNE and Mr. DANIELS] themselves in its behalf.

Mr. PITNEY. Well, I have personal knowledge of it and the conditions existing, and I know the gentleman from Kansas well enough, I think, to be sure that he is not so narrow-minded as to object if he does not know the conditions existing. This is one of the most meritorious items in the bill.

Mr. BLUE. I take it that the gentleman from New York [Mr. DANIELS] stated it with all the force that he was capable of presenting it, and yet I failed to see anything of such an imperative character as to require us to break the record on behalf of this appropriation. And I say the rule that we have adopted is a wise one, and I hope it will be adhered to and that no attempt will be made to take from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds the functions for which it has been created. By taking this appropriation out of the list of those we have rejected we violate a precedent which has been wisely established in reference to these matters, and we thereby render it so that hereafter the question will resolve itself into a mere question of diligence on the part of Senators to determine whether or not public buildings shall be constructed or appropriations made for their extension. Hence it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this should be voted down and treated in exactly the same way that other measures have been treated which have been placed on this bill in violation of precedent and the rules of this House.

Mr. CUMMINGS rose.

Mr. CANNON. How much time does the gentleman from New York desire?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Not more than five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Very well.

Mr. CUMMINGS. As I had the honor to move to concur in the Senate amendments, I should like to have the attention of the House for a minute. My friend from Kansas [Mr. BLUE]—and I esteem no one in the House more highly—is certainly mistaken when he says these alterations can be put off for another year, and that it will make no difference so far as the New York post-office is concerned. He is utterly mistaken, Mr. Speaker. These alterations must be made now or they will be utterly useless. If the alterations are not made at this session the Federal courts in New York will not be able to properly conduct their business there. The library upon which they rely will be removed, and it will not be brought back. It will take the members from New York City probably four years to induce Congress to give those courts another library, but in the end they will get it, and the Government will pay for it. And when you have got it and paid for it you will be compelled to make the very alterations in that building that you are called upon to make to-day.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the post-office of the city of New York pays a net profit into the Treasury of the United States of $4,500,000 a year. This net sum is distributed throughout the country for the benefit of post-offices not self-sustaining. Possibly my friend from Indiana [Mr. HENRY] may get the benefit of some of this money. I hope it is not necessary, but if it is necessary I hope he may get it. Now, it seems to me it would come with very poor grace for Congress to say that the New York post-office shall not have $60,000 out of the $4,500,000 that it pays into the Treasury annually to increase the facilities in the post-office building. That is all, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CANNON. Let us have a vote, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurrence in the Senate amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 90, noes 32.

Accordingly the motion to concur in the Senate amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, keeping my word, I desire now to move to reconsider the vote by which the House further insisted on its disagreement to the Little Rock item, amendment numbered 9.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to concur in amendment numbered 9, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

For court-house and post-office at Little Rock, Ark.: For additional amount to construct an addition to the United States court-house and post-office and enlarging judge's chamber and the offices of the marshal and clerk of the circuit and district courts, and for an elevator, $43,000.

Mr. CANNON. Now I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the amendment of the Senate.

The motion to concur in the Senate amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the House disagreed to amendment numbered 3.

Mr. BLUE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER. The ayes seem to have it. The ayes have it, and the motion to reconsider is laid on the table.

Mr. HOPKINS. There was a misunderstanding on that. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LOUDENSLAGER] supposed that that was a vote on the proposition to reconsider. I did not so understand it, and was going to raise the point, but the gentleman stopped me, saying that it was on his motion.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I understood the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] to withdraw his motion to lay on the table.

Mr. BLUE. Oh, no.

Mr. HOPKINS. Then I ask another vote on that.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Chair will again submit the question.

Mr. BLUE. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. THOMAS. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is too late to call for a division.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to rise to a matter of privilege.

Mr. CANNON. I believe we have concluded all the items.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion for a conference.

Mr. LESTER. Mr. Speaker——

The question was taken on agreeing to the conference.

The SPEAKER. The ayes appear to have it. The ayes have it, and the motion is agreed to.

Mr. LESTER. I move to reconsider the vote on amendment 16.

The SPEAKER. It is too late, because the conference has been agreed to.

Mr. LESTER. I was trying to get the ear of the Chair to make that motion.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman state that he rose in time?

Mr. LESTER. I state that I did rise before that motion was put.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman address the Chair?

Mr. LESTER. I addressed the Chair, certainly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will consider the other action as vacated, because it was under a mistake. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LESTER] moves to reconsider the vote by which amendment numbered 16 was nonconcurred in.

Mr. CANNON. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LESTER) there were—ayes 67, noes 53.

Accordingly the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. CANNON. Now I ask that the motion for a conference be put.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves to agree to the request of the Senate for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

MRS. ELEANOR CARROLL POE.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a conference report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 804) granting a pension to Mrs. Eleanor Carroll Poe, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the amount proposed to be inserted insert "seventy-five"; and the House agree to the same.

HENRY F. THOMAS,
F. C. LAYTON,
Managers on the part of the House.
J. H. GALLINGER,
JNO. L. MITCHELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the House conference committee I have not had an opportunity to express my convictions upon the measure suggested in the report just presented, and I desire to state briefly to the House that this is one of the bills that was considered by the Committee on Invalid Pensions—a bill for the widow of a lieutenant-colonel of the Regular Army, who was pensioned by a Senate bill at the rate of $100 per month. The Committee on Invalid Pensions, after a careful, serious, and an honest investigation, amended the bill so as to grant her a pension of $50 a month, $20 more than she could have received under the general law had the death of the soldier been of service origin or had the disability occurred in service. I desire to enter my protest now, as I have done heretofore, against these extravagant appropriations in special pension bills for the widows of general officers and against the widows of the private soldier. I am in favor, and always have been, of fair pensions, nay, of liberal pensions; but I am opposed to selecting the widows of general officers as the beneficiaries of this Government in pension matters. The time has come for a halt in this business. We have given this widow now a pension at $20 a month more than she could get under the general law.

Mr. Speaker, during all the time I have served as a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions and as a member of this House, since last December, I have never yet known that the widow of a private soldier has been pensioned at a higher rate than that allowed by the law, and I insist that the time has arrived when we should extend the beneficent operations of the pension law to the widows of the private soldiers and stop this granting of pensions excessively and extravagantly to the widows of general officers.

And, Mr. Speaker, I desire further, in conclusion, to say that in the conference committee the Senate conferees and the majority of the House conferees simply divided the difference between the amount that was contained in the Senate bill and the amount that was appropriated by the bill as it was finally passed by the House.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say to the House that this bill passed the Senate granting Mrs. Poe a pension at $100 per month. It then came to the House committee, and was recommended to and passed by the House at $50 per month. The conference committee have recommended it at $75 per month. This report has been adopted by the Senate and is now before the House for its consideration. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CROWTHER], in his zeal to make a record for some one in his part of the country, has taken occasion, without properly considering this matter, to misinform the House; and it is in this way. He says that this is a lieutenant-colonel, and that the widows of lieutenant-colonels should not be pensioned at this amount. The record, as made by the Secretary of War, discloses the fact that Poe was a graduate from West Point; was a brigadier-general of volunteers and commanded the Ninth Corps, acting in the capacity of major-general of volunteers. General Sherman, in a letter to General Poe a short time before he was assigned to duty as engineer on the Great Lakes of this country, said:

I construe your personal and official service near my person to have begun in the spring of 1864 at Nashville, and that it will not cease till February 3, 1894, so that you will have been with me twenty years—and twenty most eventful years. In the beginning we were in the throes of a great civil war, with vast armies in motion needing guidance and maintenance, wherein your well-stored mind and sound judgment aided me more than you ever can know.

Now, the service of General Poe during the war as a brigadier-general, as a corps commander, is equal to that of Logan, McPherson, Reynolds, and other great men that this House and Congress have honored in the past, and whose widows are drawing more pension than the conference committee ask you to give to Mrs. Poe.

There is something very sad in this family history, considering the long service General Poe has given to the country. Only a few years since a son who was expected to be the support of the family sickened and died. A daughter followed. Next General Poe himself died, and the widow, who is more than 60 years of age, is now left with a dependent daughter. I know not what may be thought elsewhere, but in the State of Ohio, where General Poe was born, and in the States of Michigan and Wisconsin, where he supervised the construction of the great public works on the Lakes, the dry docks, the St. Marys Ship Canal, and others, he was held in the highest esteem. All those great works are to be credited to the ingenuity and skill and faithfulness of General Poe. With his environments it was not possible for a man receiving but $3,500 a year to accumulate property. He had been offered by railroad corporations, on several occasions, a salary many times as great as that which he was receiving from the Government, but he always refused, because his heart was in the Government work, and he expected, as every unselfish public servant has a right to expect, that the Government would look after those he left behind. I now yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE].

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Speaker, the facts of this case, as I understand them, are that this was an educated soldier, and that in his chosen profession of arms he rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel in the Regular Army. He was also a brigadier-general of volunteers and for a time served by assignment as brevet major-general of volunteers. Is that correct?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir; he commanded the Ninth Corps.

Mr. BLUE. Then, so far as his service as major-general is concerned, it cuts no figure in this business of pensioning his widow, because that was a mere honorary title except where the officer was assigned to duty under orders with the rank of major-general. Besides, the service he performed as major-general seems to have been very brief. The most that can be said in this case is that under the general law this soldier's widow is entitled to a pension of $30 a month. Now, why it is necessary to take the widow of a soldier who would be entitled to only $30 a month under the general law and give her a pension of $75 a month is something that I do not understand, and it is something which I think the facts in this case do not warrant at all.

Mr. THOMAS. Do you think it was warranted in the cases of the widows of General Doubleday, General Logan, and others of that class?

Mr. BLUE. I do not believe that any general officer or his widow should receive any pension above that which the general law provides unless the case is an exceptional one. It is only by reason of distinguished and meritorious services that that rule should ever be broken.

Mr. THOMAS. We claim such services in this case.

Mr. BLUE. I know you make that claim, but I fail to hear anything that justifies the claim.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask the gentleman if being chief of engineers of General Sherman's army in that general's great campaign should not cause a man to rank equal with any of the line officers or general officers in that command?

Mr. BLUE. I suppose it would cause him to rank just where he stood, and no higher.

Mr. LOUD. Does not the gentleman remember that this officer had a good fat job with General Sherman for twenty years, and is not that a good reason why his wife should receive $75 a month?

Mr. BLUE. I apprehend that this soldier, like every other regular soldier, was pretty well taken care of in time of peace, and the death of his son and daughter, however much to be regretted and however much it may excite our sympathy for the widow, should not be introduced as a factor in this case. I take it that the son and daughter each had passed the age of 16 years. The widow now seems to be 60 years of age. It seems to me that the throwing in of these domestic afflictions here is a piece of mere sentimentality that should have no weight with the House.

Mr. Speaker, it is not the mere difference of $20 per month that works the wrong in this kind of legislation. The Government of the United States, we all know, would not suffer seriously from these extra expenditures. It is the injustice that is wrought to the widows of other soldiers that is the crying evil of legislation of this kind. It is the discontent that it breeds amongst the people of the country when they see the widow of a soldier who happened to be a brigadier-general or a colonel given a pension two or three times as great as is allowed other equally deserving widows, without any exceptional reason. It is wrong in principle. There is no equity in it. There is no justice or fairness in it. And when this report is brought in here to pension this widow at $75 a month, it shows to my mind that somewhere there is sufficient power to exercise favoritism in behalf of this particular beneficiary. I trust that this report will not be agreed to, but that, in the interest of fair dealing and equity and justice to the widows of other soldiers throughout the country, and to the people at large, this report will be disagreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, I move as an amendment that the House adhere to its disagreement and ask a further conference.

The SPEAKER. That will be in order if the conference report is rejected.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, am I entitled to a little more time?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has time remaining.

Mr. THOMAS. It was only the other day that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] advocated as high a pension as this for a general's widow, and I leave it for him to reconcile his position then with his position in this case. To feel as I feel in connection with this claim, gentlemen should have known General Poe and his works. A more conscientious man in the interest of his duty never occupied an official position. He saved millions of dollars to the Government in his supervision of the public works on the Great Lakes, many thousand times more than the paltry sum which his widow would receive as pension under this bill.

But the principal argument made, both by the gentleman from Kansas and the gentleman from Missouri, is that bills of this class breed discontent throughout the country among the soldiers. I do not know what class of soldiers these gentlemen come in contact with; but I have never seen a private soldier who has said to me that he would take one dollar away from these commanders of his army or their widows. On the contrary, the private soldiers take a pride in having the Government treat liberally their officers and the widows of officers. All that the soldiers of this country demand is justice, justice to all ranks, and a proper consideration of the condition and meritorious services of the soldiers of the Republic.

Now, if the gentleman from Kansas would take half a day and examine the business that has been considered by the Committee on Invalid Pensions during this Congress, he would find that privates are receiving as large pensions as general officers, and I think the pensions to privates exceed those to general officers.

Mr. WILLIS. Does the gentleman know of the widow of any private that has been so treated?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir; I know of dependent daughters who are insane, of widows obliged to have a constant attendant, and who are receiving more at the hands of this committee than they would receive under the law.

Mr. CROWTHER. The gentleman has mentioned the imbecile and unfortunately paralyzed daughters of soldiers. Does he know of any widow of a private soldier who has had a bill passed by the Invalid Pensions Committee at this session giving her a pension of more than $12 a month?

Mr. THOMAS. I think there was such a bill only a few days ago, but I can not recall the case.

Mr. CROWTHER. It is not a question of "thinking." Does the gentleman know of any such bill?

Mr. THOMAS. I can not give the name of the case at this time.

Mr. CROWTHER. The gentleman is a member of the committee, I believe.

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly; but I can not carry in my mind all the cases considered by the committee.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have said all that I desire to say, and I ask for a vote.

Mr. BLUE. Before the gentleman takes his seat I should like to occupy a moment or two.

Mr. THOMAS. Go ahead.

Mr. BLUE. It is true that I favored a pension of $75 a month for the widow of General Blunt; but that was an exceptional case, he having risen from the rank of a private soldier to that of major-general, and having distinguished himself in numberless battles. I did vote to make the pension of the widow of Gen. Thomas Ewing, who was a Kansas soldier when the conflict began, what the House made this pension—$50 a month. He was a brigadier-general—the highest rank that this man ever held.

The question being taken on agreeing to the conference report, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 23, noes 42.

Mr. CROWTHER. I move that the House further insist on its amendment and ask a further conference with the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed a bill of the following title:

On May 27, 1896:

An act (H. R. 2740) to carry into effect a finding of the Court of Claims in favor of the estate of George Case, late of Independence County, Ark.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate agree to the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives authorizing the Secretary of War to lend to the mayors of the cities of East St. Louis, Ill., St. Louis, Mo., and vicinity, tents, etc., with the following amendments:

Lines 1 and 2, strike out "Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring)" and insert "Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled."

Give it a title to read: "Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to lend to the mayors of the cities of East St. Louis, Ill., and St. Louis, Mo., and vicinity, a number of tents."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 4020) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. William Loring Spencer, asked a conference with the House of Representatives on the said bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. PALMER, and Mr. BAKER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

WATER-MAIN ASSESSMENTS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HULICK. I am directed to submit the conference report which I send to the desk. I ask that it may be adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3279) to authorize the reassessment of water-main taxes in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same amended as follows: At the end of section 1 of the amendment add: "Provided, however, That where lots or parcels of land have been released from water-main taxes or assessments by reason of technical defects or errors in making such assessments, and where such lots or parcels of land have been sold by the former owner between the order of said release of said tax or assessment and the passage of this act, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall not reassess the same against such property in the hands of bona fide purchaser for value without notice of the failure to pay the water-main assessment on said property."

Also strike out section 2 of the amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 2. That where outside the city of Washington Potomac water shall hereafter be introduced said water-main tax or assessment shall be levied or assessed within thirty days after such introduction, and where Potomac water has been heretofore introduced the assessment or reassessment shall be made within ninety days after the passage of this act, and such levy, assessment, or reassessment on unsubdivided land shall be made on a frontage not exceeding 100 feet for each lot or parcel of land or premises into which Potomac water has been or shall be introduced and shall be considered in any subsequent subdivision of such property as having extended to a depth of not exceeding 100 feet from the front of said lot or parcel of land: Provided, however, That said water-main tax or assessment or reassessment shall be due, payable, and collectable on each lot or parcel of land or premises on and after the date on which the connection is made from the water main to said lot or parcel of land or premises."

And the Senate agree to the same.

GEO. W. HULICK,
J. W. BABCOCK,
JAMES D. RICHARDSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

REDFIELD PROCTOR,
CHARLES J. FAULKNER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

FREE LIBRARY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. POWERS. I submit the conference report which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1247) to establish and provide for the maintenance of a free public library and reading room in the District of Columbia, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same amended to read as follows: "In lieu of the matter inserted in section 6 by said amendment strike out all of section 6"; and the House agree to the same.

H. HENRY POWERS,
A. MILNES,
J. W. BABCOCK,
Managers on the part of the House.

JAMES McMILLAN,
GEORGE PEABODY WETMORE,
REDFIELD PROCTOR,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. POWERS. I move the adoption of the report.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. POWERS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SHELTER FOR HOMELESS CITIZENS OF ST. LOUIS.

Mr. JOY. I desire to call up the amendments of the Senate to the resolution adopted by the House this morning and to ask that the House concur in those amendments.

The amendments were read, as follows:

In lines 1 and 2, strike out "Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring)" and insert "Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled."

Amend further, so that the title of the resolution will be: "Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to lend to the mayors of East St. Louis, Ill., and St. Louis, Mo., and vicinity a number of tents."

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, these amendments will be considered.

There was no objection.

The amendments were concurred in.

FORT OMAHA MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. BISHOP. Mr. Speaker, I submit a conference report.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 225) to provide for the transfer of the Fort Omaha Military Reservation to the State of Nebraska, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same.

R. P. BISHOP,
JOHN P. TRACEY,
GEO. B. McCLELLAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

FRANCIS E. WARREN,
W. J. SEWELL,
E. C. WALTHALL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. DINGLEY. Let the statement be read.

Mr. BISHOP. It appears that Fort Hayes Military Reservation, near Omaha, was donated by the State to the United States——

Mr. DINGLEY. Is there a statement accompanying this report?

Mr. BISHOP. There is no written statement; but the amendments I will explain in a moment. The word "giving" or "granting" to the State of Nebraska, as used in the House bill, has been stricken out in the Senate bill and the word "lease" inserted; so that we only lease these lands to the State.

Mr. MERCER. That is all it does.

Mr. DINGLEY. With the right of resumption on the part of the Government at any time?

Mr. BISHOP. At any time.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. MERCER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CAROLINE A. HOUGH.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I submit a conference report.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (H. R. 2604) to increase the pension of Caroline A. Hough, widow of Brig. Gen. John Hough, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same.

BENSON WOOD,
C. A. SULLOWAY,
WM. BAKER,
Managers on the part of the House.

J. H. GALLINGER,
WM. F. VILAS,
FRANK J. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. LOUD. I would like to have the statement of the conferees read.

Mr. BLUE. At what rate does that leave the pension?

Mr. WOOD. The bill as originally introduced provided $50 a month. By the action of the House committee and the House itself this was reduced to $30. The Senate amendment makes it $50 a month; and the conferees on the part of the House have agreed to the Senate amendment.

Mr. BLUE. That is, $50 a month?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. BLUE. What was the rank of this officer?

Mr. WOOD. He was a brevet major-general; I think chief of staff of Gen. A. J. Smith, of an army corps.

Mr. BLUE. Let us hear the report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that there is no statement accompanying the report. That is a subject of objection, if the House insist upon the statement.

Mr. LOUD. I raise that point.

The SPEAKER. Then the report can not be received.

Mr. McMILLIN. I suggest the propriety of there being the statement that the statute requires in all of these cases. I think the Speaker is entirely correct in holding that that is the best way to proceed with this business.

The SPEAKER. The House rules require such a statement.

Mr. WOOD. I will withdraw the report for the present.

ECKINGTON AND SOLDIERS' HOME RAILWAY, ETC.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up a privileged matter. I ask that Senate bill 2928 be taken up.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2928) to extend the route of the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway Company and the Belt Line Railway Company, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. LOUD. What is privileged about this bill?

Mr. BABCOCK. The Senate asks a conference on the part of the House.

Mr. LOUD. I would like to ask if a bill in that condition is privileged?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The exact status of the case is this: This is a Senate bill, which passed the Senate and came to the House, was considered by the House and amended, and went back to the Senate. That body disagreed with the House amendments and ask a conference. They have appointed conferees, and return the papers here.

The gentleman from Wisconsin now desires the House to agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from California.

Mr. LOUD. I am satisfied on the statement. I understood the gentleman to say that it was a House bill with Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. It is a Senate bill with House amendments disagreed to by the Senate and a conference asked.

Mr. DINGLEY. Has there been an actual disagreement?

Mr. LOUD. Yes.

Mr. DINGLEY. Because I have noticed in some of these cases that before an actual disagreement the Senate has asked for a conference, and whenever such a case arises I desire to submit the point that a conference asked under such circumstances does not present a privileged matter.

Mr. BABCOCK. I move that the House insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I have a privileged report which I desire to submit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman presents a report from the Committee on Printing, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Your committee, having had under consideration resolution No. 386, providing for the printing of 1,000 copies of the bill (H. R. 7977) known as the river and harbor bill, for the use of the House of Representatives, recommend that the same do pass.

Resolved, That there be printed 1,000 copies of the bill (H. R. 7977) known as the river and harbor bill, for the use of the House of Representatives.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, we desire to resume consideration of the contested-election case of Johnston against Stokes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls up the contested-election case——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will not the gentleman allow a privileged report to be presented?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield the floor to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will not the gentleman from Indiana yield long enough for a resolution of inquiry to be presented to the House?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Just simply to be reported, not to be discussed.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It probably will pass without discussion.

Mr. OVERSTREET. If it will not be discussed, I am willing to yield, but otherwise not.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The previous question will be moved.

Mr. OVERSTREET. With that understanding, I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McMILLIN. Still we should not want to agree to the passage of the resolution without any explanation or discussion, and I should not like the gentleman to be misled.

Mr. GROSVENOR. There will be fifteen minutes' debate on a side after the previous question is ordered.

Mr. McMILLIN. We will hear it read first.

EMPLOYEES IN THE DEPARTMENTS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Attorney-General, the Postmaster-General, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Agriculture be, and they are hereby, directed to furnish the House of Representatives the following information, to wit:

First. The number, names, salary of each, and the States to which they are credited, of all bureau officers, chiefs of division, clerks, and employees of every grade who were employed in their respective Departments on the 4th day of March, 1893, and who have since been removed or reduced in salary or who have died or resigned, stating the same in classes according to grade and salary, and stating also, separately, those who were in the classified and those who were in the unclassified service.

Second. The number, names, salary of each, and the States to which they are credited, of all officers and employees of the classes above named who have been appointed or promoted to positions in their respective Departments since the 4th day of March, 1893, stating separately those in the classified and those in the unclassified service

Third. The number, names, salary of each, and the States to which they are credited, of all the ex-Union soldiers in their respective Departments who have been appointed, promoted, reduced, or removed, stating them separately, or who have resigned or died since the 4th day of March, 1893.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Does the Chair hold that that resolution is privileged?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is a resolution of inquiry, which under the rules of the House would be privileged, would it not?

Mr. McMILLIN. I desire to ask the gentleman if it comes with a report from the committee?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes; a unanimous report from the Committee on the Civil Service.

Mr. McMILLIN. Is there a printed report accompanying it?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. There is.

Mr. McMILLIN. I should like to have the report read.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. The Clerk has the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, to whom was referred House resolutions 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, and 362, have had the same under consideration, and respectfully report back the accompanying substitute for all the said several resolutions, and recommend that the said substitute do pass.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, the reason I made the inquiry as to whether this was privileged is this: I realize that resolutions of inquiry are privileged ordinarily, but it strikes me—I will not make the point, however, in this case, but will suggest to the gentleman who has the bill in charge that he is offering a very wide resolution here, the substance of which is to reprint and extend the Blue Book, which is an expensive document and one that it will take hundreds of clerks to prepare, I think.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, no; you are mistaken.

Mr. McMILLIN. Would the gentleman have any objection to letting it go over, with all its privileges attaching to it, until to-morrow? These gentlemen want to go on with their debate on the contested-election case.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, this is a mere matter of inquiry, the same as we have had often.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Is not a motion pending for the previous question?

The SPEAKER. The motion for the previous question is pending.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that there is no dynamite in this resolution.

Mr. McMILLIN. If there is no dynamite in it, it will not explode if it is allowed to lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that debate is not in order pending the motion for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion for the previous question debate can not continue except by unanimous consent.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will ask the gentleman whether he will not let the resolution go over until to-morrow, retaining the privilege which attaches to it? I should like to read the resolution. It strikes me that it is a very broad resolution. We do not want to do any unnecessary compiling or printing.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. There is but one reason why I object to allowing the resolution to go over, and that is that the gentleman who has it in charge is going away and will not be here for several days after to-day.

Mr. McMILLIN. The privilege which the resolution has will still attach to it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I yielded the floor only under an agreement that the motion for the previous question should be made. I insist that the gentleman allow that motion to be voted on or withdraw the report.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is demanded.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The Chair has allowed debate to proceed already which is not strictly in order.

Mr. DOCKERY. I am a member of that committee, and have just come into the Hall. I should like to be heard.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let it go over until to-morrow. The very printing of this report is going to cost thousands of dollars.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, it is not going to cost thousands of dimes.

Mr. DOCKERY. I just came into the Hall. I did not know that this matter was coming up.

Mr. McMILLIN. It was stated that it was presented as a unanimous report from the committee.

Mr. DOCKERY. I want to say that it is not unanimous so far as I am concerned.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. McMILLIN. I demand a division.

Mr. KEM. I raise the point of no quorum.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 65, noes 27.

Mr. KEM. I make the point of no quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The point is made by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KEM] that there is no quorum.

Mr. McRAE. The yeas and nays.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If this can have its place on the assembling of the House to-morrow, I suggest that it be passed over, holding its privilege. Is there any objection to that?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can withdraw it prior to a decision on the part of the House and it will retain whatever privileged character it has.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I withdraw the resolution.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—JOHNSTON VS. STOKES.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, the consideration of this question has been broken into by the taking up of matters which at the time were thought to be of greater importance. I trust that the members now present may dismiss the thoughts which have arisen in their minds relative to appropriations and other matters which have just been under consideration, and will come to a candid, fair, and careful consideration of a question which I deem of the greatest privilege and importance, namely, the right of an individual to a seat upon this floor. The statement made in the opening of this case by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] a few days ago in a fair manner outlined the position taken by the majority members of the Committee on Elections No. 3. I think I will be able to show to this House before I conclude my remarks that there is no majority report of this committee save and except upon the bare, plain proposition of seating the contestee [Mr. Stokes].

We are disposed, Mr. Speaker, to look lightly upon the consideration of contested-election cases from the State of South Carolina. I have been informed that scarcely a Congress has been assembled for many years, at least since the rebellion closed, except there has been a contested election case from the State of South Carolina. Many different methods have been resorted to in that State to suppress and overcome the vote of the majority of its citizens, until we are brought, in the consideration of this case, to the very latest method that is pursued by those who undertake to control the elections in South Carolina. I think, Mr. Speaker, that for the purpose of a proper consideration of this case all of the conditions which form a basis for a contest should be inquired into, and for that purpose allow me to call attention to a few facts which will be undisputed.

First, that in the year of 1893 a new apportionment law was passed in the State of South Carolina, and the first election under it was held in 1894, in which this contest originated. Remember that there are seven districts in that State, and when that apportionment law was passed those districts were not changed in their geographical grouping, except the districts numbered 1 and 7, with one single exception, that of a small portion of Colleton County, which was transferred from the Seventh to the Second district. But, practically speaking, no change was made in the outline of any Congressional district of South Carolina under the apportionment law of 1893 except the shifting or the reorganization of the same counties and townships which formerly existed in the First and Seventh districts.

No one denies the fact that for years, since the relegation of the shotgun and tissue ballot and the cipher returns in that State, they have undertaken to congest the colored population into certain districts, conceding, I think, by such conduct their right to control those districts. This Seventh Congressional district, as shown by the census report, discloses a state of facts which must confront us at the threshold of this consideration as making a prima facie case in support of the contestant, Mr. Johnston.

Remember, Mr. Speaker, that in South Carolina no effort has ever been made to draw the limitation of districts by county boundaries, but they must needs cut in and out like a saw tooth or like shoestrings that are limbered up, so as to conform to their ideas of apportionment, until they have parts of counties and parts of counties that go to make up these two Congressional districts. So that the Seventh Congressional district is composed of three full counties, namely, Lexington, Orangeburg, and Sumter, four townships of Berkeley, one township of Colleton, and one little township of Richland. An examination of the census returns of 1890 of these various subdivisions of counties discloses that in all the subdivisions of every county the colored population exceeds the white population, and the colored vote the white vote with one sole, single exception, that of Lexington County. Lexington County has 2,982 white voters and 1,650 colored; but with that single exception every other subdivision of the Seventh Congressional district discloses that of the voting population the black exceeds the white.

The population of the district is 178,830, of which there are 12,989 white voters and 23,876 colored, as shown by the last census, leaving a clear majority of colored voters over the white voters of 10,937—that is, taking the colored vote as compared with the white vote; but when we take into consideration the fact that Colonel Johnston, himself a white man, has lived among those people ever since the war and has been a part of their new civilization in his efforts to vindicate the right of suffrage, we must conclude that at least some whites voted for him. But it may be said, what right have we to assume that all the colored voters of the Seventh district of South Carolina were Republican in 1894? In reply to that let me say, Mr. Speaker, that the efforts made, as disclosed in the testimony in this case, covering hundreds of pages, to establish that the colored vote was other than Republican have, to my mind, wholly failed. More than that, the record teems with evidence disclosing the unpopularity of the contestee and dissatisfaction among his own people; and when I say to you, without fear of contradiction, that Mr. Stokes did not make a speech in the Seventh district and had no organization which brought any speaker into the district, while Colonel Johnston in his management of the campaign displayed an organization that would have done credit to any Northern district, you will, I think, deem it reasonable to assume that the weight of evidence disclosing the natural conditions that existed there is in favor of the position taken by the contestant.

Now, what do the returns disclose? They show that in the entire district Mr. Johnston received 2,647 votes, while Mr. Stokes received 7,358 votes. I have taken the trouble to compile a table comparing the voting population of the several counties and parts of counties in that district with the returned vote as disclosed by the certificate of the Secretary of State, and I will take the time of the House long enough to call attention to it in order to show just one thing, namely, that the per cent of the vote that was cast, as disclosed by the returned votes, shows that there was something wrong. This table, showing the voting population by counties as divided upon race lines, together with the returned vote, is as follows:

County.	Stokes.			Johnston.
	White vote.	Returned.	Per cent.	Colored vote.	Returned.	Per cent.
Berkeley	885	669	------	4,821	688	------
Colleton	1,970	1,416	------	3,499	472	------
Richland	932	8	------	1,665	----------	------
Lexington	2,982	1,394	------	1,650	340	------
Orangeburg	3,440	2,729	------	6,346	477	------
Sumter	2,730	1,142	------	5,895	670	------
Total	12,909	7,358	57+	23,876	2,647	11+

I will read these figures in order to show you, as I stated a moment ago, that my statements are based upon facts. In Berkeley County the white vote was 885 and the colored vote was 4,821. Mr. Stokes received, as shown by the returns, 669 votes, while Mr. Johnston received 688. Colleton County contained a white vote of 1,970 and a colored vote of 3,499. Mr. Stokes received 1,416 votes and Mr. Johnston 472. Richland contained a white vote of 932 and a colored vote of 1,665, and there Mr. Johnston did not receive a vote, and, according to the returns, Mr. Stokes received only 8. I will ask you to remember Richland County, as I shall have occasion later to explain the very light vote that was cast there. Lexington County had a white vote of 2,982 and a colored vote of 1,650. The returned vote there for Mr. Stokes was 1,394 and for Mr. Johnston 340. Orangeburg had a white vote of 3,440 and a colored vote of 6,346. The vote there returned for Mr. Stokes was 2,729 and for Mr. Johnston 477. Sumter County, the remaining county of the district (a full county in this apportionment), had a white vote of 2,730 and a colored vote of 5,895. The return for Mr. Stokes was 1,142 and for Mr. Johnston but 670.

The total returned vote for Mr. Stokes was 7,358. That is 57 per cent of the entire white voting population of the district, while the vote returned for Mr. Johnston was but 2,647, only 11 per cent of the colored vote of the district. As I said a moment ago, I have made this comparison merely for the purpose of showing that something was rotten in Denmark, that some explanation was needed why the light vote was cast for Mr. Johnston and the heavy vote for Mr. Stokes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, these figures establish a condition of things which may be summed up in this way: Here is a district of 11,000 Republican majority on the face of the race division of voters. Each subdivision was Republican, and yet the returns show 57 per cent of the white vote of the district and but 11 per cent of the colored vote. Let me now make a brief statement showing the condition, as disclosed by the record which brings this case before the House. The committee do not undertake to throw out a solitary vote in this district. No effort is made by the committee, or urged by the contestant, in that direction. The fact is, as disclosed by the evidence, that the organization of Colonel Johnston to which I have referred, directed its efforts to making a showing to this House that the colored vote was Republican and that it had sought to register its will by casting its ballots at the election in November, 1894. The registration law of South Carolina, which was so ably discussed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] the other day, fixed provisions whereby the voter must needs register before he could be entitled to cast his ballot on election day. It was my purpose to discuss at some length and, by citations of authorities and reasoning, to show the House that that registration law was unconstitutional, but I deem that I may be excused from that labor by reason of the concession made by the gentleman from Wisconsin that this law is unconstitutional. I shall therefore assume that there is no controversy on that question.

Mr. HOPKINS. As I understand, both the supreme court of the State and the Federal circuit court have decided that that registration law is unconstitutional. Is that correct?

Mr. OVERSTREET. In answer to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] I will say that this registration law of South Carolina is like a head at Donnybrook fair; it has never been exposed but it has received a telling blow. The supreme court of South Carolina, the district court of that State, this House in the Fifty-first Congress, and this committee in this Congress, have all held that that law is unconstitutional.

Mr. McLAURIN. May I interrupt the gentleman a moment? I think he is mistaken in his statement about the supreme court of South Carolina. There was a dissenting opinion filed by——

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will say to my friend that I inadvertently stated that part of the case too strongly. The question was before the court; and two of the three members held that there was no original jurisdiction; and on the jurisdictional ground alone the case was disposed of, while Chief Justice McIver held that the law was unconstitutional.

Mr. McLAURIN. And also Judge Goff, who was overruled by Chief Justice Fuller.

Mr. OVERSTREET. On the question of jurisdiction.

Mr. McLAURIN. Yes, sir; on the question of jurisdiction. The case has never been decided on its merits by a court—only on the jurisdictional question.

Mr. OVERSTREET. It may not have been decided on its merits by the court; but it has unquestionably been decided on its merits by the minority members of both courts; and Judge Goff in an elaborate opinion has held the same thing.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. And, may I suggest to my friend, no jurist has ever decided that the law is constitutional. The judges who overruled their associates did so upon the question of jurisdiction.

Mr. McLAURIN. That is correct.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. And in no instance has any judge pronounced the law constitutional.

Mr. McLAURIN. That is correct.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think the gentleman is correct.

Mr. LONG. Is not the committee in this case unanimously of the belief that the law is unconstitutional?

Mr. OVERSTREET. In answer to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LONG], I will say that, so far as I have been able to obtain a full expression of the committee, it is unanimous. I can not speak for the minority members of the committee, the three Democratic members, because they have not so stated in the report. I will say, however, that every Republican member of the committee has so announced himself in the report which has been submitted to the House, with the exception of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS], who so declared himself in his statement of the case.

Mr. LONG. Does not the majority report contain the statement?

Mr. JENKINS. I wish to ask whether the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] has ever read the report made by "the gentleman from Wisconsin"?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I say that the gentleman from Wisconsin has held all the way through that this law is unconstitutional. Is not that correct?

Mr. JENKINS. I understood the gentleman to say that he had never been able to obtain an opinion from his colleagues on the constitutionality of this law.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Oh, no; I did not state that. The gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. JENKINS. I simply desire to ask the gentleman whether it is not the fact that the report drawn by myself takes the ground that the law is unconstitutional——

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is true.

Mr. JENKINS. And that such is the sentiment of the committee?

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is true. That is the reason I deemed it unnecessary for me to insist further upon the unconstitutionality of this law.

That being conceded, then it must follow as the natural, logical sequence that any legal vote proffered and rejected should be counted. Therefore, through this organization to which I have had occasion to refer, headed by Colonel Johnston, the contestant, an effort was made to furnish this House with the data of the rejected votes: and that was done by the arrangement to which I will now address myself.

At each of the voting precincts a list keeper was by prearrangement stationed with a paper headed with a uniform character of petition that was to be signed by the voters who failed in their efforts to have their ballots received. I will not stop to give in detail the character of that petition; let me say, once for all, that that petition or circular form of paper was at all these precincts, and 7,336 voters attached their names to those papers in one form or another. The custom as disclosed by the evidence—and a witness has said it was so arranged that word was passed all along the line—was that the individual who had been designated by the local committee to have this paper in charge was approached by the voter immediately upon the rejection of his vote—not at some distant point but in the immediate vicinity of the polls and immediately following the rejection of the vote. To this list keeper, as he is called, this rejected voter disclosed the facts which went to show his qualifications and the failure to have his vote received and his intention to vote for Colonel Johnston. As I have stated, 7,336 of these names appear on these papers which are brought into the record.

We do not count all those. We count the vote only in the cases where this state of facts is disclosed: First, that the voter in person approached the list keeper in the vicinity of the polling booth immediately after the rejection of the vote and disclosed to him the facts which showed his qualifications, the fact of his effort to vote, and his intention to vote for Colonel Johnston.

There were two classes of those who approached the list keepers: first, those who could read and write, who voluntarily subscribed their names, and those who could not read or write, and authorized the list keeper to subscribe their names. In those instances where the list keeper wrote the names himself, he, in two or three instances, received authority at the time to transcribe that paper; and that fact is brought clearly into the evidence by the list keepers.

In Sumter County there were six precincts, to which I will refer in detail later on, at which the voters did not approach the list keepers and make known in person the facts to which I have just referred. But at each of these six precincts the list keeper brings the list of voters into the record, and swears positively and without contradiction to these facts: First, that they were voters and offered to vote; that he saw the rejection; or, as one witness I now recall expressed it so tersely, "I saw him not vote." He testifies to the fact of residence, and to all of the facts going to show that he was a qualified voter, and then shows by his evidence that the voter was a supporter of the Republican party, and it is understood, Mr. Speaker, that Colonel Johnston was the nominee of that party. With that exception all the votes we count under this form of lists were made up by the voters themselves coming to the list keepers.

Now, I want to submit that this state of facts is undisputed: First, that there were over 7,000 colored voters who were at the polls in addition to those whose ballots were received. Let me say, in passing, that that fact in itself discloses that there was but little division in the colored vote. That is, in addition to the voters whose ballots were received, 7,000 or more—7,336, to be exact—colored voters, as shown by the evidence, were at the polls. The name of no Stokes voter was on either list. Bear that in mind; and therefore surely we have not deprived Mr. Stokes of any of his votes, nor can he claim anything more in his behalf. Of the 7,336 voters who voluntarily entered into the organization, coming on the scene under these circumstances, there is not a possibility even of concluding any one of them to have been a Stokes voter. The fact that they came and subscribed their names when there was a motion to carry out the plan of organization discloses that they were Johnston supporters and would have voted for him if there had been no rejection of their votes. These rejections were because of their not having registration certificates or that there was some irregularity in the certificate which they presented.

Mr. HOPKINS. These were all requirements under the unconstitutional law?

Mr. OVERSTREET. They were all requirements under the unconstitutional law.

If a voter, for instance, after having obtained a certificate of registration, after July 1 moved from one house to another, even if next door, he was compelled under the law to obtain a new certificate. If he did not obtain a certificate by the 1st of July, four months before the election, then, although the constitutional limitation of residence was only sixty days in the county and one year in the State, he could not obtain a certificate at all. So that the irregularities in the certificates grew in some instances out of these conditions—either that he had moved from one precinct to another in the same county, or had moved from one house to another in the same precinct, or that the number of the certificate did not conform to the number on the registration book, or, as was shown in some instances, there was a failure to insert the name of the township in the blanks furnished to the voter. Such irregularities were the basis of the rejections of the votes.

In addition to that, not a vote for Stokes has been disturbed by the committee. Surely he can not claim that he has been misused, because instead of taking a vote away from him we counted a precinct that gives him some votes. That precinct is Strawberry precinct, in Berkeley County, in which the ballots were not counted for him because the ballot box was stolen after the voting and before the returns were made up by the board of commissioners. We undertake to say by the evidence of the manager, who is a Democrat, and by the commissioner, who is a Democrat, that these votes should be counted, and we give, therefore, on that showing 92 votes to Johnston from this precinct and 12 to Stokes. The whole committee agrees to this, and I will not discuss that particular point further.

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that when you take into account the state of affairs that I have described, which I undertake to say can not be successfully controverted, you must admit that the effort on the part of the contestant was uniform and energetic to disclose to the House the honest, fair facts on which he asks your support. There was not a member of the board in the entire district but who was a Democrat, except the two precincts in Richland County, the precincts of Gadsden and Eastover.

At Gadsden and Eastover precincts the governor, through his regular appointees, had made arrangements for Democratic managers. Richland County, as I showed awhile ago, contained 1,665 colored voters and 932 white. It was the effort of the Democratic managers to keep the votes down in Richland County. Do I speak without authority? Let me see. Mr. Speaker, on the 5th day of November, the day before the election in 1894, the Charleston News and Courier, the leading Democratic organ of that State, had a special dispatch from Columbia pertaining to the political outlook in the Seventh district, in which this statement is found:

It is stated to-night—

That is, the night before the election—

that the precincts at Gadsden and Eastover will not be open to-morrow. They are expected to have large anticonvention and Republican majorities. The managers, it is said, decline to serve. This will only be another club for the Republicans to use in their contest.

On the day following the election, the morning of the 7th of November, the same paper said editorially:

It is plainly and painfully true that the voters generally have no confidence in the fairness of the elections, and have had none for years. It is generally believed that the men who control the count decide the election, and there is no way under the present system of conducting our elections to do away with this injurious impression.

Carrying out that arrangement, announced the night before the election, the Democratic managers at these two precincts did decline to serve; but under that organization, which I undertake to commend to this House, the Republicans at the polls organized, as in my judgment they had the honest right to do, and established a board of their own, and those officers of that board so improvised, contrary to the law of South Carolina perhaps, but in justice to all men who believe in honest elections, and right in the eyes of this House, they acted and conformed to the technical rules as established by the election laws of the State and returned for Mr. Johnston 427 votes in the two precincts. So that accounts for the failure to return any votes for Colonel Johnston in Richland County, and it further accounts for the failure to return any for Mr. Stokes.

I undertake to say, Mr. Speaker, that there is not a man upon this floor who will assail the position which I have assumed, that these 427 votes should be counted for Colonel Johnston. They were refused by the returning board, so that, with the exception of Eastover and Gadsten precincts in Richland County, there was not a Republican member of a board in the entire Seventh Congressional district.

Colonel Johnston importuned the governor of that State for representation upon the board, and the Governor, in a verbal statement, as testified to by Mr. Johnston, promised that representation, but later refused to give it. Every effort was made by this contestant for an honest representation, to watch the nefarious methods of this self-organized party in its effort to suppress the vote of a majority of that district. But their efforts were futile, and it was for that reason that he organized this board of list keepers throughout the district who compiled the 7,336 votes. After the returning board of the district certified to the secretary of state these returns, the secretary of state counted these 427 votes in Richland County, so that that point will not be disputed.

Mr. JENKINS. I will ask the gentleman if the majority report, filed long before the minority report was made, did not concede that these votes should be counted? And have we not, in our majority report, counted those votes? And is not that supported by the unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is very true. Had the gentleman not interrupted me I should have so stated. I have simply taken the vote in detail for the purpose of eliminating it from the remainder of these votes which were upon the lists.

Now, Mr. Speaker, one further reason for this organized effort to compile these lists. You will understand without explanation that in contest proceedings you must take evidence by notaries and deposition proof. It is a fact disclosed by the evidence that efforts have been repeatedly made to deprive these men of the services of Republican notaries, and when they can not get notaries before whom to submit their testimony it can not be received by the House. So that it was at first impossible to have 7,300 people come voluntarily one at a time and testify to those facts. It was, in the second place, difficult, if not impossible, by virtue of the great hardship which has been imposed by depriving these Republicans of the use of Republican notaries public. Sir, it was but a few years ago that the governor of South Carolina, who now may be heard at times in the other branch of this Congress, absolutely revoked numbers of notaries' commissions and appointed new ones, and when Colonel Johnston made an effort to obtain affidavits——

Mr. McLAURIN. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. OVERSTREET. In a moment, as soon as I have developed this point. When he undertook to obtain affidavits from notaries public, the very individual who was at that time acting as a notary in his behalf had his certificate revoked. I wish to call the attention of the House to this state of facts, to show the great difficulty which would have been encountered by this contestant if driven to the first and primary evidence, that of obtaining the affidavits or deposition proof of each of the seven thousand and more voters.

I have, Mr. Speaker, a paper which discloses the effort which was made to obtain evidence on the part of notaries public, resulting in the revocation of the commission of the notary public while he was in the very act of furnishing these certificates. These certificates, I will say, in order to be fair, were not to take testimony in this case, but to obtain registration certificates upon the vote for a constitutional convention. It only discloses the methods which were pursued in order to suppress the line of evidence which would have been sought in this case. I will say, Mr. Speaker, in order to make the point full and clear, that I will read this correspondence, in order to show that I have not misstated the case. The full correspondence was published March 11, 1895, in the Sumter (S. C.) Daily Item, and is as follows:

THE NOTARY PUBLIC REMOVAL—THE CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN GOVERNOR EVANS AND W. T. ANDREWS.

The correspondence between Governor Evans and W. T. Andrews, colored, whose commission as notary public was revoked by the governor, in reference to the revocation, which is given below, throws very little additional light upon the subject. Andrews very naturally asks the reasons for his removal, and Governor Evans does not give them:

SUMTER, S. C., March 7, 1895.

SIR: I am in receipt of a telegram and letter revoking "for good and sufficient reasons" my commission as notary public. This revocation is, under the circumstances, a reflection upon my character, either officially or otherwise. I therefore ask to be acquainted with the nature of the charges, if any, which have been preferred against me, and the names of my accusers; if there are no charges I then ask that the reasons be given which prompted the revocation. I ask this as a matter of simple justice and right. I am conscious of no act of my life which could in any way bring my character into question, and assert, without fear of successful contradiction, that no man can point to any act of mine involving a lack of honesty, integrity, or character.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. T. ANDREWS.

His Excellency JOHN GARY EVANS,
Governor of South Carolina, Columbia, S. C.

STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA, EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Columbia, March 8, 1895.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your inquiry of the 7th instant, Governor Evans directs me to say that the power to revoke a commission of a notary public is reserved to the governor, as you will see by reference to your commission.

This privilege the governor exercises whenever he deems it for the welfare of the public, as has been done in other cases recently in your county.

Respectfully,

U. X. GUNTER, Jr., Private Secretary.

Mr. W. T. ANDREWS, Sumter, S. C.

SUMTER, S. C., March 8, 1895.

To the Editor of the Daily Item:

Please publish the accompanying letter, which is a copy of the one mailed by me to Governor Evans March 7, and the reply to the same, received by me Sunday morning, March 10.

In the reply to me the governor seems purposely to evade answering direct questions asked as to whether any charges were preferred against me and the names of those preferring said charges. He very kindly and gratuitously volunteers the information that "the power to revoke is reserved to the governor," and adds that "this privilege the governor exercises whenever he deems it for the welfare of the public." The reason which he ungenerously withholds from me in this letter, however, he publicly announced in the columns of The State Saturday morning. He then stated that three notaries had been removed in Sumter "upon a request from respectable white citizens, stating that they had been soliciting business and making themselves particularly obnoxious to respectable white people." I do not know who the other two are, and examination of the roll in the clerk's office fails to reveal who they are, as no record of any removal except my own can be found there.

For my own part, I decline to permit even the governor of South Carolina to publish me to the world as being offensive to the respectable white people of my home, among whom I was born and reared, and to whom I have never, in the smallest degree, public or private, given offense or cause for lack of confidence or respect. If there are "respectable white people" to whom I have made myself "obnoxious" let the governor or his informers name them and state specifically the "obnoxious" acts which I have performed. Let them state what sort of "business" I have "solicited." I assert emphatically that I have never "solicited" notarial "business," and the only ground for the charge lies in the fact that I announced that I would issue, and did issue, registration affidavits to men of my race, that they might qualify themselves to choose delegates to the constitutional convention, counted in for the avowed purpose of further oppressing them. It is for this reason that the governor of South Carolina holds me up to the world as a man unfit to perform the insignificant functions of a notary public! A shadow must be thrown across my reputation; my character must be under suspicion to the end that my people and myself shall be deprived of all voice in the framing of the fundamental law of the land. Not content with obstructing the pathway to registration with every barrier human ingenuity can devise, notaries are warned that if they permit negroes to make registration affidavits before them their commissions will be revoked. The chief magistrate of the commonwealth—God save the mark!—is become directly the chief instrument for the perpetration and perpetuation of fraud. There are more than twenty notaries in Sumter, and yet from Wednesday 2 p. m. to Saturday 1 p. m. there were only three who would issue a single affidavit for negroes, and they, after issuing less than five each, declared they could do so no longer, as their commissions would be revoked if they did.

Truly, Mr. Editor, this is a commentary upon nineteenth century civilization! What a spectacle for the rest of the civilized world to gaze upon! A people, silent and submissive during many years of oppression, hoping each year that their very submission, more eloquent and powerful than opposition, would conquer the hearts of their oppressors, and bring them to a sense of justice, are now rudely brought face to face with the brutal truth that the machinery of the Government will be used to its last extremity to strike down and obliterate the last semblance of liberty, which they now have left, and this in the name of the "public welfare."

For the "public welfare" the chief executive, sworn to execute the laws impartially, not only connives at but lends himself immediately to the commission of outrageous fraud and enters into an open conspiracy to create a constitution which he declares shall be itself a monster of fraud and an instrument for the perpetuation of perjury and fraud.

God knows that my people have already suffered enough, and I refuse to believe that now, in their extremity—offering as they are no menace to white supremacy—Anglo-Saxon civilization, Anglo-Saxon love of liberty and sense of justice, will permit so foul a stain to tarnish the shield itself of liberty; but that those who ruled in this State from 1876 until 1890 will rise up in their intellectual might and create a constitution that, while eternally assuring the rule of wealth and intelligence, will yet impartially apply to all, and will guarantee to the humblest black man his right to life, liberty, and property.

I say that the correspondence that passed between this notary public and the governor of the State disclosed that he was in the act of furnishing certificates of registration, and that five days elapsed before they could get another notary to certify to the fact of residence and qualification. Only ten days were allowed for registration, and fully half of that time was taken from these people when they would have had an opportunity to obtain registration certificates. It was because of that condition of affairs, Mr. Speaker, that this contestant was driven, in his efforts to show to this House his right to a seat, to obtain secondary evidence, which, under the circumstances, is the best evidence as to the expression of the people at the polls.

Now I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina for a question.

Mr. McLAURIN. Is not that correspondence which the gentleman has referred to after the election?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I stated that before.

Mr. McLAURIN. Then I want to make another statement, for fear you may create a wrong impression, which I know you would not do willingly. In revoking commissions of notaries public, I will say it was done to both Republicans and Democrats, and also in the case of trial justices. In the State there were a great many commissions that had been issued for years, both in the cases of notaries public and trial justices, and all of these were revoked and new commissions issued; and any man of good moral character who could get the indorsement of his fellow-citizens could receive a commission as a notary public. I suppose many of these commissions were over twenty years old. This was done under an act of the legislature, and it had no reference to election cases or anything of that sort.

Mr. HOPKINS. Was this revocation made about the time that it was necessary to use the notaries for the preservation of evidence?

Mr. McLAURIN. Oh, no; it was done under an act of the legislature that was passed about 1890.

Mr. OVERSTREET. That revocation occurred to Democrats and Republicans, but no one could get an appointment as notary after revocation unless he was recommended by a Senator and Representative, and God knows there were very few Representatives and Senators of South Carolina who would recommend Republicans as notaries.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. Then again the gentleman is mistaken in that statement.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield only for a question.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. Are you not inaccurate in that statement? In the provision that revoked the old appointment, the old commission of notary public, there was a provision that anyone could be appointed on the recommendation of 20 reputable citizens.

Mr. HOPKINS. One moment. Is that the law of South Carolina—that notaries public can be appointed on the recommendation of 20 citizens?

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. As stated by the gentleman from South Carolina, it was an act which gave the governor power to appoint notaries public. The governor had exclusive power to make these appointments without restrictions, and he imposed this restriction himself for his own guidance.

Mr. HOPKINS. Now, let me understand this. Then there is no restriction on the governor as to whom he shall appoint and what evidence he shall take to determine, in his discretion, as to whether it shall be John Jones or Bill Smith?

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. He is simply like all other executives in a matter of that kind.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, it is all very easy to see how the two gentlemen from South Carolina would meet the issue; but when you understand that the governor holds in his own power the right to appoint whom he pleases and to accept such recommendations as he pleases, it is easy to conclude and to understand how these men were deprived of the assistance of Republicans as notaries public.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question at this time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes, sir.

Mr. LACEY. Is it claimed now that the notaries public who had been selected to take the evidence during this contest had their commissions canceled during that time?

Mr. OVERSTREET. It is not. I only give instances of this to show why in this case they did not resort to the deposition proof. They were justified, in my judgment, in not undertaking that when it was a notorious fact that they could not get the aid and assistance of notaries public of their own selection. The evidence shows that in some of these counties in this district there was not a solitary Republican notary public, and that upon the request of this contestant the governor refused to appoint a notary who would be friendly to him and give him fair dealing and justice; and that was another reason why he was compelled to resort to what I concede to be secondary evidence.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have taken much longer time than I anticipated in dealing with the questions which I am called on to answer and in the detailed statement of this condition; and I wish to go now to the very gist of this case for a few minutes, and hope that gentlemen who are attending to my argument will remember the reasons why Colonel Johnston resorted to this means of obtaining a list of the names of the voters as I have outlined.

Mr. POWERS. Do I understand that all the voters on this list of 7,000 and upward tendered their votes?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I do not contend that the proof shows that they all tendered their votes. It does not. I said a while ago that we did not count all the 7,000. All that we do count did actually tender their votes, and their intention, the candidate for whom they intended to vote is shown, and also their qualification, and the further fact that their votes were rejected; and on that basis the contestant has a majority of the votes of the district.

Mr. POWERS. Did they approach the vote taker and formally offer their votes?

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the gentleman was present a few moments ago he has doubtless forgotten that I explained that, excepting six precincts in Sumter County, the lists not only showed that every voter approached the polling place to vote, but also disclosed the other facts I have mentioned, and signed the lists when he was able to sign, or authorized the list taker to sign for him when he was not able to sign for himself. At those six excepted precincts, as I have stated, the voters did not approach the vote keeper, but the testimony shows—the testimony of parties who offered themselves for cross-examination—that the votes were tendered, that the men were qualified voters, and that they were members of the Republican party.

Mr. POWERS. You speak of the "list taker." I am not quite sure that I understand that. Is the list taker the man who had a right to take the vote, or is he the man who was taking down the names of persons who desired to vote?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The list taker is the man that was designated by the committee to stand near the polling place, the man to whom these voters went immediately upon the rejection of their votes.

Mr. POWERS. My question is: Did these voters offer their votes to anybody else before they went to this list taker?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes; they offered their votes to the managers of the election in the polling place, and they were rejected.

Mr. POWERS. What is the proof in the case that they offered their votes to the man who had the legal right to take them?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The proof is that in those precincts the man who gives the testimony testifies that he saw the vote offered and saw it rejected, and also testifies to the further fact that the voter thus offering his vote was a member of the Republican party. These other voters who approached the list keeper after tendering their votes and having their names enrolled, first tendered their votes and then went immediately to the list keeper, who was stationed as near the polling place as was permitted, and there made known to him what they had done, their qualifications, the fact of the rejection of their votes, and the fact of their intention to vote for Mr. Johnston. That is the point to which I am now going to address myself.

Mr. POWERS. Do you prove the fact that they offered their votes to the regular vote taker by the list keeper, or by the voters themselves?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The voters made the declaration to the list keeper.

Mr. POWERS. And you prove that by the list keeper?

Mr. OVERSTREET. We prove the declaration of the voter by the list keeper.

Mr. POWERS. So it is one step removed from primary evidence?

Mr. OVERSTREET. It is one step removed from primary evidence.

Mr. HOPKINS. Primary evidence in that case could not be procured.

Mr. OVERSTREET. It could not be procured because of the large number of voters and because of the lack of facilities.

Now I wish to address myself briefly to the question whether or not these declarations are proper proof, and I will ask attention to this point, because upon it, in all probability, will hinge the result in this case. I submit that a declaration made in the vicinity of the polling place, immediately subsequent to the rejection of the vote, while the matter was fresh in the voter's mind, before he had an opportunity to confer with others and without apparent design, may be held a part of the res gestæ, and, when brought into the record by proper proof, is as binding upon the House as primary evidence itself. This question of a declaration being a part of the res gestæ is not a new one in the House.

It has been decided so many times that I almost feel that it is trespassing upon the time of the House to argue it. In the Thirty-fifth Congress, in probably the ablest report that has been made upon this question of declarations being a part of the res gestæ, a report made by so eminent a man as Mr. L. Q. C. Lamar, of Mississippi—certainly a good authority for my Democratic friends—the question was presented to the House, and there has never been any variance since that time in the acceptance of the doctrine. I admit that this is secondary evidence, but it is not a substitution of evidence; and when we elect to take that evidence which is the best that is attainable under the circumstances, it ought to be received with the same degree of respect with which primary evidence would be received. Remember that this was an occasion where the entire community of this district was a party. I admit that in many cases the voter at the polls is not a party, but in other circumstances he is a party, and his declarations may be shown in evidence and proven to establish the case upon which you base your decision. In this case I undertake to say that we find a condition of affairs that does not appear in many cases, and which, in my judgment, strengthens the proposition that here the voter at the polls is a party to the suit.

I have told you that these lists are uniform. Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but they are in the form of a petition addressed to this House, starting out in this way:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The petition of the subscribers, citizens of the State of South Carolina, respectfully showeth that your petitioners are over the age of 21 and male residents of the county of ——— and the voting precinct of ———, in the county and State aforesaid, and are legally qualified to register and vote.

And then it goes on and recites the fact of their qualification, the fact of their rejection, and their intention not only to vote but to register, and their inability to register by virtue of the act of those who had control of the registration of the State.

In one of the primary books on evidence which is always an authority, Greenleaf, the author states in section 138:

The question of the admissibility of this sort of evidence seems, therefore, to turn upon the nature of the reputed fact, whether it was interesting to one party only or to many. If it were of a public or general nature, it falls within the exception we are now considering, by which hearsay evidence, under the restrictions already mentioned, is admitted. But if it had no connection with the exercise of any public right nor the discharge of any public duty, nor with any other matter of general interest, it falls within the general rule by which hearsay evidence is excluded.

In section 128 the same author says:

And first, as to matters of public and general interest. The terms "public" and "general" are sometimes used as synonyms, meaning merely that which concerns a multitude of persons; but in regard to the admissibility of hearsay testimony a distinction has been taken between them, the term "public" being strictly applied to that which concerns all the citizens and every member of the State, and the term "general" being referred to a lesser, though still a large, portion of the community.

Taking into account the statements which I have made relative to the difficulties in the way, this contestant had no other means of putting this evidence before the House than that by which he did it; and having been brought in here, these declarations under the authority of Greenleaf can be accepted as hearsay testimony even if not a part of the res gestæ. I undertake to say that the true rule whereby we may consider these as part of the res gestæ is best put by the authority which I shall next read:

If declarations of a past occurrence are made under such circumstances as will raise the reasonable presumption that they are the spontaneous utterances of thoughts created by or springing out of the transaction itself, and so soon thereafter as to preclude the presumption that they are the result of premeditation and design, they will be admissible as part of the res gestæ. (Am. and Eng. Encl. Law, volume 21, page 101.)

To make declarations a part of the res gestæ, they must be contemporaneous with the main fact; but in order to be contemporaneous they are not required to be precisely concurrent in time. If the declarations spring out of the transaction, if they elucidate it, if they are voluntary and spontaneous, and if they are made at the time, or so near to it as reasonably to preclude the idea of deliberate design, they are then to be regarded as contemporaneous. (Stare vs. Garrard, 5 Ore., 216.)

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. I desired to make some remarks further on in relation to this case; but I propose now to yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. How much time?

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. As much as the gentleman wants; all, if he needs it.

Mr. TAWNEY. Before the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] resumes, will he permit me one question? Under the rule just cited by the gentleman, why are not these declarations primary evidence—these declarations in regard to how the citizen intended to vote, etc.?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I think it would not be straining the rule to maintain that they are primary evidence. But I have not been disposed to take so stringent a position. Even on the ground that this is the best evidence that could be had under the circumstances, it is sufficient, though it may not be primary evidence. I am inclined to believe, as a personal opinion, that these declarations made under such circumstances are, in view of the authorities, to be considered a part of the res gestæ and therefore constitute primary evidence.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Did not the men who kept these lists, or accompanied them, go on the witness stand and swear to these declarations having been made to them at the time?

Mr. OVERSTREET. In each instance where we have counted a vote upon the evidence of the declaration of the citizen, the man to whom the declaration was made went upon the stand and testified.

Mr. LACEY. Does the gentleman claim that it is a constitutional right of these Republican voters to have somebody representing them at the election? Does the gentleman think that is a part of their constitutional rights?

Mr. OVERSTREET. It is not a part of the constitutional rights of the citizen as disclosed by the constitution of South Carolina.

Mr. LACEY. But under the Constitution of the United States have they not the right to have somebody see that they have a fair chance?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think so.

Mr. LACEY. Then if the law of South Carolina denies them that right, and they select a list taker, tacitly or by direct agreement, do they not thereby create that list taker, at least semiofficially, their representative, to see to their side of the election; and in view of that fact, does not his act become practically official, the law having denied the right of that party to representation?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think the gentleman is entirely correct in his expression of the rule. I believe that as a constitutional right the party at the poll is entitled to some representation, and where he is deprived of that representation, either by the express law of the State or by the action of the managers of the election, and he provides a representative who afterwards comes upon the stand and introduces the proof of the transaction, that proof becomes primary evidence, and should be so received by the House. I wish to cite these authorities sustaining this view without reading at length, because I do not care to encroach too much on the good nature of my friend from Virginia, who joins me in the expression of these views and signs the report I had the honor to prepare and submit to the House.

I only wish to say that the cases to which I refer—that of a New Jersey case in 1840, 1 Bartlett, 28; also the case of Vallandigham vs. Campbell, acted upon in 1858, 1 Bartlett, and found on page 230 (that is the case to which I referred awhile ago in which the report was drawn by ex-Justice Lamar of Mississippi)—the case of Smith vs. Jackson (Rowell, page 27), and also McDuffie vs. Turpin (Rowell, page 252)—these cases sustain the position I have taken, and hold that declarations are admissible as part of the res gestæ.

I wish to refer now, Mr. Speaker, to an expression used outside of the House of Representative upon the principle that I have thus rapidly undertaken to develop. In the State of Tennessee, where prosecutions were sought at the hands of the Federal authorities, in his charge to the grand jury, as great a man as Judge Howell E. Jackson, who was the idol of the Democracy of that State, and whose eminence as a jurist commended him to a Republican President as great as Benjamin Harrison, who gave him a position upon the highest court known in Christendom, uses this language:

If the prosecution had simply shown that each one of these witnesses was seen going to the poll with a Republican ticket in his hand, which he had received from Rives, with a declaration of his intention to vote such ticket, such facts and acts would have constituted circumstantial evidence that they voted such ticket.

Mr. Speaker, in all of my research for authority on the question of declaration, as constituting a part of the res gestæ, to present as a basis for the action of the House in this case, I have found none as broad and comprehensive as that used by Judge Jackson in his charge to the grand jury from which I have just read.

The men in the present case, in each instance, made their declaration to the list keeper, who brought it into the evidence. Now, I said awhile ago that we did not count all of the 7,300. Why? In one instance the evidence shows that, not the list keeper himself, but a third person, who deposes to the fact that the list keeper kept the list. We ignored that. In another instance the list was kept at a store about half a mile from the place where the votes were taken. We also ignored that. We considered, in order to be eminently fair, that that was too far removed from the voting place, and we excluded that count also. But in one of the authorities cited it is held that where a statement or declaration "was made on the day of the election, or soon after," it is a declaration within the meaning of the rule, and it is a part res gestæ.

But we have come to you asking fair dealing for this contestant, and putting it on the strictest ground, not extending the rule even as far as the last two cited authorities, and have counted no votes except where the declaration was taken at the time, in the vicinity of the polling place, and by the man who testifies to the declaration, except where we show all the facts pertinent—the qualification of the voter, the intention of the voter, and the additional fact that the voter is a member of the Republican party.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I anticipate that these gentlemen who seek to fix the title of this seat in the gentleman now occupying it will try to persuade you that the evidence is not as I have stated it; that it does not disclose the fact I have referred to. But I undertake to say, sir, that in every instance where we have undertaken to count the list the list keeper has made we show by his statement, subjected to cross-examination, that the declaration was as full and complete as I have stated.

Remember, first, that these are petitions of the voters before this House, who present their statement at the heading of the petition and come before this House asking justice at your hands and showing their right to vote, with the evidence upon which they base that right, and for whom they should have voted if they had not been prevented. I have tabulated the evidence by counties and precincts in the districts, citing the name of the precincts, the witness, the page of the record, and the number of votes we count in each.

Johnston's plurality, 312.

As shown by this statement, we count for this contestant 4,608 votes out of the 7,336—but little more than half—4,608 votes, where the list keeper in every instance, except in the six precincts in Sumter County, testifies to the fact of the voter coming to him in person and making the declaration to him, and to the fact of his intention as so disclosed by the declaration.

Mr. HOPKINS. Counting the number of votes you have there, what majority does it give the contestant?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The returned vote of the contestant was 2,647. We counted for the contestant at Strawberry precinct the 92 votes that the gentleman will remember were given him, and which are conceded by all parties, the full committee, and the returning board of the State. We counted at Gadsden and Eastover 427 votes, which are conceded by the entire committee and the secretary of state. Adding to those two items the 4,608 which we undertake to say come into the record by these declarations to the list keepers gives the contestant 7,682 votes and the contestee 7,370, leaving the contestant 312 majority.

Mr. DANIELS. Was any evidence given to show that the statements of these persons to the person who took down their statements concerning their voting were not true? Is there any contradiction of that?

Mr. OVERSTREET. There is no contradiction on one page of this record of the fact, first, that seven thousand three hundred and more voters were at the polls, in addition to those whose votes were counted; second, that they were colored voters; third, that their names were subscribed, either by themselves, or the proof made that they were members of the Republican party; and fourth, that not one of them was a Stokes voter. There is no contradiction of that, I will say to my friend from New York, which emphasizes the position we have taken.

Now, to return to what I have just stated, an effort will be made here, and I direct your attention to that effort, for it is sure to come, to prove that the evidence does not show these facts.

Now, Mr. Speaker, you must remember that this is an ignorant community. The voters are largely illiterate. It is a fact to be regretted that they have not the intelligence sufficient to create a basis of contest that would obtain in many if not all of the Northern districts. Their language is not correct. Their syntax is poor. But the true statement which they seek to place in this record comes to you with the force of conviction, which I undertake to say this House will commend by accepting it as proof. For example, a voter will say that he kept a list of voters that were "objected."

Well, now, I submit that that is not the technical term to use. The votes were "rejected" and not "objected." He says, "I kept a list of voters that were objected to," not the voters that were rejected. But, Mr. Speaker, all these men were appointed under a common organization. They held lists of uniform draft; they had one object in view. They acted with unanimity, and when they came upon the stand to testify you must accept that testimony as tending in the direction expressed by the great bulk of the witnesses. If I testify as a witness, following twenty other witnesses, and do not go into a detailed statement, it would not therefore be excluded, because I follow others, and we may properly assume, I think, that these witnesses, in the limited time given for this proceeding, were not all asked as carefully about the facts which are brought into the record as in some cases they were asked. But I say, Mr. Speaker, that the evidence shows that each list keeper is discussing the same kind of testimony. He has brought a list into the record headed in the same way, and it all tends in one direction. In every instance the list itself is put into the record.

Mr. HOPKINS. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. OVERSTREET. In one moment, please. My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] in his report very adroitly calls the attention of the House to the fact that these lists are not in the record, because they are not filed as exhibits. But, sir, when this House undertakes to put the screws upon testimony, when it concludes that it must resort to the technical expressions of criminal courts, we had as well deliver over to these people of South Carolina the control of this Government. A list appears in the record, subjected to the scrutiny of this House and to the analysis of this committee. If it is not presented formally with the statement, "I offer the following list, and request that it be marked as Exhibit A and made a part of the record," my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] would exclude it; but I pass that over, believing that the fairness of this House will conclude that those lists are in the record. And in no instance—I challenge the statement—in no instance does the list differ in one iota from the statement made by the witness who submitted it, unless it is in the number of names that appear upon the list; but in no instance have those members of the committee who, with me, urge the seating of this contestant, counted a list without first counting, one at a time, the names upon the list as disclosed by the evidence, and comparing that with the vote itself; and where there is a discrepancy, as where one says the list contains 256 names and the count discloses that it contains but 251, we only count the names that the list shows, 251, as in the example which I have given. I now yield to my friend from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS].

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman has covered the point I was going to speak about.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. In whose possession have these lists been kept since the election, until they were filed as part of this record?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The evidence discloses that in many instances the list keeper kept it himself, and in others, if he did not keep it himself, he left it in the custody of some individual who, as he says, put it away for safe-keeping; but he always says that was his list. And I will say to my friend from Tennessee that there is no evidence to show, and no effort made to show, that there has been any alteration in any of these lists since election day, when they were taken. I shall briefly refer to the evidence upon this point of bringing the lists into the record in order to illustrate the manner in which they are brought in. The original lists themselves are filed with the record and appear with the papers in the case.

Mr. McLAURIN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I shall be very happy to answer it.

Mr. McLAURIN. In some of the contested-election cases from South Carolina did they not seek to count lists that were taken and made up three or four months after the election?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Not in this case.

Mr. McLAURIN. But it was done in similar cases, was it not?

Mr. OVERSTREET. In answer to the gentleman from South Carolina and also in answer to the statement made by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS], I will say that there were four cases from South Carolina, and that lists of some sort appeared in each case. The gentleman from Wisconsin undertook to impress upon the House the idea that those cases should all stand or fall together, or else I myself misjudged his remarks.

Now, we could not count enough lists in those other cases under this rule, because, as I have said, a list that was taken several days after the election we would exclude, and a list that was not brought into the record by the list holder we would exclude, and a list which sought to give declarations of voters that did not cover all of the facts required to entitle them to vote we would exclude; so that in the case of Wilson vs. McLaurin we seated the gentleman who has just asked me a question because of the imperfection in the evidence which brought those lists into the record. But the doctrine was the same. The other South Carolina case went off for the same reason. The doctrine of declarations being a part of the res gestæ, and the bringing in of the declarations, as we do in this case, did not bring in that evidence in the gentleman's case, and, therefore, he was given the seat.

Mr. LACEY. Were any of the lists in this case made at a different time from election day and at a different place from the place of election?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Not a single, solitary list that we counted.

Mr. McLAURIN. But were there not such lists?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Some were made at a place distant from the poll, but those we exclude.

Mr. LACEY. Then you count only those that were made on the spot, and you treat them as a part of the election itself?

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is it, exactly. We count only those lists that I undertake to say are parts of the res gestæ.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will address myself as briefly as I can to the evidence in this case to which I have so often referred. Before doing that, however, I wish to point out to the House the line which separates the gentlemen who espouse the contestee's case from those of us who espouse the case of the contestant. We hold that these declarations are parts of the res gestæ, while you will find in the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] the statement which I now read:

Assuming what the voter said at the box as a part of his offer to vote to be competent evidence, the moment the voter left the box he left the res gestæ—

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, what kind of an animal the gentlemen on the other side have mapped out to be termed the "res gestæ," which can be left by somebody in a particular place. [Laughter.] It is my understanding that the acts which create the transaction at a given place and within a given time, pertaining and applicable to a given individual or individuals, all together, constitute the res gestæ, and no individual has it in his power to leave it in any place. I have said that no vote has been counted by those who seek to seat the contestant except where the declaration was made at the time of election and in the vicinity of the polling place, and to the individual who brings it into the record by his deposition proof, excepting at the six precincts in Sumter County, and in each of those cases the proof is full as to the qualification of the voter, the rejection of his vote, and his membership of the Republican party.

Now, this class of evidence is shown, as I stated a moment ago, by witnesses in various ways, but all tending in one direction, and the gentlemen who support the contestee in this case in their report cite the case of Humbert at Beach Hill, in Colleton County, as an example of the testimony which we have to rely upon, and they urge upon this House to discredit that testimony. They do that on the ground that A. H. Humbert did not write the names on the list there. The evidence is found on page 72 of the record. Gentlemen who seek to retain the contestee in his seat ask you to discredit the evidence of Humbert because he did not write the names upon the list. The evidence shows upon the cross-examination that W. D. Humbert wrote the names upon that list. I concede that fact. If the gentlemen had taken the trouble to follow the other witnesses at that precinct they would have found that Stephen Moultry (page 74 of the record) and Sam Pinkney (page 75 of the record) both corroborated the statement of Humbert on page 72, going to establish this state of facts: That A. H. Humbert was the committeeman designated to stand and control the taking of the names, and that W. D. Humbert was his clerk and actually wrote the names in his presence.

I refer to that line of evidence to show the House that the list keeper was present and saw the names written by his clerk as the voters came up. They were systematic. They had uniform petitions with printed headings, tables, and pens and ink. It would be called a "conspiracy" in some localities, doubtless, but I call it an honest effort to disclose the pains that were taken to establish the rights of this contestant; and while A. H. Humbert does say that the list is not in his handwriting the evidence shows that W. D. Humbert, his clerk, wrote them, and Stephen Moultry and Sam Pinkney both corroborate the committeeman in the statement that he was there; that the voters made their declarations to him, and that W. D. Humbert was his clerk and wrote the names. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks why W. D. Humbert was not put upon the stand. But in God's name how many witnesses is it necessary to bring upon the stand to prove the name of the individual to whom the declaration was made?

Now, I have stated that every one of these 4,608 votes that we undertake to count was brought into the record by these declarations through the medium of the list keeper; that those questions were asked the list keeper as to what he did, and his statement made that he kept the list of the rejected votes; that the voters sought him in person; that they were not intimidated; that they voluntarily made known to him their desire, and that that was the list that he kept. These, I affirm without fear of contradiction, are the facts proved in each case if you will read the evidence aright, except as to these six precincts in Sumter County; and to those I wish to call your attention.

It has been held by this House in many cases—and I undertake to say that in no case has it been denied—that where all the facts are disclosed, the act of the voter, not the declarations and statements made, but his acts and conduct, the proof of his residence and other proofs showing his qualifications as a voter; second, proof of his offer to vote; third, proof of the rejection of the vote, and fourth, proof that he was a member of the given party, that evidence is sufficient to be admitted in proof. That proposition has been universally accepted. And at every one of these precincts in Sumter County where we have counted the vote and where the declaration was not made to the list keeper, that state of fact has been disclosed. I refer you to Wedgefield precinct, page 277 of the record, where the list keeper says that he was in the house where the voting was carried on; that he kept a list of voters who were rejected:

Q. Do you know to what political party they belonged?
A. To the Republican party.

And then on cross-examination we have this testimony:

Q. Do you know of your own knowledge that the names on this list are those of voters who tried to vote?
A. I do.
Q. Did you see each man on this list rejected by the managers, or did they tell you so?
A. I saw them rejected.
Q. On what grounds?
A. A portion of them on the ground that they had no registration certificates, and others that had their registration certificates had changed residence, and still others who had registration certificates, the number on the managers' registration book and voter's certificate did not correspond.

That was no fault of the voter. He had no control of the book. He presented the certificate and if the number varied they rejected it. At Spring Hill township, in the evidence of Reynolds (page 291); at Concord precinct, in the evidence of Gregg (page 239); at Mayesville precinct, in the evidence of Cooper (page 269); at Privateer precinct, in the evidence of G. A. Huggins (page 246), and at Providence precinct, in evidence of W. G. Deas (page 255), we have the evidence showing conclusively what I have stated—not the declarations, but the facts, all of which go to make up and establish the right of the voter to vote, the fact of his rejection, and that he was a member of the Republican party. Why, sir, Justice Jackson, in his charge to the grand jury in Tennessee, held that if the voter was seen with a Republican ticket in his hand en route to the poll it was a sufficient circumstance to prove that he was going to vote that ticket, and (if he got to the polls) did vote it. In this instance there is not a syllable of proof to discredit the statement of the witnesses at these six precincts. No man undertakes to deny the fact that these men were qualified voters, as declared by the list keeper. No man disputes the assertion that their votes were rejected or that they were members of the Republican party.

I wish to emphasize the statement that we have counted no votes except where the full declaration is made under the proposition of law which makes it a part of the res gestæ, except, as I have mentioned, in Sumter County; and there every substantial and material fact is disclosed by evidence to establish the right of the voter to have his vote counted.

When we take those lists that I have thus counted, it makes 4,608 votes. And I submit, Mr. Speaker, that, in view of the caution which we have exercised, in the spirit of fairness which should commend itself to the House—where we count but a little more than one-half of the lists of voters who sought to have their votes counted by this House—this result should be accepted. And this table shows that when you give Mr. Johnston the votes that the full committee gives him, that the State returning board gives him, and add to his returning vote the 4,608 which I undertake to say are absolutely his right under the propositions in regard to declarations, he has 7,682 votes against 7,370 for Mr. Stokes, leaving the contestant a clear plurality of 312.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I called attention at the outset to the table which I had prepared comparing numerically the black and white population with the returned vote, showing that the colored voting population cast but 11 per cent of its entire vote, conceding all of it to have been Republican and none Republican except the colored, while the white voting population cast 57 per cent of its vote. And when you add the seven thousand and more voters who were on the ground seeking recognition at the polls, it accounts for the interest manifested by the Republican voters of that district. But when we make up the table that I now present to the House with the corrected vote according to the propositions which I have undertaken to impress upon the House, it discloses still that the colored vote has not received as much consideration as the circumstances of the case, in my judgment, entitled it to. When we correct this table by adding the votes which we count, distributing them by counties in the proper way, the following result is obtained:

Counties.	Stokes.			Johnston.
	White vote.	Corrected returns.	Per cent.	Colored vote.	Corrected returns.	Per cent.
Berkeley	885	681	.....	4,821	1,458	.....
Colleton	1,970	1,416	.....	3,499	1,501	.....
Richland	932	8	.....	1,665	857	.....
Lexington	2,982	1,394	.....	1,650	651	.....
Orangeburg	3,440	2,720	.....	6,346	879	.....
Sumter	2,730	1,142	.....	5,895	2,336	.....
Total	12,939	7,370	57+	23,876	7,682	32+

This gives Stokes 7,370, 57 per cent of the entire white vote of the district, and Colonel Johnston 7,682 votes, only 32 per cent of the colored vote alone of the district. We find a condition outlined where an organization was effected by the contestant, ramifying to every precinct, where every township in the district was stumped by the contestant in his able manner, who impressed himself on the voters; where no divisions existed among the colored vote; where, conceding him no white votes, a man who at the first sound of the gun, as a member of the militia of Massachusetts, penetrated the treasonous confines of the South, and who was a member of the last regiment mustered out of the service, was the candidate of his party. What was there in the history of such a man to alienate the colored voters?

And, Mr. Speaker, when you consider the condition and the circumstances under which they labored, the energy they exerted at the polls, and since they were counted out at the election, and contrast it with the position of the Democratic party, led by a Populist candidate, a man whom the evidence shows had no organization, and did not make a speech in the district, and yet who received such a large per cent of the white vote, I ask you what can be and what must be the conclusion? I submit that it is not right and fair to undertake to say that because we have not brought in 4,600 men and placed them one at a time on the witness stand, we have not made out our case.

I wish briefly to state the position of the committee on this question. The report I have been advocating here for such a protracted time is entitled the minority report. I think it should be dignified by a better appellation than that, in the light of the circumstances under which the case was brought before the House. Ordinarily a dilemma has but two horns, but unfortunately the Committee on Elections No. 3 brings into the House a dilemma with four horns. I commit no breach of confidence within the committee when I state the various positions maintained, because they are disclosed in the four reports submitted to the House. I speak now from the reports as shown by the House records: There are nine members on the Committee on Elections No. 3. There are six Republicans and three Democrats constituting the committee. Three of us maintained the position that I have advocated this morning.

Mr. HOPKINS. Three Republicans?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Three Republicans—Mr. WALKER of Virginia, Mr. THOMAS of Michigan, and myself. Mr. MCCALL of Massachusetts, the chairman of the committee, holds that there is no election, as his report in the record discloses. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS], together with the three Democratic members of the committee, who are always together with a complacency that is refreshing and a unanimity that is always to be anticipated—three members of the minority, with the gentleman from Wisconsin, hold that the declarations are worse than hearsay and that this testimony should not be considered by the House. And Mr. JENKINS stated in the House in his speech that the res gestae was left at the ballot box when the voter left the polls. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CODDING], who undertook to submit his views on the facts and the law to the House, but was called away by the sad news of the death of a sister and was unable to submit them in print, holds that the declarations or statements made to the list keepers are mere memoranda and can not be otherwise employed than as memoranda in his testimony, and are not a part of the res gestae. He counts all the votes he thinks the evidence shows were proper to count from the memoranda to which I have referred, but he does not count as many as 4,600; and hence he joined with the two Democrats and the gentleman from Wisconsin in causing the majority report to be submitted to the House recommending the retention of the seat by the contestee.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Certainly.

Mr. JENKINS. I want to ask the gentleman, in all common fairness, if it is not a fact that when the resolution was submitted to the committee that the contestant was entitled to the seat, there were six out of nine votes against him? I will ask further if the three votes were not the Republicans, including myself, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], and our colleague, Mr. CODDING of Pennsylvania? Is not that a fact?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will answer the gentleman's question. Since the gentleman sees fit to go outside of the record as presented to the House by the reports and inquire of me, I have no disposition to keep any of the facts from the House. It is true as he stated. I was only giving the facts as disclosed by the record, which is before the House, and not the confidential features which were stated in the committee.

Mr. JENKINS. These facts that I now state are disclosed by the reports, are they not?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The facts of the vote against the contestant are naturally shown by the four reports. If one report is that there is no election, of course that is against both contestant and contestee. The three members of the minority of the House, joined by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CODDING], making five of the nine, are in favor of the contestee.

Mr. JENKINS. I asked the gentleman a question, in fairness, for the instruction of the House, if it is not a fact that six of the nine members of the committee have decided that the contestant in this case is not entitled to his seat?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I have not denied it. I admit that is a fact. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have disclosed, as the record discloses (because I say in fairness to my colleagues on the committee that what takes place in the committee room ought not to be mentioned) these four reports disclose what I state, that there is not a majority report of that committee upon any question except the bare statement that the contestee is entitled to his seat, because they differ upon the questions of law. And I say in all fairness to my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. CODDING] whose remarks will be read in the time of one of the gentlemen who will speak upon this case, that he holds to the law that the lists are memoranda, but he could not see his way clear to count enough of the memoranda to seat the contestant. And I say, Mr. Speaker, that upon the conditions that existed as we found them in this district, as I have detailed them, upon the best evidence that could be obtained in this case, showing the energy and diligence which has been displayed, within the spirit of the law, this contestant should be seated.

I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] almost concedes his case in his concluding remarks, and I want to read them in order that he may refresh his recollection and address himself to that point when he closes this case, and see whether he changes his ground in any respect.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. We are all pleased to hear this reference to the nonpartisanship of your committee, where three Republicans take one position and two Republicans another and one Republican another. I should like to ask the gentleman if the nonpartisanship of the Democrats led them to divide on any question?

Mr. NORTHWAY. O Lord, no.

Mr. OVERSTREET. As I have stated, their conduct in this, largely the same as in other cases, displays a complacency that is refreshing and a unanimity that we always anticipate.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] stated this:

> Substantial justice requires that broad, equitable, uniform rules be laid down for the determination of election cases.

To that doctrine I say amen, and urge that it be taken home in this case, and I ask gentlemen whether they can do exact justice upon the merits of this case, in the light of the evidence and facts, unless they seat the contestant. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] in his concluding remarks said:

> If what has been asserted in this case is true and can be proven, notwithstanding the contestee is entitled to his seat by a vote of the House, still Congress can inquire whether the State of South Carolina has a republican form of government. But the House alone can not make such inquiry. If what has been alleged and stated by the contestant is true, it is to be regretted, in the interest of good government, that it has not been proven. Freedom and purity of the ballot box must be upheld. No American citizen can afford to uphold fraud in elections, whether he be in the North or in the South. Matters are improving in the South. It has taken longer than it ought to to bring about the present state of improvement, and we can not afford to have it stop here. I trust that the South will fairly and honestly work out the great problems that have introduced themselves as a result of the war and do its part toward national unity and prosperity, which will never come until every American citizen enjoys unmolested his full political rights. The safety of the individual and the success of the nation depend upon a free ballot, a fair count, and absolute conformity to law. No one questions the loyalty of the South, but I want to say to our Southern friends that yielding to a lawful majority and obedience to the law will be the highest evidence of loyalty and fitness for American citizenship, and will largely aid in bringing to them desired prosperity.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that in the light of the laxity with which evidence should be taken in these cases, in the light of the common justice and equity with which we should conduct and try these cases, in the spirit of patriotism and fairness between man and man as to the protection of the ballot box, as to the right of suffrage, as to his privilege to have his vote counted fairly and construed justly, this House would stultify itself did it not look into this case as we have looked into it, and seat the contestant instead of the contestee. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, if there is any remaining time I wish to yield it back to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WALKER].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has ten minutes remaining.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. I do not care to speak now, and reserve that time.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, as was stated by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET], our colleague upon the committee [Mr. CODDING] was called away, and he has been unable so far to have published, either in the RECORD or in the usual way, his views upon this case. He left them with me, and I now send them to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Fifty-fourth Congress, first session. House of Representatives. To accompany Report No. 1229.

THOMAS B. JOHNSTON vs. J. WILLIAM STOKES.

Mr. CODDING, from the Committee on Elections No. 3, submitted the following views:

In concurring fully with the resolutions submitted by the committee in this case, I am compelled to dissent from the reasoning by which the result is reached. The value given to the so-called "lists" has my approval. They are memoranda only, and worthy of consideration when by competent evidence the parties named are proven to be voters, present at their proper voting places for the purpose of voting for the contestant and illegally rejected. To go further than this is to establish a rule, in my opinion, incorrect and dangerous.

The report of the majority ignores the fact that many lists are supported by evidence possessing the qualities named. I shall not go into details. It is sufficient to say that, after a careful examination of the lists and evidence for every precinct in the Seventh Congressional district of South Carolina, I can not find rejected votes enough to sustain the claim of the contestant.

In dissenting from the conclusions of the minority of our committee I find a general line of reasoning, excellently presented by Mr. OVERSTREET, in which I gladly concur. But it goes too far. No authority quoted sustains the result. To adopt the computation is to give to the "lists" an importance at once startling and revolutionary.

The minority report proposes to award the seat to Colonel Johnston by a majority of 233. It will illustrate my convictions, and if correct, dissipate the majority, to refer only to the following precincts:

	Votes.
Bells Crossroads. (Record, page 93. Report, page 47)	86

In these cases, selected almost at random, the evidence discloses not one word of citizenship or any ordinary qualification. The names are those of persons "rejected to vote," "objected from voting," "rejected from voting." No more, no less. Much as I regret it, I can not concur in counting lists supported, or rather unsupported, by such evidence.

JAMES H. CODDING.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I thought it no more than fair to Mr. CODDING, as well as to the members of the House, that his statement of his views should be presented and printed in the RECORD for the information of such as may choose to read it. I need not say with respect to this gentleman what all who are acquainted with him know, that he is an exceedingly able and fair-minded man, and an excellent lawyer.

Mr. Speaker, as stated by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET], there are three general views entertained of this case: The view that the contestee ought to retain his seat; the view, very ably advocated by the gentleman from Indiana, that the contestant ought to be awarded the seat; and the view expressed briefly on pages 14 and 15 of the report, by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], our honored chairman, that the House, instead of deciding that either of these candidates is entitled to the seat, ought to declare that there was no election deserving to be respected as such, and send the matter back for the further consideration and decision of the people of the Seventh district of South Carolina. There are about this case (as is true, I believe, of every case) some peculiarities of its own. The persons rejected when offering to vote were rejected largely because they had not complied with the requirements of a registration law the constitutionality of which was exhaustively discussed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] a few days ago, and discussed at less length but very clearly by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] to-day.

It is enough for me to say, as to the question of the constitutionality of that law, that while different members of the committee have different opinions as to some provisions in it, we all concur in the view that it was and is an unconstitutional law. Further, we all came to the conclusion that, this being an unconstitutional law, the question presented to the House is the question of what ought to be done in view of the fact that that unconstitutional law was upon the statute book and was observed in the conduct of the election last November. There is surely a difference between the conduct of officers observing a law binding upon them, but deemed afterwards and elsewhere unconstitutional, and the acts of officers who, in violation of the law and apparently with the purpose of doing wrong for the sake of wrongdoing, deprive electors of their right to vote.

This registration law was placed upon the statute book of South Carolina in the year 1882, and was a law of that State up to 1894, when this election was held. While we deem this law unconstitutional, as I have stated, and as the other gentlemen who have addressed the House have also stated, it never has been so adjudged in the State of South Carolina. So far as the committee know, but two proceedings were ever instituted in that State during the twelve years of the existence of this law to test its constitutionality.

Those proceedings have both been referred to by the gentlemen who have spoken in this case. Both were brought since the last election. One was before the supreme court of the State of South Carolina, which held that it had not jurisdiction of the matter; that the question did not properly arise in the case presented. The chief justice of that court, however, gave an opinion to the effect that the law, for reasons which he stated, was unconstitutional. The other proceeding was in the Federal court, where Judge Goff pronounced a similar decision; but upon appeal to a higher court it was determined that he was without jurisdiction of the matter. Therefore we have virtually and actually only the opinions of these two distinguished jurists upon the question of the constitutionality of this law.

Now, in the twelve years from 1882 up to and including 1894, the time when this election was held, so far as the committee is advised—I think I am not wrong about this—the constitutionality of the law was never called in question in the way of submitting it to any tribunal in South Carolina. The election of 1894 was held with that law upon the statute book, as it had been for twelve years, the question of its constitutionality not even having arisen up to that time in any court, although the law itself provides abundant means by which any person who is denied the right to register or vote may appeal to the courts and get a decision. Then, when the time came for holding the election in November, 1894, for these election officers (managers of election they are called in South Carolina), this registration law was law, and these officers, in trying to observe the requirements of that law and to enforce its provisions, were certainly doing their duty. It was not for them, when the law had been in full force and effect and no question made about it for twelve years, to set themselves up as a supreme court or as any power high enough to declare that it was an unconstitutional law or to admit to suffrage persons not qualified to vote under that law.

Now, the first point I make about that—and I do not care to dwell longer upon it—is that the decision by which persons offering to vote were excluded from voting was a decision under the law and in accordance with the law. In that respect this case is different, I believe, from any other that has heretofore been before this House; and to some extent the questions which arise, in view of the fact that the committee concludes that the law was unconstitutional, are novel.

Now, another fact which I think I may safely state, and challenge the record for contradiction, is, that the election was fairly held. I do not mean that there were no errors committed; but I mean that in a general way, speaking of the election as a whole, the record is substantially void of any evidence tending to show fraud or intentional wrongdoing or oppression or misconduct on the part of the election officers.

The fact simply was that they had a registration law which they had had for twelve years; that persons who did not comply with that law by securing registration, in large part, I think, did not apply to vote, and those who did apply to vote were excluded from voting because they had not complied with the law. But in the conduct of the officers throughout there was good faith and an attempt to observe the law.

Having concluded, as the committee did conclude, that this registration law—and I will not go into its details; as I said, some may think it unconstitutional in one particular and some in another, some to this extent and some to that; but I simply treat it as an unconstitutional law so far as the consideration of this case goes, in order to shorten the matter—this unconstitutional law thus hampered the suffrage, as it unquestionably did, what was the duty of the committee, what is the duty of the House, what would be a proper decision and disposition of this case upon the facts and according to law? That is the simple question submitted to the House.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. In the event that this act which the gentleman has been discussing should be held unconstitutional, would there then exist in South Carolina any legal method of providing the machinery for the holding of the election?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Oh, yes. There is a considerable body of law, independent of the registration features. The unconstitutionality of the registration law had the effect undoubtedly to keep persons from voting who could vote if that law had not been upon the statute book, and who probably would have applied to vote had it not been there, and who undoubtedly, had it not been there, would have been permitted to vote, whereas when some of them applied they were denied that right. The law undoubtedly had that effect. In other words, a man who had not a registration certificate could not vote. If a man without a registration certificate applied to vote, the election officers rejected his vote, as under the law they were bound to do. Probably, men not having registration certificates, in many instances, did not apply to vote, because they understood that they would be rejected and could not vote—did not have the right under the law to vote. That being the case, the question arises, what should the House do with this particular contest? That there could be held an election, throwing out all this registration law, is a clear proposition from an examination of the whole body of the law. Whether the election which was held should be respected, or whether it should be declared that owing to the obstruction of this unconstitutional law the House concludes that there was no such election as to entitle anyone to the seat in controversy is a question which naturally arises in this case.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is really the question in the case; and with all due deference to my friend from Indiana, who made an able presentation of his view of the case and the view of those who concur with him, I think the question before the House is whether the contestee should hold his seat or whether the whole matter should be sent back to the people of the Seventh district of South Carolina to determine by another election, without the obstruction of an unconstitutional law, who shall be their Representative in Congress. To my mind, as I shall endeavor to explain a little further on, according to the law, according to the precedents—according to the value of this case itself as a precedent—there can be no just contention that the contestant ought to be awarded this seat.

Now, then, what shall be done? If there was enough of an election, if there was enough of valid election law, if the condition of things was such and the result such, under all the evidence, that the House believes the result would probably have been the same had this registration law been out of the way, then the contestee ought surely to hold his seat.

The contestant, after the correction made by counting some votes excluded by the legal canvassers and counted by the State canvassing board, and unanimously conceded by the committee—the contestant has, I believe, some 4,275 fewer votes than the contestee.

Then how can there be gathered together enough votes—gathered together under the law and the evidence, with due regard to the merits of this case and to the value of our decision with respect to other cases that may arise anywhere at any time—how can there be gathered together enough votes to be counted for the contestant which, added to the vote actually cast for him, will entitle him to the seat? I do not believe it can properly be done.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for an inquiry?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Certainly.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The gentleman will admit that other laws have been enacted by the State of South Carolina since the last election?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I understand that is true. I have not seen them.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Then, if this case was sent back, if a new election was ordered, would it not have to be held under the new law?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Certainly; under the law as it is. I understand the laws have been changed since the last election.

Mr. OVERSTREET. And under that law is not there an educational qualification fixed by the constitution?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I really have never read a line either of the new constitution or the new law of the State, and I can not answer the gentleman from personal knowledge.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. If the gentleman from Missouri will allow me, I have the section of the constitution here.

Mr. DE ARMOND. It is immaterial. I am not trying to discuss the case on that basis, but as it is.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. I thought it well to put this citation in there.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I do not care to go into that question at this time.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana and those who agree with him in regard to this case, according to their view of the question, have counted enough votes for the contestant in addition to those he received to give him a plurality, as stated in their report, of 233. Now, what is necessary, first? If you are going to count as voting persons who did not vote what is necessary to lay the foundation, to establish the groundwork, in order to enable you to count such votes? It would seem that the persons to be counted as voting ought to be shown by the evidence to have all of the qualifications necessary under the South Carolina constitution and law for voters—the qualifications which a voter in South Carolina in November, 1894, ought to have had and was required to have, excluding the requirements of their registration law.

I think there can be no dispute as to that point. How is it to be shown? It must be shown in some manner, I submit, by competent testimony. It is not a thing to be presumed; it is not something to be guessed at. In order to vote enough of these persons to change the result of the election in question—and these gentlemen proceed on the theory that there was an election in which the House can carry out something that was not entirely accomplished in South Carolina by declaring the election of one of the gentlemen who were parties to the contest—in order to vote enough of them to change the result of that election, it is necessary to have cast for Mr. Johnston, the contestant in the case, more than 4,270 votes which must be obtained somehow from the "lists" upon which he relies. How were these lists kept? What are the lists? I will read the heading which appears to the most of them:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The petition of the subscribers, citizens of the State of South Carolina, respectfully sheweth:

That your petitioners are over the age of 21 years and male residents of the county of Colleton, and the voting precinct of Walterboro, in the county and State aforesaid, and are legally qualified to register and vote.

That on this the 6th day of November, 1894, they did present themselves at said voting precinct, in order to vote for member of Congress, and that they were denied the right to vote.

That your petitioners have made every reasonable effort to become qualified to vote according to the registration law of this State, but have been denied an equal chance and the same opportunity to register as are accorded to others of their fellow-citizens.

Your petitioners desired and intended to vote for Hon. Thomas B. Johnston for member of Congress.

Wherefore your petitioners pray that you investigate the facts herein stated and the practical workings of the registration and election laws of this State, and devise some means to secure to us the free exercise of the rights guaranteed to us by the constitution of this State and the laws and Constitution of the United States; and your petitioners will ever pray, etc.

Now, in that is to be found the evidence in most instances, the evidence in large part, of the so-called qualifications of these people to vote. In order to count a man on the estimate made in these petitions you must conclude that he was qualified to vote under the constitution and laws of the State independently of the registration law. We can not ignore everything of law. This is not evidence, the heading of the various petitions "to the honorable Senate and House of Representatives," "to investigate the facts and devise some means" to secure to these people their rights under the constitution of the State and the Constitution and laws of the United States. If we were to conclude that the statement in this petition—and what a remarkable proposition it is—but if we were to conclude that the statement in the heading of the petition is sufficient to constitute proof of the qualification to vote of those whose names were signed under it and on sheets fastened to the one bearing it, either by themselves or by somebody else, still if you come to look at the real qualifications of voters under the constitution and laws of the State of South Carolina, independently of the registration law, you would find some of the qualifications lacking.

There is nothing said about the length of residence in the precinct, nothing about whether the voter or would-be voter had resided in the precinct sixty days, or sixty years, or an hour. There is nothing whatever in regard to the negative qualifications. I will not insist that, as a matter of law, it would be necessary, prima facie, to show that a man was not under any of the disabilities imposed by the constitution or statute, as being a pauper or having been convicted of a crime, which disqualify persons from voting. There is no declaration of an offer to vote. The declaration is:

Your petitioner desired and intended to vote for the Hon. Thomas B. Johnston for member of Congress.

If question had arisen as to a single person offering to vote, and who had voted or who had not voted, and whose qualifications were called in question, and the testimony with regard to his qualifications were embodied in what I have quoted from these petitions, called "lists" sometimes, it would not be enough to show that he was entitled to vote. It would not show his residence in the precinct for the necessary length of time. It would not show that he possessed the constitutional qualifications.

But how startling, Mr. Speaker, is the proposition to call evidence of the qualifications of voters the heading to a petition! A large proportion of the persons whose names are appended to these petitions could not read, could not write, did not sign the petitions themselves—could not sign them. The petitions do not disclose the slightest design or purpose that any petition, or the heading of the petition, or anything connected with the petition would be offered or should be taken as evidence, here or anywhere, to prove anything. These gentlemen make certain representations by the heading of the petition to the Senate and to the House of Representatives, and ask the Senate and the House to investigate facts and "devise means," but not to seat or unseat anybody. There is nothing about any one of the petitions which would impress upon the mind of a person signing it anything of the solemnity that ought to attach to the act, that ought to have its effect upon the mind of a conscientious person if he were to understand that what he should then and there say was to be and would be regarded as the equivalent of testimony—statements on oath. Here are certain general recitals preliminary to a petition, and that is all.

I venture to say that never in the history of this House, never in the history of the Senate, never in the history of any legislative body upon this continent or upon the other continent, never anywhere has there been found such "evidence" or such complete lack of evidence of qualification to vote, coupled with such insistence that it is proof sufficient to authorize the counting of votes not cast.

Mr. TERRY. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Yes.

Mr. TERRY. Is that what is offered as constituting proof that these gentlemen offered to vote for the contestant?

Mr. DE ARMOND. That is what is offered in large part as proof of their qualifications to vote. There is one further thing about their offering to vote. The testimony varies, but with respect to a good many of them it is that after they came away from the polls, or at some time, they asked that their names be taken down upon a list, and their names were accordingly taken down upon this list, although the statement as to the time when the request was made is often vague and uncertain. It is in the heading of these lists, or rather petitions, that, according to the contention of the minority, the evidence is found that they were qualified to vote, and that therefore their votes ought to be counted.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. TERRY. I should like to make a suggestion right there.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I will yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. I ask the gentleman this question: Is not every vote that is counted by the minority of the committee counted upon the sworn deposition and evidence of the list keepers?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, what I am saying is that in very large part the only evidence of the qualifications to vote of the persons who are counted is found in the heading of these petitions or listt, as you call them. This is stated in the report. I read from page 29 of the minority report, submitted by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET], with reference to one county:

> An examination of the evidence as to Colleton County, part of which we submit herewith, justifies the counting of 1,039 votes for Johnston.
> The lists of voters taken at the various precincts in said county were brought into the record by the witnesses who took the declarations from the voters immediately after the vote was rejected, and in the vicinity of the polling place, the qualification of all of said voters whose ballots were so rejected being shown either by the heading of the petition or paper upon which their names were entered, or by the statement of the voter himself, for the paper, being signed by the voter or by one authorized to sign it for him, discloses the qualification and intention of the voter, and therefore becomes a part of the declaration itself; and, taken together, all constitute one and the same transaction, and each of said votes should be counted the same as if each of the voters themselves had come upon the stand and testified singly to the same statements.

Upon that rests the contention that the contestant is entitled to a seat in this House as the Representative in Congress from the Seventh district of South Carolina.

Mr. Speaker, I ask gentlemen who feel any interest in the case and any desire to get at the actual facts, and to pass their own individual judgment upon the law involved—I ask them to read that, as it appears upon page 29 of this report. All the reports are printed together, except that of Mr. CODDING. The evidence of the qualifications of voters, we are told by Mr. Johnston's advocates, is to be found in the heading of a petition to Congress to investigate matters down there, and to devise means to secure these people their rights; a petition that does not disclose a purpose to contest this election; a petition that does not carry with it a hint that the persons who signed it or who authorized the appending of their names to it ever expected that it would be paraded as testimony here or elsewhere.

Some one has a petition at the polls. In the first place, the chances are 50 to 1 that nobody would care exactly what was in the heading of that petition, because a man goes there simply to be listed, and the chances are 100 to 1 that a given voter would not know what was in the heading of the petition. We all know from common experience and observation how carelessly and recklessly petitions are signed. Here is a petition to Congress to investigate matters down in South Carolina and to devise means on general lines, and lo and behold, later comes up the same petition with its heading produced as the evidence that the persons whose names were appended to it were qualified to vote, and wished to vote for Johnston. Upon that kind of "evidence" depends the seating of the contestant, because, excluding that evidence—excluding those as to whose qualifications there is no proof but the heading of the petitions—it is utterly impossible to find enough votes, or enough persons regarded as voters, to seat him. Now, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] for a question.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will ask the gentleman whether there was a solitary voter challenged at the polls?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I do not understand the gentleman.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Was any voter challenged as to his right to vote?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I do not know anything about that. These men did not vote.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Now, if a voter presents himself to vote and is not challenged, is he not presumed to be qualified to vote?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I should think, Mr. Speaker, that when a person offers to vote and is not permitted to vote there has evidently been something transpiring at that polling place which would come within the ordinary meaning of the word "challenge." To challenge a man's vote is to suggest that that man is not entitled to vote. Here is a decision that a particular man is not entitled to vote, and yet the gentleman from Indiana asks me whether, when a man is denied the right to vote, there does not arise some sort of a presumption that he is entitled to vote? I think not.

Mr. WILLIS. If the gentleman will pardon a suggestion, I think I read somewhere in this report a statement that at one place 34 votes had been rejected under challenge, though I may be mistaken about it.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Now, Mr. Speaker, I pass to another point.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Is it not a fact that the record does show that nearly all these rejected voters were rejected for want of registration, or of proper registration, or of proper registration certificates?

Mr. DE ARMOND. A large part of them—I do not remember the percentage.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Where were they?

Mr. DE ARMOND. There are lots of lists of that kind—no evidence of qualification except the heading, which I read. Here at Preachers Mills is one, page 48 of the report. Recollect, Mr. Speaker, that in order to count in the contestant but few lists can be left out. But I was about to read from the views of the minority as expressed in this report, on page 59:

> At the several precincts in Berkeley County above noted the list of voters was kept in the same manner as in Colleton County, above referred to, and the declarations of voters made to the list keeper immediately following the rejection of the vote, and in the vicinity of the polling place, and the lists in this county were either signed in person or their names authorized to be signed at the time by the voter himself, so that the action of the voter and his statements to the list keeper, together with the statements in the paper which bears the name of the voter, constitute one and the same transaction, and entitle and justify the counting of the votes in this county to the number of 587 for Johnston.
> In Berkeley County, at the precinct of Biggin Church, as shown by the evidence of C. Holmes, at page 153, the names of 91 qualified voters were attached to the same character of paper herein referred to, and in all respects identical with the other lists mentioned, except that the intention of the voter is not shown in the same manner; but in this instance, as shown by the evidence of C. Holmes, the "voters belong to the Republican party," and inasmuch as Johnston, the contestant, was the candidate of the Republican party, it is by no means unreasonable to assume that these 91 votes were intended to be cast for the contestant, and for this reason we consider that they should be so counted.

Now, there are several hundreds in that category. The voters are qualified, according to this contention, by the heading of the paper and nothing else. The voter omitted to state in the list or elsewhere that he intended or desired to vote for Mr. Johnston, the contestant, but there is some testimony to show that he belonged to the Republican party and the minority say—and they are compelled to say it in order to get enough evidence—"it is by no means unreasonable to assume that these 91 votes were intended to be cast for the contestant," as he was the regular Republican nominee, and they count them accordingly. In the record, page 408, I find this:

> WASHINGTON, D. C., September 21, 1894.
> To the Republican voters of the Seventh Congressional district of the State of South Carolina:
>
> The National Republican Congressional committee have had under consideration, and have fully investigated, the contest over the regularity of the nomination by the Republicans of the Seventh Congressional district of South Carolina, such contest being between T. B. Johnston, of Sumter, and E. M. Brayton, of Columbia.

The committee make the following findings of the fact:

The appeal for the action of the committee, upon which it assumes jurisdiction, came from the members, regularly chosen, of the district Republican committee. Mr. Brayton, early in the transaction, made direct appeal to the Congressional committee for investigation and decision, agreeing to abide by their findings. Mr. Johnston, upon being notified that this appeal had been made, declined to submit the matter to the committee, but subsequently appeared in person, and has had repeated communication with the chairman of the National Republican Congressional committee. For full investigation of the facts in dispute the committee sent an accredited and trustworthy agent into the district, who has made full investigation and report.

Both the contestants were duly notified that on the 20th day of September, 1894, the committee would give full hearing to the matter. Mr. Brayton at that time appeared before the committee, and the investigation continued during the 21st day of September, full consideration being given to the claims of both contestants. Mr. Johnston was notified that if he desired further time the investigation would be continued until the 25th day of September, to which suggestion of further delay he responded that he would not be able by that time to make a showing.

The committee, having under these circumstances assumed jurisdiction, find that the convention held at St. Matthews on the 19th day of July, 1894, presided over by W. F. Myers, was regularly called, and that its proceedings were in every respect in accord with the customs of the party, and resulted in the nomination of Mr. Brayton, who is found by the committee to be the regular Republican nominee for Congress in the Seventh Congressional district of South Carolina. The action of the convention held at Jacobson Hall upon the same date, by which Mr. Johnston is claimed to have been nominated, was irregular as to call and as to manner of proceeding.

The committee, while regretting exceedingly the necessity for its action in this behalf, feels that the cause of Republicanism and good government demands its interference, and it appeals to those who have engaged in this contest to unite in vigorous and earnest effort for Republican supremacy, especially at this critical time, when the prospect for Republican success in the South is so well assured, if unity and harmony of action shall prevail.

The Republican voters of the district, and all who favor an improved condition of local affairs and of national control, are urged to unite in vigorous support, resulting in the election of E. M. Brayton, the regular candidate.

Chairman Executive Committee.

THOMAS SETTLE.

Yet, in view of that manifesto, the gentleman from Indiana assumes that Mr. Johnston was the regular Republican nominee, and that persons shown to be Republicans, who said nothing upon the subject, must have intended to vote for Mr. Johnston, and therefore ought to be counted for him.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Let me ask the gentleman if it is not true that, subsequent to the action of the national Congressional committee to which he has called attention, and before the election, Mr. Brayton withdrew from the contest, and not only gave his support to Mr. Johnston's candidacy, but stumped the district for him.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I do not know anything about stumping the district or giving his support.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Is not that evidence in the record?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I can not say as to that; but I was just about to remark that Mr. Brayton did afterwards withdraw. But I will read from the record some testimony bearing upon this point. On page 383 of the record I find this:

TONY JOHNSON (colored), duly sworn, says:

Q. State your name, age, and residence.
A. Tony Johnson; 34 years old; live in the city of Orangeburg, in Orangeburg County.
Q. Did you have a registration certificate, and were you qualified to vote at the election for Congressman on the 6th of November last?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you vote for Congressman on that day?
A. I did not.
Q. Why did you not vote?
(Objected to by Mr. Lathrop on grounds of incompetency and irrelevancy.)
A. I had no candidate.
Q. To what political party have you always belonged?
A. The national Republican party.
Q. Who received the nomination by the regular Republican convention for Congress in this district?
(Same objection by Mr. Lathrop.)
A. Colonel Brayton.
Q. Why didn't you vote for Mr. Brayton?
A. Because he had withdrawn.
Q. How long before the election did you hear that he had withdrawn?
A. A few days before the election I heard it, but did not know for certain until that morning.
Q. What kind of a candidate was Mr. Johnston?
(Same objection by Mr. Lathrop.)
A. He was with the bolting faction. I don't know what kind of a candidate he was.
Q. Were you at the Federal election poll at Orangeburg Court-house precinct on last election day?
A. I was.
Q. Did the colored Republicans at that precinct take as much interest in the last election for Congressman as they generally do when they have a regular candidate?
A. They did not.
Q. Have you ever moved your residence since you first registered?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you get your registration certificate changed without trouble?
A. I did.
Q. Were the colored Republicans satisfied or dissatisfied with the candidacy of Mr. Johnston?
A. They were dissatisfied.

So, on page 463, I find the testimony of L. A. Kizer, a manager of election at Holly Hill, to the same effect.

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the gentleman will refer to the testimony on page 347 of the record, he will find what I have referred to.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, let me remark in passing that of the persons listed in order to make up this plurality of two or three hundred for Colonel Johnston are some 700 persons whose votes it is claimed were rejected at certain polls. The testimony of the election managers at those polls shows that, instead of there being six or seven hundred votes rejected, there were less than 50.

Mr. WILLIS. Thirty-four.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Now, here is an interesting question presented to the mind of anyone who wishes to dispose of this case upon its merits. And I may say it is far more important in every view of the case, for the present and for the future, to dispose of this case rightly than to dispose of it with reference to what any particular individual may gain or lose for the time being by a wrong decision. The fact, if it be a fact, that these persons were present and were deprived of their right to vote is often testified as to tens, and twenties, and fifties, and hundreds, and several hundreds by a single person—a list keeper. A list keeper says, "Here is a list of 50, 100, or 250 persons who told me that they offered to vote; that they were not permitted to vote; and they put their names down or asked me to put their names down."

Now, one man will swear to such a statement as to 20, 30, 50, 100, or 250 so-called voters. Against the statement of that one man stands in the record the testimony of 1, 2, or 3 sworn election officers, to the effect that there were but a small number—perhaps half a dozen, probably a dozen persons—whose votes were rejected at that poll, and some of them Democrats. Six or seven hundred votes are brought in in this way—not by any person swearing that the persons had offered to vote and were rejected, not by any person swearing that they had the requisite qualifications of voters, but brought in by the head lines of a petition, with the statement of a body of names. I repeat that against such evidence we have the statements of forty or fifty election officers, showing that out of the aggregate of 600 or 700 less than 50 (34 I believe the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. WILLIS] has suggested) were actually rejected.

In determining this case one is compelled to reach one of two conclusions. On the one hand, he may conclude that the testimony of the one man who kept a list, and his list of scores or hundreds must be taken against the testimony of three sworn election officers that not a tenth and in some instances not a twentieth of the number of persons mentioned offered to vote and were rejected. If you adopt such a conclusion as that you may count in the contestant. If you proceed on that basis there is no use talking about evidence. If any sound rules of evidence are to be followed, then a case supported in that way must fall.

I find that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] has a different idea of what constitutes res gestæ from that which I entertain. The cases bearing on this subject, if carefully examined, will, I think, show that in almost all instances the declarations offered in evidence were the declarations of persons who actually voted, made at the time of their actually voting, or who actually offered to vote, made at the time of offering to vote. Now, let me read something cited by the gentleman himself upon that subject, as showing the law—and I think it is good law. It is from one of these election cases. I read from page 25 of his report:

The law is settled that the declaration of a voter as to how he voted or intended to vote, made at the time, is competent testimony on the point.

And the case of Vallandigham vs. Campbell is referred to.

The statement contained in the affidavits of these 19 voters—

Not the heading of a petition—

that they offered to vote the ticket attached to their respective affidavits, on each of which tickets the name of the contestant was found as a candidate for Congress, amounts to a declaration of the voter, which brings the case within the rule decided in Vallandigham vs. Campbell. These declarations are filed as a part of the res gestæ; and these declarations are supported by the testimony of the supervisor, who states the fact that nearly all of these 19 voters made these affidavits when they presented their certificates and with their ballots attached, and that they deposited them with him as supervisor on the day of election.

The objection that this is hearsay evidence, and that the deposition of each particular voter is the only competent evidence of the facts sought to be proven, is not well taken. The witness Butler does not prove what these 19 voters said to him, but what they did. There is a marked distinction between proof of what a party said and proof of the acts of the party or facts connected with what he did. In the first case it may be hearsay testimony. In the other it is testimony as to facts which the witness observed, which is just as competent as the testimony of the voter as to the facts in which he was an actor.

There are declarations which mingle and mix with the principal act so as to constitute a part of the res gestæ, and to be admissible as such. The voter says, "Here; I offer this vote; attached to this vote is my affidavit of my qualifications to vote; upon this ticket you will find the names of those for whom I desire to vote."

Now, in this case——

Mr. OVERSTREET. I know the gentleman does not wish to misrepresent——

Mr. DE ARMOND. No, sir; I have no such desire.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I understood the gentleman to say he was reading from the case of Vallandigham vs. Campbell.

Mr. DE ARMOND. No, sir.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Well, the gentleman referred to that case.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Yes; it is cited in the case from which I was reading.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The gentleman was, in fact, reading from the statement of law made in the case of Bell vs. Snyder.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Yes, sir.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I want to call the gentleman's attention to this expression, which is used in the case of Vallandigham vs. Campbell, and to ask him whether he adheres to that rule. The statement in that case is:

As to the declarations, most of them were made after or about the time of voting, on the day of the election, or soon after.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I will discuss that, too, although my time is very brief, and I have already occupied too much time.

Here is a sentence also in that same report, showing that these "declarations" are usually admitted as "admissions" or "confessions"—statements against interest:

It is sometimes treated as an exception to the rule, excluding the hearsay declarations of third persons, but generally it is put upon the ground that in elections contested because of illegal votes being received each voter challenged is a party to the proceeding, and therefore whatever he says about his own voting is an admission or confession.

Now, an admission is not a declaration. A declaration is an affirmative proposition. It is not a confession. When I say I am qualified to vote, that is a declaration. It is not an admission. It is not a confession. These declarations against interest in general tend to show disqualification. And their admissibility rests upon a familiar principle. But the gentleman from Indiana makes a statement about a past event, a part of the res gestæ. He claims that what a man says after an event is past is competent evidence as part of that event.

Something may be said after the main transaction has taken place and yet constitute a part of and characterize the transaction. That is true. It may be said when a man is full of the original transaction, when the act is clearly in his mind to the exclusion of other things, when it has so impressed itself upon him that he is simply characterizing what he did. But what is the connection here? What is done in this case? I offer to vote. My vote is rejected by the officers of the election. I walk down the street, meet somebody, or go to a list keeper and make the remark that I offered to vote and my vote was rejected. That is my narrative of a past event. It is no part of the transaction itself. What I said at the polling place, what I did at the polling place, what I did while the transaction was carried on—while I was voting or trying to cast my ballot—that forms a part of the transaction itself. What I say when I am voting or trying to vote would be a part of the transaction. But the story to the list keeper is a recital of a past occurrence. Its repetition by the list keeper is hearsay, not evidence.

In this case it is claimed that many men offered to vote who were denied the right to vote, and went up to some selected spot near the polling place, where the list keeper had a seat, and presented the facts to him. But there is nothing in that but a recital of past occurrences; nothing more and nothing less. In the Snyder case the affidavits were attached to the ballots. The voter says: "Here, I offer to vote this ticket. Here is my affidavit as to my qualifications"; and that was supported by witnesses outside and by the inspector of the election. The ballot was handed in with the affidavit attached; it was preserved in that form, and is in the record. What is equivalent to that here? Nothing whatever.

The qualifications to vote must be found before any listed person can be counted as if he voted. The heading of the petitions does not supply the proof upon that point. The testimony—not regarding the petitions as testimony—does not disclose to us, as to hundreds and thousands of those counted by the minority for contestant, a single qualification of a voter. Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but to count in contestant it is necessary to presume that persons who made no declaration of their intentions, but are said to be members of the Republican party, meant to vote for Mr. Johnston because he was the Republican nominee, when the evidence is to the contrary, as I have shown.

There are over a hundred pages of testimony furnished by the contestee. It shows that many refrained from voting because of dissatisfaction over the withdrawal of Brayton, the regular Republican nominee. Then it is shown overwhelmingly, if evidence is to be regarded, that six or seven hundred of the people counted here were not rejected at all; did not offer to vote, and were not rejected; simply did not try to exercise the right of suffrage.

I have been addressing myself, Mr. Speaker, at too great length to the question as to whether or not the contestant is entitled to the seat. To entitle him to it, I repeat, it is necessary to get out of these lists, somehow, between 4,200 and 4,300 names of persons who should be regarded as legal voters, who tried to vote for him and were prevented from doing so. The minority find the qualifications of most of them solely in the heading to petitions. In addition to that, they presume that some six or seven hundred of them intended to vote for Johnston (although there is not a syllable of evidence that they did) because they were Republicans and because he was the regular Republican nominee, when the evidence shows that he was not the regular Republican nominee. It will be found all through the record that these listkeepers testify they did not know whether persons listed. What was told to them and the petition heading must make Johnston's case, or he has none.

Such is the case submitted to this House. Of course, Mr. Speaker, having discharged my duty as well as I could under the circumstances by placing before the House my view of the case, I am done. I think no decision has ever been made in this House that will authorize the counting of these lists as votes for Mr. Johnston. No action of the House ever has sanctioned, and I hope none ever will sanction, such views of law and evidence as must be entertained in order to seat contestant. The law is not with him; he lacks necessary evidence. More than twice as many votes counted for him by the minority as, according to them, constitute his plurality are positively proven away by the witnesses introduced by the contestee.

Mr. Speaker, if I have any remaining time, I reserve it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

MEDICINE AND SURGERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 27th instant (the Senate concurring), I return herewith the bill (H. R. 5731) entitled "An act to regulate the practice of medicine and surgery, to license physicians and surgeons, and to punish persons violating the provisions thereof in the District of Columbia."

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 28, 1896.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This resolution will be referred to the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I present the privileged resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Committee on Enrolled Bills of the two Houses be authorized to correct the enrolled bill (H. R. 5731) entitled "An act to regulate the practice of medicine and surgery, to license physicians and surgeons, and to punish persons violating the provisions thereof in the District of Columbia," by striking out in section 3, lines 1 and 2, "1st day of July, 1896," and inserting "passage of this act." Also, in section 12, after the word "Columbia," strike out "nor to medical students who have matriculated in any medical college in the District of Columbia prior to January, 1895."

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. BABCOCK, Mr. RICHARDSON, and Mr. CURTIS of Iowa as conferees on the part of the House on the bill (H. R. 2928) relating to the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway and the Belt Line Railway Company.

The SPEAKER also appointed Mr. CANNON, Mr. HAINER of Nebraska, and Mr. SAYERS as conferees on the part of the House on the sundry civil appropriation bill.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 193) authorizing the Secretary of War to lend to the mayors of the cities of East St. Louis, Ill., and St. Louis, Mo., and vicinity, a number of tents; when the Speaker signed the same.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SHUFORD, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. PICKLER, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. ROYSE, for fifteen days, on account of important business.

To Mr. BROMWELL, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. MORSE, for ten days, on account of important business.

MRS. ELEANOR CARROLL POE.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the bill (S. 804) granting a pension to Mrs. Eleanor Carroll Poe Mr. THOMAS, Mr. CROWTHER, and Mr. LAYTON.

CHARLES W. REINHARDT.

Mr. STEELE. There is a matter on the Speaker's table which will take no time, I think.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following bill, with Senate amendments thereto:

A bill (H. R. 2054) to correct the military record of Charles W. Reinhardt, and to grant him an honorable discharge.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. STEELE. I move to concur in the Senate amendment. It strikes out the words "Secretary of War," a mistake having been made in supposing that the man belonged to the Army, instead of which he belonged to the Marine Corps of the Navy. Therefore the words "Secretary of War" are stricken out and the words "Secretary of the Navy" are inserted. The bill has passed both Houses.

The motion to concur in the Senate amendment was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. STEELE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

And then, on motion of Mr. JENKINS (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Also, resolutions adopted by the railroad commissioners of the different States, at a convention held at Washington, D. C., May 20, 1896, remonstrating against the proposed amendment to section 10 of the interstate-commerce act—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. HEATWOLE: Petition of citizens of Goodhue County, Minn., against the manufacture, sale, and importation of all alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Also (by request), petitions of citizens of Belle Plaine, Carver, Gibbon, Kenyon, Le Sueur, Pine Island, Red Wing, Renville, Winthrop, and Zumbrota, Minn., asking favorable action on House bills Nos. 838 and 4566, to amend the postal laws—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. HITT: Resolution adopted at the thirtieth annual encampment of the Department of Illinois, Grand Army of the Republic, at Cairo, Ill., May 13 and 14, 1896, urging the prompt passage of House bill No. 4339, to establish a national military park to commemorate the campaign, siege, and defense of Vicksburg—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. JOY: Papers to accompany House bill to correct the military record of William C. Kennedy—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. McCALL of Tennessee: Paper to accompany House bill to increase the pension of Minerva Haynes—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. RUSSELL of Connecticut: Paper to accompany House bill No. 8909, granting a pension to Esther Jackson—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WARNER: Petitions of citizens of Deland, Clinton, Arrowsmith, and Hammond, Ill., favoring the passage of House bills Nos. 4566 and 838, to amend the postal laws—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 29, 1896.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. McMILLAN, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2054) to correct the military record of Charles W. Rinehardt, and grant to him an honorable discharge.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 804) granting a pension to Mrs. Eleanor Carroll Poe; further insisted upon its amendment to the bill disagreed to by the Senate; asked a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. THOMAS, Mr. CROWTHER, and Mr. LAYTON managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate numbered 233 to the bill (H. R. 8293) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for prior years, and for other purposes; disagreed to the residue of the amendments of the Senate to the bill; asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CANNON, Mr. NORTHWAY, and Mr. SAYERS managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 225) to provide for the transfer of Fort Omaha Military Reservation to the State of Nebraska.

FREE PUBLIC LIBRARY IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. McMILLAN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1247) to establish and provide for the maintenance of a free public library and reading room in the District of Columbia, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same amended to read as follows: "In lieu of the matter inserted in section 6 by said amendment strike out all of section 6"; and the House agree to the same.

JAMES McMILLAN,
GEORGE PEABODY WETMORE,
REDFIELD PROCTOR,
Conferees on the part of the Senate.

H. HENRY POWERS,
A. MILNES,
J. W. BABCOCK,
Conferees on the part of the House.

Mr. HAWLEY. I should like a distinct assurance from the Senator from Michigan that the bill in no way sanctions or indirectly permits the proposition to put the whole expense upon the District of Columbia.

Mr. McMILLAN. I will state to the Senator that it does not. It simply leaves the matter of expenditures to be arranged for by each Congress.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the report.

The report was concurred in.

DISTRICT WATER-MAIN TAXES.

Mr. PROCTOR submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3279) to authorize the reassessment of water-main taxes in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same amended as follows: At the end of section 1 of the amendment add: "Provided, however, That where lots or parcels of land have been released from water-main taxes or assessments by reason of technical defects or errors in making such assessments, and where such lots or parcels of land have been sold by the former owner between the order of said release of said tax or assessment and the passage of this act, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall not reassess the same against such property in the hands of bona fide purchaser for value without notice of the failure to pay the water-main assessment on said property."

Also strike out section 2 of the amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 2. That where outside the city of Washington Potomac water shall hereafter be introduced said water-main tax or assessment shall be levied or assessed within thirty days after such introduction, and where Potomac water has been heretofore introduced the assessment or reassessment shall be made within ninety days after the passage of this act, and such levy, assessment, or reassessment on unsubdivided land shall be made on a frontage not exceeding 100 feet for each lot or parcel of land or premises into which Potomac water has been or shall be introduced and shall be considered in any subsequent subdivision of such property as having extended to a depth of not exceeding 100 feet from the front of said lot or parcel of land: Provided, however, That said water-main tax or assessment or reassessment shall be due, payable, and collectable on each lot or parcel of land or premises on and after the date on which the connection is made from the water main to said lot or parcel of land or premises."

And the Senate agree to the same.

REDFIELD PROCTOR,
CHARLES J. FAULKNER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

GEO. W. HULICK,
J. W. BABCOCK,
JAMES D. RICHARDSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

FORT OMAHA MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. SEWELL submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 225) to provide for the transfer of the Fort Omaha Military Reservation to the State of Nebraska, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same.

FRANCIS E. WARREN,
W. J. SEWELL,
E. C. WALTHALL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

E. P. BISHOP,
JOHN P. TRACEY,
GEORGE B. McCLELLAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the deficiency appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives, agreeing to amendment numbered 233 and disagreeing to the other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8293) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for prior years, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senator from Maine what amendment it is that is agreed to by the other House?

Mr. HALE. The amendment that is agreed to by the House is the conglomerate amendment that covers the French spoliation claims, the Bowman Act claims, and some other claims for which I have no designation. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked for by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. HALE, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. COCKRELL were appointed.

VETO MESSAGE—ELVIRA BACHELDER.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

I herewith return without approval Senate bill No. 147, entitled "An act granting a pension to Elvira Bachelder."

This bill provides for a pension to the beneficiary as dependent mother of "J. K. P. Bachelder, late a private in Company D, Seventh New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry."

On the merits of the case I am satisfied this mother deserves a pension. I withhold my approval of the bill intended to grant her this relief solely because I am advised that the law would be inoperative, for the reason that the deceased soldier never served in the Seventh New Hampshire Infantry, and should have been described in the bill as a member of Company D, First New Hampshire Heavy Artillery.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 29, 1896.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, in response to a resolution of the 8th instant, calling for information as to whether any counterpoise batteries have been constructed by the Government within the last eighteen years, using or embodying substantially the principle or plan embraced in, and covered by, the patent issued by the United States to Maj. Beverly Kennon, transmitting a report of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, on the subject; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting a copy of amendments suggested by the American delegates to the Washington International Marine Conference of 1889 to the act approved August 19, 1890, entitled "An act to adopt regulations for preventing collisions at sea"; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a draft of a bill prepared by the delegates of the United States to the Washington International Marine Conference of 1889, proposing certain amendments to the act of August 19, 1890, entitled "An act to adopt regulations for preventing collisions at sea"; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a petition of Wyoming Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, of Wyoming, Ohio, praying for the publication of the records and papers of the Continental Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition of Galesburg Division, No. 83, Order of Railway Conductors, of Galesburg, Ill., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the proper appeal from the unreasonable decision of any Federal judge in any case of punishment for contempt of court; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Galesburg Division, No. 83, Order of Railway Conductors, of Galesburg, Ill., praying for the enactment of a labor arbitration law; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a memorial of Aurora Council, No. 49, of Aurora, Ill., remonstrating against the continuance of the statue of Père Marquette in Statuary Hall; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PROCTOR presented a memorial of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in session at Cleveland, Ohio, relative to the Armenian outrages; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HALE presented petitions of 78 citizens of Portland, of sundry citizens of Gardiner, of 35 citizens of Monmouth, of 46 citizens of Albion, of 80 citizens of Newport, of 28 citizens of Castlehill, of 32 citizens of Deering, of 23 citizens of Canton, of 20 citizens of Pittsfield, of 20 citizens of Anson, of 37 citizens of Columbia Falls, of 16 citizens of Limerick, of 68 citizens of Princeton, of 30 citizens of Phillips, of 19 citizens of Island Falls, of 21 citizens of North Newport, of 33 citizens of South China, of 34 citizens of Norridgewock, of 42 citizens of East Thorndike, of 21 citizens of Skowhegan, of 16 citizens of Rumford Center, and of 62 citizens of Bath, all in the State of Maine, praying for the passage of the so-called Lodge immigration bill; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. QUAY presented petitions of 564 citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of legislation restricting immigration; which were ordered to lie on the table.

REGULATION OF BOND ISSUES.

Mr. PEFFER. I desire to present a petition of my own, verbally.

Yesterday evening at a late hour, as the Chair remembers well, I was addressing the Senate. A number of Senators were waiting for the conclusion of my address in order to transact some business they were interested in. In my haste to conclude early I neglected to ask the permission of the Senate to include in my remarks the date and title of a few bills that were pertinent to the line of argument. I did not discover my mistake until after the Senate had adjourned. I now ask permission to include that matter in my remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and leave is granted.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MCMILLAN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8469) to authorize the Baltimore and Washington Transit Company, of Maryland, to enter the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7469) for the removal of snow and ice from the sidewalks, cross walks, and gutters in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 151) relating to motive power on the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway, the Belt Railway, and the Maryland and Washington Railway companies, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2901) to incorporate the United States Annuity Company, of Washington, D. C., reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SEWELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2791) for the establishment, control, operation, and maintenance of the Northern Branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, at Hot Springs, in the State of South Dakota, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5393) for the relief of Lucinda Rickards, widow, and the minor children of John D. Rickards, deceased, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PROCTOR. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back adversely the bill (S. 1064) to fix the pay of certain noncommissioned officers of the United States Army. I will state that a bill covering the matter of this bill has already passed the Senate. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3610) for the relief of holders of certain District of Columbia tax-sale certificates, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. DUBOIS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1350) to make Commodore William P. McCann, of the Navy, a rear-admiral on the retired list, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. ELKINS, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3010) relating to the landing of any new submarine telegraph cable line or system in this country, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3771) for the relief of Stratton H. Benscoter, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SHOUP, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4872) to correct the military record of Homer C. McCuskey, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

PROCEEDINGS OF BOARD OF INSPECTORS OF STEAM VESSELS.

Mr. GORMAN, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring). That there be printed for the use of the Treasury Department, Steamboat Inspection Service, 300 copies each of the Proceedings of the Board of Supervising Inspectors of Steam Vessels for the years 1895 and 1896.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a bill (S. 3239) for the relief of the estate of Richard Lawson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORGAN. I introduce a bill and ask that it be read at length and laid upon the table.

The bill (S. 3240) relating to crimes against the circulation of lawful money of the United States was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any agreement or conspiracy, of two or more persons, one or more of whom is an officer, agent, or stockholder of a national bank, to bring about any restriction of the current circulation or any diminution of the volume of the lawful money of the United States, of any description, at any place or places in the United States, or to refuse payment to any depositor in a national bank in such lawful money, of any sum due such depositor, for the purpose of decreasing the volume or quantity of such lawful money in circulation or to prevent such lawful money from being put into circulation at any place in the United States, is guilty of felony, and on conviction thereof, in a district court of the United States, shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000, to be fixed by the jury who try the case, and imprisonment, to be adjudged by the court, for not less than one year nor exceeding five years, at hard labor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will lie on the table.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the consent of the Senate to make a very brief statement of two minutes, and then I shall ask unanimous consent that the Senate consider House bill 3282.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator not wait until the regular routine morning business is finished?

Mr. HARRIS. Of course, if the Senator desires, I will postpone my request until after the routine business.

Mr. HALE. I ask the Chair to enforce the regular order of routine business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The introduction of bills and joint resolutions is still in order.

Mr. WARREN introduced a bill (S. 3241) granting a pension to Mary A. Benjamin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SQUIRE introduced a bill (S. 3242) for the preparation of plans or designs for a memorial or statue of Gen. Ulysses S. Grant, on ground belonging to the United States Government, in the city of Washington, D. C.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. HANSBROUGH introduced a bill (S. 3243) regulating the salaries of printers, binders, and other skilled workmen employed in the Government Printing Office; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. WHITE introduced a bill (S. 3244) to amend an act approved August 19, 1890, entitled "An act to adopt regulations for preventing collisions at sea"; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORT ON UNDERVALUATION FRAUDS.

Mr. BURROWS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to send to the Senate, as soon as may be, a complete copy of the manuscript report of frauds arising from undervaluation submitted by Special Treasury Official T. A. Byrne and dated May 27, 1896.

REPORT ON RUSSIAN FUR-SEAL ISLANDS.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the Public Printer is hereby authorized and directed to print 2,200 extra copies of the report of Leonhard Stejneger on the Russian fur-seal islands, being article 1 of the Bulletin of the United States Fish Commission for 1896; of the said number of copies 500 shall be for the use of the Senate, 1,000 for the House, 500 for the use of the Treasury Department, and 200 for the use of the Fish Commission.

FUR SEALS IN BERING SEA.

Mr. HALE submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring). That there be printed 1,000 additional copies of Part II, together with its accompanying atlas, of Senate Document No. 137, of the Fifty-fourth Congress, first session, for the use of the United States Fish Commission.

RULES OF THE SENATE, ETC.

Mr. DUBOIS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a suitable person to compile a history of the rules of the Senate and of amendments proposed thereto; of the Committees on Finance and Appropriations, and of the general appropriation bills from the First Congress to the present session, inclusive, the person so employed to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate such compensation as may be fixed by the Committee on Rules.

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be authorized to have printed for its use such matter in the execution of the foregoing order as it may deem proper.

TENNESSEE CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION.

Mr. FAULKNER submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized to pay the necessary expenses of the committee appointed by the President of the Senate to attend the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the admission of the State of Tennessee, authorized by the Senate resolution of May 12, 1896, upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee.

ALCOHOL IN THE ARTS.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I ask the permission of the Senate to make a brief statement in regard to House bill 3282.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to make a brief statement in regard to the bill indicated by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, section 61 of the tariff act of 1894 was not recommended by the Finance Committee, but was incorporated in the bill by a majority vote of the Senate. It provides for free alcohol in the arts. The Treasury Department has found it impossible to make regulations for the purpose of carrying out that section of the act without greatly endangering the collection of revenue upon alcohol in all of its forms. Therefore no regulations have been made. There are many claims, amounting to many millions of dollars, for rebates upon alcohol which has been used in the arts since the passage of that act. There are 550 suits now pending against the Government to recover rebate claimed to be due these claimants.

This bill repeals that section of the law and proposes to create a joint select committee composed of three Senators and three Representatives, which committee is required to carefully investigate the question of alcohol in the arts and to report to their respective Houses upon the first Monday in December next their conclusions, by bill or otherwise; and it is to be hoped that upon such thorough investigation as may be given the subject-matter some provision may be made which will give free alcohol to the arts without endangering the collection of revenue upon alcohol.

Mr. PEFFER. Will the Senator from Tennessee allow a question?

Mr. HARRIS. In a moment. The Treasury Department estimates that the claims growing out of this section year by year aggregate not less than $10,000,000 per annum. It is very, very important that the section should be repealed and the subject investigated, and that a well-considered and carefully drawn provision in respect to alcohol in the arts should be made.

Mr. PEFFER. I wish to ask the Senator from Tennessee whether this bill makes any provision for such persons as are authorized under existing laws to have a rebate?

Mr. HARRIS. It does not. It preserves whatever rights they have, and these rights, if rights there be, depend upon the action of the judicial department hereafter. As to what that action may be it is impossible for me to say, though I have serious apprehensions that the question may be determined in favor of the claimants.

Mr. PEFFER. So they may present their claims if they desire so to do under existing laws and have them speedily adjudicated?

Mr. HARRIS. There is no question about any claim that has accrued up to this time or up to the time the section may be repealed. Their rights remain intact even though we repeal this act. It does not prejudice or affect rights already accrued, if rights have accrued.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate to make a statement as long as that which has been made by the Senator from Tennessee.

It is known, I think, that I have opposed the repeal of section 61, and the statement which I wish to make is to show why I now acquiesce in the passage of the bill.

I have felt for many years that persons engaged in legitimate manufacturing in this country, who are compelled to use alcohol, ought not to be compelled to pay upon one of the materials which enters into their manufacture a tax to the Government of from 700 to 1,000 per cent, and for many years I have endeavored to have incorporated in the statutes a provision which would allow manufacturers to have alcohol free, as their competitors in other countries do.

In 1888 the Finance Committee of the Senate reported such provisions, but the proposed law did not pass. When the act of 1894 was passed I was anxious that something should be incorporated in that act. Section 61 was incorporated in the act. It has not proved to be an operative law, but to my mind it established the principle that alcohol ought to be free in manufactures and should only be taxed when used as a beverage. Therefore I opposed the repeal of the section until Congress should consider whether some law could not be passed which would effectuate the object of section 61 without serious dangers of frauds upon the revenue.

The Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate, as it seemed to me, failed to give any attention to the subject, but insisted upon the immediate and unconditional repeal of section 61. However, since there has been coupled with it, in good faith, as I believe, a proposition that in the recess a joint committee or commission shall consider the whole subject and report in December, it seems to me that the principle for which I was contending is thereby recognized by the bill, and I have faith to believe that a proper bill can be prepared which will be acceptable to Congress and which will eliminate any considerable possibility of frauds upon the revenue. It is therefore that I acquiesce in the passage of this bill.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President, I would not resort to any obstructive means to prevent the consideration of the bill. I think it very seriously affects a number of my constituents in New Jersey, some of whom have gone into business for the manufacture of alcohol based upon this provision. As we all know, alcohol enters into the production and is the basis of pretty much all medicines and it is used in the arts to a very great extent. There is one firm in my State that paid last year, I think, $96 a barrel for 500 barrels of alcohol on the faith of the Government that there was to be a rebate. That is one of a number that I will not detain the Senate by mentioning. The 500 barrels amounted to $48,000, which went into the manufacture of one single article connected with photography. So we can see how far-reaching the measure is.

Alcohol is made to-day for about 23 cents a gallon. The tax on it is $2.06. The foreigner can get it for 23 cents, receiving his full rebate of $2.06, and there is no reason in the world why he should not outsell in every way our manufacturers on that basis. Our people will be driven out of our own country into the West India Islands or some other place to take advantage of the rebate on alcohol and be able to manufacture their products with alcohol at 23 cents instead of $2.29.

I think it is a very serious matter, but there seems to be a majority of the people who are bound to repeal the law. I look upon it as an act of bad faith on the part of the Government to induce these people to go into this business and then to wipe out their whole profits, you might say; and many of them to-day have their capital invested in this rebate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read at length.

Mr. DUBOIS. I ask unanimous consent at this time that a time be set for the final vote on Senate bill 1341.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senator will postpone his request until the Senate has disposed of this measure. It will not take long.

Mr. SHERMAN. It will take but a minute to pass the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Idaho in a moment to make his request.

Mr. DUBOIS. I am constrained to object to the unanimous consent asked for the consideration of this bill.

REGULATION OF BOND ISSUES.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope the Senator from Idaho will make a statement of his request. Let him state when he wants to have the vote taken.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will submit the request of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. DUBOIS. My request is that the vote be taken on the unfinished business—the pending bond bill—at 4 o'clock Monday afternoon.

Mr. HARRIS. Monday afternoon?

Mr. DUBOIS. Monday afternoon.

Mr. MILLS (to Mr. DUBOIS). The final vote, you mean.

Mr. DUBOIS. The final vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair submits to the Senate the request of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state the request of the Senator from Idaho. It is that the final vote upon the pending bond bill be taken at 4 o'clock on next Monday.

Mr. ALDRICH. And all propositions affecting the bill.

Mr. BURROWS. Whether that is agreed to or not will depend something upon the purpose of the Senate to remain in session to-morrow. To-morrow being Decoration Day, I suppose the Senate will adjourn from to-day until Monday. If that is done, then there would be no opportunity for further debate upon the bill except what time may be had to-day and on Monday. It seems to me that that would be a little short. I desire to state to the Senator from Idado that the Senator from Utah [Mr. BROWN], who has the floor on the measure, came to me this morning and said that he was so ill that it would be impossible for him to proceed to-day, and he would desire to take the floor on Monday. I do not object to the fixing of a time, but I suggest that the Senator fix Tuesday instead of Monday.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope the Senator from Idaho will name Tuesday.

Mr. DUBOIS. Very well; that suits me, as far as I am concerned. I ask unanimous consent that at 4 o'clock Tuesday the final vote shall be taken on the unfinished business—the bond bill.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, in arriving at a time for a vote it would probably be better to understand who intends to speak upon the question. If the Senate desires to vote to-day upon that bill, so far as I am concerned, I will make no opposition. However, I do not like to fix an hour. I have expressed my objection to that course in reference to other bills, and I do not like to have an hour fixed for the vote. I will, however, suggest to the Senator that, unless there are some Senators here who want to speak, we agree to an understanding that a vote be had on the bond bill to-day before we adjourn.

Mr. DUBOIS. To-day?

Mr. HILL. Yes; to-day.

Mr. DUBOIS. I will say to the Senator——

Mr. BURROWS. That would hardly be courteous to the Senator from Utah [Mr. BROWN], who has the floor and desires to be heard on the bill.

Mr. HILL. I expressly said unless there are Senators who desire to be heard, of which I knew nothing. Of course, we were assured at the outset that the friends of the measure did not desire to debate the bill. Yesterday a proposition was made——

Mr. DUBOIS. I am perfectly willing to accommodate the Senator from New York. I have no other desire than to fix a general time when we shall take the vote. I am willing to change the request and ask unanimous consent that on Monday or Tuesday, as the Senator may desire, a final vote before adjournment shall be had on the bill and amendments.

Mr. HILL. The difficulty is, we can not tell what is going to come up between now and that time. We may be engaged all the time in conference reports, or something else may intervene. That is the difficulty about it. I am willing, so far as I am concerned, to take the vote to-day, and proceed right on with the debate, if any one wishes to speak. The Senator from Utah, who is absent, wants to speak hereafter. That is, of course, another question.

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Idaho——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that it is impossible to hear the remarks of Senators. The Chair requests Senators to refrain from audible conversation.

Mr. HILL. I ask the Senator from Idaho what was the last suggestion he made?

Mr. DUBOIS. The last suggestion was that on Tuesday next the Senate shall remain in session until a final vote is taken on the pending unfinished business and the amendments thereto.

Mr. MILLS. Let us fix an hour. We do not want to stay here until midnight.

Mr. HAWLEY. Did the Senator say Tuesday?

Mr. DUBOIS. On Tuesday next, that the Senate shall not adjourn until a vote is had on the unfinished business.

Mr. HILL. That is entirely satisfactory to me except this, that an agreement to take the final vote shall not prevent a motion to postpone the consideration of the bill to some fixed day.

Mr. DUBOIS. Certainly not.

Mr. HILL. Before the final vote.

Mr. HARRIS. Of course that motion would be legitimate.

Mr. HILL. I want that understood as agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BURROWS. I only regret that the Senator does not fix an hour for the vote.

Mr. DUBOIS. I am not able to fix an hour, because there is objection.

Mr. BURROWS. It is exceedingly unfortunate that the Senate is without a system of rules governing such a case, and that it may be compelled to remain in session all night upon a single proposition.

Mr. HARRIS. There is no danger of that.

Mr. CULLOM. We will not do that.

Mr. BURROWS. I prefer that a time shall be fixed, but nevertheless I shall not object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair submits to the Senate, Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HILL. As modified by myself.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. As modified by the Senator from New York. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. It is so ordered.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I wish to give a notice. I simply desire to give notice that to-morrow morning, immediately after the routine business, or if the Senate is not in session to-morrow, then on Monday morning, I shall move to take up for consideration the joint resolution (S. R. 6) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of Senators by the votes of the qualified electors of the States.

Mr. HALE. There may be a conference report before the Senate at that time.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I hope there will be no conference report which will interfere with my motion at that time. I simply desire to give the notice; that is all.

ALCOHOL IN THE ARTS.

Mr. HARRIS. Did I understand the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] as objecting to my request to consider at this time House bill 3382, the free-alcohol bill?

Mr. DUBOIS. Oh, no, I do not object.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I renew the request that the bill may be now considered.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 3382) to repeal section 61 of an act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, which became a law August 28, 1894; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 61 of an act entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," which became a law August 28, 1894, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. That a joint select committee is hereby authorized, to consist of three Senators to be appointed by the presiding officer of the Senate and three members of the House of Representatives to be appointed by the Speaker of the House, which select committee shall consider all questions relating to the use of alcohol in the manufactures and arts free of tax, and to report their conclusions to Congress on the first Monday in December, 1896.

Said joint select committee is authorized to sit, by subcommittee or otherwise, during the recess or session of Congress, at such times and places as they deem advisable; to summon witnesses, administer oaths, print testimony or other information, and to employ such stenographic, clerical, and other assistance as may be necessary, one-half of the expense to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BRANDY FROM FRUITS.

Mr. PASCO. There is a bill which logically follows the one just passed. It was passed in the House in January and reported from the Committee on Finance of the Senate in March without amendment. Afterwards amendments were made to it in consequence of the bill which has just passed, but the necessity for those amendments no longer exists. I wish to ask that that bill be now taken up and put upon its passage. I think there will be no objection to it. It will take but a few moments. It is a bill in which the fruit growers of the country are very largely interested, particularly those of my own State.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be stated by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 886) to amend section 3255 of the Revised Statutes of the United States concerning the distilling of brandy from fruits.

Mr. PASCO. I ask that the bill be passed in the shape in which it originally came from the House of Representatives and as it was originally reported from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ALDRICH. The bill has the unanimous approval of the Committee on Finance, and there is no reason, I think, for the amendment. It may delay the passage of the bill. The amendment may be disagreed to as far as the committee is concerned.

Mr. PASCO. It was first reported from the committee without amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3255 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3255. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may exempt distillers of brandy made exclusively from apples, peaches, grapes, pears, pineapples, oranges, apricots, berries, or prunes from any provision of this title relating to the manufacture of spirits, except as to the tax thereon, when in his judgment it may seem expedient to do so."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment reported by the Committee on Finance will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the bill the following additional section:

SEC. 2. That section 61 of the act of August 28, 1894, entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," providing for the rebate, or repayment, of internal-revenue tax on alcohol used in the arts, or in any medicinal or other like compound, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. PASCO. All the amendments are withdrawn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments are withdrawn.

Mr. PLATT. No, Mr. President, the amendment about repealing section 61 is withdrawn, but I hope not the one about other fruits. There is a little amendment there.

Mr. WHITE. As already stated, the bill has the unanimous approval of the Committee on Finance. I do not suppose there would be any objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut were it not for the possible effect upon the measure in the other House. That is the only fear I have in connection with it.

Mr. PLATT. I desire to make a statement. Dates are not mentioned in the bill. There is a company already organized in the city of New York, with quite a large capital, intending, if this bill passes, including other fruits, to manufacture brandy from dates, which they will import and on which pay duty to the Government. Surely all fruits ought to be included. I do not desire in any way to prevent or endanger the passage of the bill, but I hope that that amendment will be adopted, at least provisionally, this morning, and then I will make inquiries and learn if it is likely to endanger the passage of the bill. The bill can lie over for a little time until I can make inquiries. If I were satisfied that it would endanger the passage of the bill I would not insist upon the amendment.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, this is a bill in which my constituency is very much interested. My colleague in the House, Mr. WILSON, by his energy and activity, secured its passage in that body. It came over here, and, without any consultation with the Senators from California, the Senators from Utah, the Senators from Oregon, or myself or my colleague, all of whom are very much interested in the bill, the Finance Committee added a number of amendments which would have destroyed it had they been agreed to. I submit that is unusual, to start with. It is not customary in the Senate to weigh down and load down bills of other Senators with amendments unless with the consent of those Senators. The manifest injustice of that proceeding induced the Finance Committee to take off the amendments and they are willing to have the bill passed as it came from the House. The House passed the bill without the words "other fruits," and I think the Senator from Connecticut ought not to ask for that amendment, especially as the Finance Committee has unanimously agreed not to press the amendment. The Senator from California has agreed that he will not ask for it, although he is interested in it. I think the Senator from Connecticut ought not to press that amendment, because through these various other amendments delay has occurred until now in the closing days of the session the passage of the bill will be endangered if it is amended at all. I shall certainly, so far as I am concerned, object to that amendment, and I hope the Senator from Connecticut, under the circumstances, will not press it. Let the bill go through as it came from the House.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Idaho has already stated the objection to the amendment. I do not think we ought to allow foreign fruits to be brought into this country, dried and preserved, and be converted into brandy in competition with the brandy from fruits produced in our own country. It seems to me that that is not within the scope and purpose of this proposed law. The measure itself is a wise one. It is to relieve farmers from the ordinary restrictions of the law applied to the production of alcohol or whisky from grains, etc. At the same time it imposes the same rate of duties upon brandy that is imposed upon whisky, but it simply relieves the domestic manufacturers from impossible conditions which are prescribed for great distillers.

The fruit of the country is perishable. It passes away in a short time. Apples and grapes and all those fruits have to be used immediately, and must be used mainly on the farm, at home, or near by, in small establishments. Therefore it is proposed that they shall be relieved from the heavy restrictions. But to extend this provision to foreign dried fruits it seems to me would not be within the meaning or purpose of the law. The action of the proposed law is simply to enable farmers and others to utilize their perishable products without being subjected to the severe restrictions of the law in regard to whisky.

I hope, therefore, the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. I supposed that this matter was fully understood by the Finance Committee when it recommended this amendment. There was a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, who understood the matter fully and recommended it; there was a letter from the chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Ways and Means in the House of Representatives, saying that it was intended that these words should be added in the House of Representatives. The matter was considered in the Finance Committee, and I supposed it was fully understood.

I do not wish, however, to endanger the passage of this bill. I do not believe the adoption of the amendment would endanger its passage. If other Senators believe it would they must pursue such a course as they think is advisable.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, there is this difficulty in the situation, entirely apart from the merits of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut: This is a House bill. If we amend it, it goes back to the other House; and even though the House committee should advise concurrence or nonconcurrence in our amendment—it would be immaterial which view they took on the subject—the question would not be a privileged one under the rules of the House, and the bill would go where another bill in which I am interested went two or three days ago, to the foot of the Calendar, and among those masses of forgotten things which are only the subject of memory and regret.

Mr. PASCO. I hope the Senator from Connecticut will not urge his amendment. He will doubtless remember that when this bill was first reported from the Committee on Finance on the 17th of March it came without any amendment, exactly as it passed the House of Representatives; and now if the amendment should be made at this late hour of the session, when the final passage of the bill may be prevented by it, the fruit growers all over the country may be deprived of the very great advantage which would come from the passage of this bill. We are in the season when fruits are maturing; we are in the season when this bill will be of great practical benefit to the fruit growers.

Mr. PLATT. Let it go. I will try to take care of the matter in some other way.

Mr. PASCO. I am much obliged to the Senator.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PLATT subsequently said: I ask leave to introduce a joint resolution. It is important that the joint resolution should be introduced this afternoon.

The joint resolution (S. R. 154) relating to fruit brandies was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

ADJOURNMENT OVER DECORATION DAY.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

VISITORS TO ANNAPOLIS.

Mr. HALE. In the condition of the business of the Senate and in the view of a near adjournment, I find that it will be impossible for me to attend the meeting of the Board of Visitors at the Naval Academy at Annapolis, to which place I have been kindly assigned by the Chair. For that reason I make my declination of that appointment.

Mr. BACON. For the reason stated by the Senator from Maine in his case I am also laboring under a similar embarrassment, very much to my regret, and I beg the Chair to excuse me from performing the duty assigned me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT subsequently appointed Mr. GIBSON and Mr. BURROWS members of the Board of Visitors on the part of the Senate to attend the next annual examination of cadets at the Naval Academy at Annapolis, Md., under the requirements of the act of February 14, 1879.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] was appointed as one of the conferees on the part of the Senate on the Post-Office appropriation bill. As he has been called from the city, I ask that he be excused from further service on the committee, and that the Chair be authorized to fill the vacancy.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the Senator from Kentucky will be excused from further service on the conference committee, and the Chair will appoint the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] to fill the vacancy.

MONONGAHELA RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. QUAY. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3071) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Monongahela River from the borough of Braddock to the township of Mifflin, Pa.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 2, line 5, after the word "receive," to insert "such"; and in line 6, after the word "therefor," to insert "as may be approved from time to time by the Secretary of War"; so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That said bridge may be constructed to provide for the passage of railway trains, street cars, wagons, and vehicles of all kinds, for the transit of animals, foot passengers, and of commercial travel and communication. The said corporation may charge and receive such reasonable tolls therefor as may be approved from time to time by the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 7, after the word "Duquesne," to insert "Bridge"; so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That any bridge built under this act and subject to its limitations shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post route, and it shall enjoy the rights and privileges of other post roads in the United States: Provided, That the United States may construct a postal telegraph over said bridge without charge therefor: And provided also, That the said Braddock and Duquesne Bridge Company shall not commence the construction of its bridge, bridge piers, abutments, causeways, and other works over or in said Monongahela River until the location and plan of same shall have been submitted to and approved by the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after section 5, to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 6. That all railroad or street-car companies desiring the use of the bridge authorized by this act shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges relative to the passage of trains or cars over the same, and over the approaches thereto, upon the payment of a reasonable compensation for such use; and in case the owner or owners of such bridge and the several companies, or any one of them, desiring such use shall fail to agree upon the sum or sums to be paid, and upon rules and conditions to which each shall conform in using said bridge, all matters at issue between them shall be decided by the Secretary of War upon a hearing of the allegations and proofs of the parties; and equal privileges in the use of said bridge shall be granted to all telegraph and telephone companies.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to the end of the bill the following as a new section;

SEC. 8. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. 225) to provide for the lease of Fort Omaha Military Reservation to the State of Nebraska;

A bill (H. R. 2777) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to donate condemned cannon and condemned cannon balls to certain posts of the Grand Army of the Republic;

A bill (H. R. 3279) to authorize the reassessment of water-main taxes or assessments in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 5731) to regulate the practice of medicine and surgery, to license physicians and surgeons, and to punish persons violating the provisions thereof in the District of Columbia.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I now ask to have the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the conference report on the bill indicated by the Senator from South Dakota.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the conference report on the bill (H. R. 6249) making appropriations for current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, in the Indian appropriation bill of 1893 the Senate provided for the appointment by the President of a Commission to treat with the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory for the cession of a portion of their lands or for a division of the lands among the Indians by allotment. That provision was pure legislation upon an entirely different subject from anything considered or provided for in the bill. It was adopted by the Senate. This Commission went to the Indian Territory and undertook to negotiate with those people, and after spending about two years' time they reported that they found it impossible to carry out any of the provisions of the law under which they were appointed; that it was impossible to treat with those Indians; that they refused to meet with the Commission, and that they have, in fact, given the Commission to understand distinctly in so many words that their presence was not desired in that country. The Commission inform us that as the act now stands there is nothing which they can do, no function which they can perform. In view of those facts the Senate amended the Indian appropriation bill and incorporated into it this provision:

For salaries and expenses of the Commissioners appointed under acts of Congress approved March 3, 1893, and March 2, 1895, to negotiate with the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, the sum of $40,000, to be immediately available; and said Commission is directed to continue the exercise of the authority already conferred upon them by law and endeavor to accomplish the objects heretofore prescribed to them and report from time to time to Congress.

When the conference committee of the two Houses met and considered this provision it was urged on the part of the other House that it was absolutely useless and unnecessary to continue the Commission without duties to perform and that the existing law could not be carried out. The Committee on Indian Affairs of this body and the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House of Representatives have frequently talked with these Commissioners, and they have asserted that there was nothing they could accomplish as the law now stands. They thereupon prepared and suggested to the committee legislation which would give them power sufficient to accomplish something. That the necessity exists there can be no question. The conference committee, in view of the difficult and complicated questions which surrounded those people, decided to take a step in the direction of breaking up the lawlessness and want of government and protection of life and property in the Indian Territory, and we undertook to do it without encroaching upon any of the treaties and without a violation of any of the property rights of those people. Therefore the committee provided that this Commission, if continued in power, should have authority to make up a roll of those people. Some one had to make up such a roll. Heretofore the roll has been approved by the Secretary of the Interior. We have taken arbitrary powers in this direction.

We therefore provided that the Commission should make up a roll of those people and determine who were citizens of those tribes. Under the treaty of 1866 it had been provided that friendly Indians, to a certain extent limited in number, might settle among those people and become members of the tribes, and that those who had been slaves previous to that time should be admitted to citizenship, and yet their rights had been denied by the Indians who occupied that country. So we provide that this Commission shall make up a roll, considering the treaty of 1866 and all the laws and former rolls of those people, and report who are citizens of that country.

We further provided that they should make up a list of leases which had been made, and report to Congress the number of the leases, the amount and value of the property involved, who made the leases, to whom the lease money was paid, and to report that fact also to Congress.

Now, it seems to me that the conference committee came clearly within the provisions of the rule as heretofore enforced and practiced in this body. The Senate provided that the Commission, with certain powers, should continue, and made an appropriation to carry out those provisions. The conference committee simply enlarged and defined those powers, and, in my opinion, added nothing to what the Commission could perform, except the ratification of the roll, even if we had not made this enactment.

I propose, Mr. President, to show that the conference committee has not violated the precedents of this body on this subject, but, on the contrary, that it has been the custom in conference committees to enact legislation where there was less ground for it than there is in this case. But even if this were not true, I shall undertake to show that the great necessity of some legislation in connection with these tribes of Indians justifies the course pursued by the conference committee.

In the Indian appropriation bill of last year, on page 86, as the bill passed the Senate, there is this provision:

For collecting and transportation of pupils to and from Indian schools and also for the transportation of Indian pupils from all the Indian schools and placing of them, with the consent of their parents, under the care and control of such suitable white families as may in all respects be qualified to give such pupils moral, industrial, and educational training, under arrangements in which their proper care, support, and education shall be in exchange for their labor, $40,000.

Now comes amendment numbered 199:

Of which amount the sum of $8,000 shall be immediately available.

Here is the conference report:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 199, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Add at the end of said amendment, as a new paragraph, the following:

"That hereafter no Indian child shall be sent from any Indian reservation to a school beyond the State or Territory in which said reservation is situated without the voluntary consent of the father or mother of such child, if either of them are living, and if neither of them are living, without the voluntary consent of the next of kin of such child. Such consent shall be made before the agent of the reservation, and he shall send to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs his certificate that such consent has been voluntarily given before such child shall be removed from such reservation. And it shall be unlawful for any Indian agent or other employee of the Government to induce, or seek to induce, by withholding rations or by other improper means, the parents or next of kin of any Indian to consent to the removal of any Indian child beyond the limits of any Indian reservation."

Mr. HALE. Did that amendment become embodied in the law, I ask the Senator?

Mr. PETTIGREW. It did become embodied in the law as the result of the conference report.

Mr. HALE. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that while perhaps no attention was called to it and it slipped through unnoticed, and might be to a degree objectionable, it is all in the direction of limiting the original proposition which was found in the bill the Senator has read from as it came from the other House. There is a difference between conference committees limiting the expenditure of money or the operation of a clause that has been put in either by the other House or by the Senate which is the subject of disagreement—there is a great difference between that and the enlargement and magnifying and introduction of new matters enlarging and magnifying, and I think that distinction exists as to the case the Senator has cited, although I would say in that respect that the only good reason why that should have been allowed was that no attention was probably called to it at the time.

Mr. PLATT. That was not a good reason.

Mr. HALE. That was not a good reason, but that was the only reason. I should think it doubtful whether, when the attention of the Senate is called to so much of an exercise of the limiting power in detail as was exercised there, the Senate would authorize a conference committee to do that; but it is in no degree, it seems to me, like the case now before the Senate.

Mr. PETTIGREW. There is no allusion whatever to securing the consent of the parents of those children to their removal from any reservation of any of the tribes.

Mr. HALE. No; but it is a limitation of the removal, which was the subject-matter of the original proposition of the House. It is a limitation, not an extension.

Mr. PETTIGREW. It was an appropriation for the transportation of Indian children.

Mr. HALE. You can not transport them unless you start them from their homes.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Then you provide by law, clear legislation, pure and simple, and nothing else, with regard to the consent of the parents, and going into details. There are a great many other matters of that kind. In this case which is complained of the conference committee simply enlarged the power of the Commission, and yet Senators rise here with great indignation, and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] talked about a cunningly devised change, as if something had been done which was unusual. I propose to show that this has been the practice.

Last year a clause was placed by the committee of conference on the Indian appropriation bill, and it became a law, providing that the claimants upon lands on the Crow Creek Reservation, in South Dakota, should go into the Court of Claims and sue in order to recover damages for having been removed by Executive order from that reservation—entirely new matter, legislation pure and simple. That has been the custom right along. Here is one of the most striking cases in the Indian appropriation bill of 1891. In this case there is no mention of any treaty made with the Sisseton or Wahpeton Indians, no mention made of any attorneys or any power of attorney, or any right of anybody to represent those Indians in any way as the bill passed the Senate. No one appeared here and claimed to be the attorneys of these Indians. No one appeared before the committees of either House, and the bill passed the Senate without any provision whatever, except simply ratifying an agreement made with those Indians for the sale of their lands. The report of the conference committee contains this provision, which was injected—absolutely new matter, legislation pure and simple:

Provided, however, That all contracts or agreements between said Indians, or any of them, and agents, attorneys, or other persons for the payment of any part of this appropriation for or on account of fees or compensation to said agents, attorneys, or other persons, unless the same have been made as provided by law and are yet in force and have been approved by the Department of the Interior, or have been made by and between citizens of the United States, are hereby declared null and void; and in such cases the Secretary of the Interior shall cause all moneys herein appropriated to be paid directly to the said Indians, and shall pay no portion of the same to their said agents or attorneys, and in no event shall a sum exceeding 10 per cent be paid to any agent or attorney.

That was injected without any reference to anything contained in the bill, with nothing to hang it upon except that we had made a treaty with those Indians for a cession of their land. In the same appropriation bill in 1891 we treated with the Indians in Oklahoma for the purchase of a large strip of country, and it passed both Houses of Congress. It provided simply for the cession of property and for an allotment of lands to the Indians. The conference committee inserted this provision as a new section. The report says:

And insert after said section the following:

"SEC. 15.—

Absolutely a new section, new matter, and the broadest kind of general legislation.

"SEC. 15. That before any lands in Oklahoma are open to settlement it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to divide the same into counties, which shall contain as near as possible not less than 900 square miles in each county. In establishing said county lines the Secretary is hereby authorized to extend the lines of the counties already located so as to make the area of said counties equal, as near as may be, to the area of the counties provided for in this act. At the first election for county officers the people of each county may vote for a name for each county, and the name which receives the greatest number of votes shall be the name of such county: Provided further, That as soon as the county lines are designated by the Secretary, he shall reserve not to exceed one-half section of land in each county, to be located near the center of said county, for county-seat purposes, to be entered under sections 2387 and 2388 of the Revised Statutes: Provided, That in addition to the jurisdiction granted to the probate courts and the judges thereof in Oklahoma Territory, by legislative enactments, which enactments are hereby ratified, the probate judges of said Territory are hereby granted such jurisdiction in town-site matters and under such regulations as are provided by the laws of the State of Kansas."

Then it goes on and reserves the school lands. Yet there was nothing in the world in that Indian appropriation bill as it passed the Senate upon which that could be hung in any way. It is simply injected there, and is absolutely new legislation, without any possible chance to excuse it at all, while in this case we have simply placed in the bill an enlargement of the powers of a Commission provided for by the Senate amendment.

This is not the only instance. In the bill of 1891 we opened an Indian reservation in Montana, and we injected a provision in conference, which, I think, will be well remembered by the Senator from Montana, which provided for disposing of the lands open to settlement in an entirely different manner from the way the Senate provided for disposing of those lands—absolutely another provision, absolutely another method, diametrically opposed to the method of disposing of those lands provided for by the Senate. No one, I suppose, knew anything about it until after the Senate adjourned.

These things do not always produce the best results, but how can any harm come in this case, where the matter is fully before the Senate, where everyone has a chance fully to discuss it, where the purpose to be accomplished is so absolutely necessary and important? I can cite many other instances of the same sort where we have legislated in conference, placing upon the bill in conference matters unheard of when the bill was before the Senate.

I wish to call attention for a few moments to the condition of affairs in the Indian Territory, which we propose to undertake to remedy. About 1830 we provided that certain tribes should be located in the Indian Territory, and that the land should be patented to them, and held for the equal use and benefit of every member of those tribes. We provided that without their consent white people should not be settled in the country, but that it should be reserved for the use and benefit of the Indians. When we made the agreement we expected that the Indians would keep it and we expected to keep it. As far as we are concerned, we have kept the agreement, but the Indians have not kept it, not through any fault of theirs, but because they have been overrun by men who have become citizens of the tribes, and who are, in reality, not Indians, but white people.

Conditions have changed. To-day in that country there are less than 65,000 Indians and 300,000 white men. Five different sovereign governments exist, holding legislatures, having courts, but enforcing practically no law, with no law maintained except the right of the individual to protect himself. The white people have no schools. There is no means of taxation by which they can be provided with schools. The Indians are governed by a small number of white people who have gained control of their tribes. The real Indians are driven back into the mountains and the woods and along the streams, many of them being wild Indians, while the property of the tribes has been acquired by the white men who have gained control of that country. There is no protection whatever to life and property, and a condition exists which would justify the United States in sending the Army to take possession of the country, ousting all semblance of government and preserving law and order. The Committee on Indian Affairs has petitioned the President—and I think the petition was signed by every member of the Committee on Indian Affairs of this body—to send a regiment of troops into the Territory at once, as the condition of affairs is intolerable.

The Dawes Commission, of which ex-Senator Dawes was chairman, examined the condition of affairs in that country, and I will read some extracts from his report:

All the functions of the so-called governments of these five tribes have become powerless to protect the life or property rights of the citizen. The courts of justice have become powerless and paralyzed. Violence, robbery, and murder are almost of daily occurrence, and no effective measures of restraint or punishment are put forth to suppress crime. Railroad trains are stopped and their passengers robbed within a few miles of populous towns and the plunder carried off with impunity in the very presence of those in authority. A reign of terror exists, and barbarous outrages, almost impossible of belief, are enacted, and the perpetrators hardly find it necessary to shun daily intercourse with their victims. We are now informed that, within the territory of one of these tribes, there were 53 murders during the month of September and the first twenty-four days of October last, and not a single person brought to trial.

In every respect the present condition of affairs demonstrates that the permission to govern themselves under the Constitution of the United States, which was originally embraced in the treaty, has proved a failure. So, likewise, has the provision that requires the United States to exclude white citizens from the Territory.

* * * * * * *

Corruption of the grossest kind, openly and unblushingly practiced, has found its way into every branch of the service of the tribal governments. All branches of the governments are reeking with it, and so common has it become that no attempt at concealment is thought necessary. The governments have fallen into the hands of a few able and energetic Indian citizens, nearly all mixed blood and adopted whites, who have so administered their affairs and have enacted such laws that they are enabled to appropriate to their own exclusive use almost the entire property of the Territory of any kind that can be rendered profitable and available.

In one of these tribes, whose whole territory consists of but 3,040,000 acres of land, within the last few years laws have been enacted under the operation of which 61 citizens have appropriated to themselves and are now holding for pasturage and cultivation 1,237,000 acres. This comprises the arable and greater part of the valuable grazing lands belonging to that tribe. The remainder of that people—largely the full bloods who do not speak the English language—are excluded from the enjoyment of any portion of this land, and many of them occupy the poor and hilly country, where they get a scanty living from such portions as they are able to turn to any account. This class of persons in the Territory—

That is, the full-blood Indians, whom we are called upon by our treaties to protect—are making little, if any, progress in civilization. They are largely dependent on those in control of public affairs, whose will they register at the polls, and with whose bidding, in a large measure, they comply without question. Those holding power by these means oppose any change and ask only to be let alone.

When payments of money are made to the Indians the Indians themselves do not get the money. The money is paid out almost in every instance and secured by the white men and mixed bloods who live among them.

Justice has been utterly perverted in the hands of those who have thus laid hold of the forms of its administration in this Territory and who have inflicted irreparable wrongs and outrages upon a helpless people for their own gain. The United States put the title to a domain of countless wealth and unmeasured resources in these several tribes or nationalities, but it was a conveyance in trust for specific uses, clearly indicated in the treaties themselves, and for no other purpose. It was for the use and enjoyment in common by each and every citizen of his tribe, of each and every part of the Territory, thus tersely expressed in one of the treaties: "To be held in common, so that each and every member of either tribe shall have an equal, undivided interest in the whole." The tribes can make no other use of it. They have no power to grant it to anyone, or to grant to anyone an exclusive use of any portion of it.

Let us see how this trust has been carried out. We agreed that we would hold this land in trust for the use and benefit equally of every member of the tribe. We have been powerless to carry out and fulfill that trust, owing to the dishonesty of the men who have gained control of those nations. I now read from the testimony, or rather the argument made by Judge McKennon before the House Committee on Indian Affairs, in which he shows, and he gives the names of the persons, that 61 persons have 1,500,000 acres of land in the Creek Nation under cultivation or fenced in as pasture lands.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That acreage is one-half of all that country.

Mr. PETTIGREW. It is one-half of the entire area of land belonging to the tribe, who number 15,000 people. The Perrymans received $25,000 in rent; Turner & Porter, $16,000; one of the Childers, I think it is the father, $6,000; another one $6,000, and another $3,000; Willison, Welden & Co., $3,000; Robinson & Chissoe, $2,000, and Bob Childers, $800; making a total of $61,800 received in rent by these eight persons from lands belonging to the Indians of those tribes.

The report shows that many of the Indians are unable to secure land fit for cultivation because it has been taken by the white men. Every one of the names which I have read is the name of a white man. They are entirely white, or have the slightest tincture of Indian blood in their veins. For the purpose of maintaining this monopoly and continuing to plunder the people, they maintain a large and active lobby at the Capitol. They have done so ever since I have been a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and they still continue to do so.

Aside from the vast pasture lands, aside from the vast fields cultivated by white men who are their tenants, there are immense mines of coal which are also leased by these people. There are towns of five or six thousand people where they are leasing the lots, and a very large fund is secured, not for the benefit of the Indians, but to enrich the men who have gained control of the government. Mr. McKennon says:

They say we have exaggerated the amount of crime committed there. It has been said that we adopted the statements published by a paper in one of the border States, written by some one who knew nothing about it. We have made no statement on that line. A member of this committee has in his possession a list, taken from the papers published in the Territory, of the murders committed since the adjournment of Congress on the 4th of March last—up to the present time, amounting to 200 or 275; I do not know the exact number. Reason will teach you gentlemen, however, that those were not all the murders that were committed there. This list does not contain all of them. Many were committed statements of which never appeared in print. No one man, no half dozen men, can go through the papers and get every instance of murder committed in that Territory.

* * * * * * *

About a year ago Governor Fishback, of Arkansas, addressed an open letter to the President of the United States—possibly you have not seen that—in which he sets out the difficulty that the State of Arkansas labors under in getting fugitives from that Territory. It is a city of refuge for criminals from the surrounding country.

Then Mr. LITTLE says:

There are robberies committed there?

Mr. MCKENNON. Numbers of them; almost of daily occurrence. It is hard to tell what causes the murders. They kill for any cause and without cause.

Mr. GAMBLE. What is the rule in the courts there in regard to the punishment of these crimes? Are the courts capable of prosecuting and convicting?

Mr. MCKENNON. You mean the Indian courts?

Mr. GAMBLE. Yes.

Mr. MCKENNON. I have not known exceeding half a dozen punishments for murder since I have been in that Territory.

And the Dawes Commission say that 53 murders were committed in one nation in six weeks, and not a single one of the offenders was brought to justice.

Mr. GAMBLE. So they really go unpunished?

Mr. MCKENNON. A number of them have come to my knowledge that were never prosecuted at all.

The statement has been made that there is no more crime in that Territory than there is in the States surrounding it. Let us see about that. I am going to give you the figures and I shall stand by the record. We will say, for instance, that there were 275 murders committed in that Territory.

Mr. GAMBLE. Within what time?

Mr. MCKENNON. Since the adjournment of Congress on the 4th of March last. Let us see the magnitude of that. I have inquired of the officials of my State (Arkansas) in order to determine how many murders would probably be committed in Arkansas during that time, and they have estimated the number at from 40 to 60, not higher than 60. The estimates were made by ex-Governor Fishback, Governor Clarke, and Attorney-General Kinsworthy, and I have talked to Judge Little upon the subject. No one has fixed the number higher than 60. We will take that as the number. How does that compare with the Territory? The Territory comprises something less than 20,000,000 of acres; that would be about 33,000 square miles. Arkansas has 52,000 square miles. If 33,000 square miles has 275 murders, 52,000 square miles would have about 423.

Mr. GAMBLE. But how would the comparison stand if made by density of population?

Mr. MCKENNON. I am coming to that. The population of the Territory will not exceed 400,000—

He has placed it too high, in my opinion—and that is a high estimate. The population of Arkansas is something over 1,500,000, about four times as many. If the population of Arkansas committed as many murders in proportion, the number would be about 1,732, or 23 to the county. Do you not know that if such a condition existed in Arkansas martial law would be proclaimed there for the protection of the people? That is not an exaggeration. Make your own calculations and see if I am not correct.

Here is a letter from William M. Fishback, governor of Arkansas:

FORT SMITH, ARK., March 7, 1896.

DEAR BASS: We have had two recent raids upon banks, one in Arkansas and one in Kansas, from the Indian Territory. They killed Director Goodwin in Warren the other day, and were chased back to the Territory 175 miles, but not caught. They killed Dorsey in Wichita, but were caught and mobbed. The United States Government is responsible for these murders, for it fosters the condition which tempts them.

Very truly, your friend,

WM. M. FISHBACK.

Hon. J. S. LITTLE.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator from South Dakota a question. This statement discloses a remarkable and perhaps horrible condition, but were not all of these reasons for the incorporation of this legislation on an appropriation bill urged at length and with force in the Senate when the proposition was brought forward on the appropriation bill? When the ruling was made by the Chair throwing the amendment out, was any appeal taken from that ruling? Therefore, was it not the sense of the Senate that the amendment or a kindred amendment should not go on the appropriation bill? Is there anything new, although what the Senator from South Dakota is giving is interesting, that was not given in the debate when the bill was under consideration in the Senate?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not know whether or not all of these facts were presented to the Senate. For that matter, it makes no difference.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to state that it ought not to be allowed to be taken as for granted that this is the proposition which was presented to the Senate before. That was a proposition which made the power of the Commission absolute in making the roll, and provided, in addition, for the division of the land in the Indian Territory, a measure altogether different from this one. This is a proposition simply to authorize the making of a roll, and when there is any dissatisfaction with the finding of the Commission, the action of the Commission is not to be final, but an appeal is to be had to the courts, and they are to determine whether or not people who claim to be members of the tribe have a right to be on the roll.

Mr. HALE. The advocates of the measure (I do not go into its merits; I appreciate the force of the statement that something ought to be done in a proper way and by proper channels) had the opportunity when the matter was discussed here to frame their amendment so as to avoid the point of order. They did not do that. A point of order was sustained by the action of the Senate, and no appeal was taken.

Now, the two propositions are not identical. Any man can read them and see that they are not identical, but the great feature of enlargement and expanding, by a new body of law, the power of the Commission is just as much contained in the amended report from the conference committee as it was in the amendment which was ruled out in the Senate. What is objected to is not that it has not a good case, but that it has avoided all other channels of legislation. It has avoided action by the Senate committee on a Senate bill. It has avoided action by a House committee on a House bill. It has avoided action upon an appropriation bill, considered in two bodies, and seeks now to come in here in this way, initiating legislation in committee. That is the trouble.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator from Maine permit me?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. I wish to state that the original legislation in regard to this matter was put upon an appropriation bill. When the Commission was enlarged during the last Congress it was done upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. By a conference committee?

Mr. BERRY. It was first put on here. The last time, I do not remember distinctly, but I think probably it passed the House as it was put in here, increasing the Commission.

Mr. HALE. It did, and was considered by both bodies.

Mr. BERRY. I wish to say to the Senator, furthermore, that the strip was disposed of and sold and the money distributed on an appropriation bill, and I never heard any objection from the Senator from Maine or anyone else in regard to the legislation. It has been the universal custom.

While I am up I wish to state another fact. I wish the Senator from Wisconsin to hear it, too. My recollection is that during the last Congress a conference committee in regard to the Indian courts in that country, of which the Senator from Wisconsin was a member, reported a substitute bill from the committee on conference enlarging the jurisdiction that was given by either House, enlarging the power, extending them. That was done by a conference committee, if I am not mistaken. The Senator will correct me if I am. They reported a substitute bill from the conference committee, and it was adopted by the Senate and became the law.

Mr. HALE. Was that a conference committee of the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. BERRY. No; of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not know that it is material to this question as to whether or not the Committee on Indian Affairs has performed its full duty in this respect. The Committee on Indian Affairs has had this question under consideration, and a great many difficulties in the solution of the question covering the Five Civilized Tribes presented themselves. We found difficulty with respect to title to their lands, difficulty in determining who are entitled to allotments, difficulty in determining who are members of the tribes, the danger of Executive disapproval, etc. After spending a great deal of time upon the matter the committee unanimously reported the amendment, which was ruled out on the point of order. It was not ruled out upon its merits. Certainly the Senate on its merits would never rule an amendment on this question out—a question so pressing for solution, involving the lives and happiness and property of so many people. It seems to me that unusual proceedings would be justified in order to reach and remove the difficulty. But no unusual proceedings are undertaken or proposed.

On the contrary, it has been the practice of the Committee on Appropriations in charge of the Indian appropriation bill to inject legislation before unheard of into a conference report and enact it into law. When we purchased the Cherokee Outlet, a large portion of Oklahoma, we provided in a conference report for the organization of that Territory into counties. In no place in the Indian appropriation bill had anything been said about the organization of counties. We determined their boundaries, their area; reserved lands for county seats; provided for locating county seats; and provided for an election to name the county seats. Nothing had been said about it. No allusion was made to it in the bill as it passed here. It was good legislation. It was conducive to the peace and prosperity and happiness of the people of that country, and it was well that it was enacted, and, if necessary, enacted as part of a conference report.

The legislation which we propose is a step in the direction of the solution of difficulties which have become intolerable. The life and happiness and the property of a large number of citizens of this country are involved in this question. For the Senate to reject the amendment, to declare that nothing shall be done for the people of the Indian Territory in the next year, will make this body responsible for the lives of innumerable people who will be murdered during the next twelve months. This is properly here, it is rightfully before this body, according to a precedent, and for the Senate to undertake to shirk the responsibility of enacting it, claiming that it is proposed upon a conference report, it certainly seems to me is cowardly and unjustifiable.

Mr. WALTHALL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALTHALL. I have listened with a great deal of interest to what the Senator has had to say in regard to the Five Civilized Tribes and the Dawes Commission. I ask the Senator if he will be kind enough to state the explanation of the last two paragraphs in the conference committee's report relating to the Sisseton and Wahpeton Indians and the Seneca Nation of Indians, which have no connection, as I understand it, with the Five Civilized Tribes or with the Dawes Commission?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I hardly expected that gentlemen who oppose this wholesome and just and proper legislation would shift the issue to two immaterial and indifferent matters.

Mr. WALTHALL. The issue was tendered by the conference committee.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The great question before the Senate is the question as to whether we will allow a condition of murder and crime unparalleled in the history of the world to continue. The Senate talks for hours about the wrongs of Cuba and the crimes committed by Spaniards in that island, about the danger to the life and property of our own citizens there, and yet it sits quietly by and allows a condition of things to exist within our own borders in comparison with which the scenes enacted in Cuba are nothing. There were 53 murders in one of these five tribes in six weeks last fall and no one was brought to justice and no one ever arrested. The courts at Fort Smith, Ark., and Paris, Tex., are crowded with criminals; 900 criminals were tried in those courts last year, and three-quarters of them were from the Indian Territory. Robberies are committed everywhere in the Territory; men shot down in cold blood and without any reason whatever; and yet the Senate of the United States proposes, because a step in the direction of correcting this evil is suggested in a conference report, to let that condition go on.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will tell the Senator from Mississippi about the two amendments, if that is the question he desires to have answered.

Mr. WALTHALL. That is the only question I propounded to the Senator, and I have had no reply so far.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will reply to the Senator. The two amendments to which the Senator refers have no relation to this question. The first one, with regard to the Sisseton and Wahpeton Indians, was adopted by the Senate and placed upon the deficiency appropriation bill. It simply provides, under the provisions of a treaty with those Indians, for the payment of their interest money. It does not appropriate a dollar, but under that treaty the interest as well as the principal of the money they received for their lands is to be disposed of under the direction of Congress.

Mr. WALTHALL. How does that find a place in legislating upon the Dawes Commission, with which it has no sort of connection?

Mr. PETTIGREW. It is simply following those precedents which have been followed heretofore, where a matter would be accepted by the Senate by unanimous consent. There is no justification for it under the rule aside from the fact that we have done these things. It has been customary on the Indian appropriation bill, as I showed a short time ago, to take up matters of that sort and dispose of them in that way, doing substantial and equal justice and harming no one.

The amendment in regard to the Seneca Indians is of exactly the same character. They have tribal property. They hold it in common. But the men who are bright and smart, who are almost white, the same as those who have taken possession of the Indian Territory, got possession of the lands on the reservation in New York. The real Indians are pushed back into the forests and mountains and are beggars. The amendment simply proposes to find out how much of the tribal property has been taken possession of by white men who claim that they are Indians of the Seneca Reservation, and to report to Congress. Can there be any objection to that? No appropriation of money is made. It is simply an inquiry for the purpose of protecting the rights of the Indians, the real Indians, of New York, who have been so grossly neglected by the Indian Rights Association, the association spending their time on Indians farther from home.

I can see no reason why those two items should lead to any excitement. They are matters that would go through this body by unanimous consent at any time. They are simply placed upon the bill as a matter of fair, substantial justice to those people.

Mr. WALTHALL. What is done by unanimous consent can be no precedent in a matter where consent is refused.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I am loath to believe that all this opposition, in view of the large number of cases which I have cited, has its seat in the desire of Senators to protect a conference report. Let Senators come out and discuss the issue and justify the conditions which exist down there.

Mr. HALE. What does the Senator think is the reason? He has intimated there is some covert reason that animates Senators.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not care to impute reasons to anyone. I say I am loath to believe that the reason is simply that it is on a conference report. It may be that that is the case with the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. I should like to have one point explained by the Senator before he sits down. I have listened with interest to his statement, which is very clear and is very forcible. Just before he was interrupted, or before he answered the question of the Senator from Mississippi, he arraigned the Senate for cowardice in sitting by and allowing the opportunity to pass to cure an evil so monstrous that he said Cuba had no comparison with it, nor anything else in the history of the world. Now, if that is the case, and here is so grievous an instance of wrong that has been going on for months and years, and the Senator arraigns the Senate now for cowardice in not passing measures to regulate it and to extirpate the evil, I in turn arraign the Committees on Indian Affairs in both Houses, in the presence of this monstrous evil that has been stalking before us, as the Senator says, for months and years, that those committees have not duly reported measures for the relief of this condition and for the cure of these evils and brought them in before the Senate and passed them as other measures, but that they have waited until six men get together in a conference room and initiate legislation. I ask the Senator to explain why the Committees on Indian Affairs did not pursue that course?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, if I have said anything that would offend anyone in the arraignment of the Senate in this connection, I am perfectly willing to have the words expunged from the RECORD. As far as the Committee on Indian Affairs is concerned, it has had this matter under consideration for several years, the question of intruders, and other questions. We found that those people had tribal patents. We found great difficulties in the way. We finally secured the appointment by a provision on the appropriation bill in 1893 of the Dawes Commission. We did not feel that we wanted to overrun or impose upon any class of people. The length and breadth and width of the iniquity that exists down there was unknown to the committee until we got the report of the Dawes Commission. The Commission have been at work some two years and a half. Last year they made a report. This last winter they made another one, corroborating the facts which they had gathered before. And now the committee came in here and was ruled out on a point of order in trying to take a step in the direction of curing these evils. We did not succeed because of the point of order.

That is the whole question before the Senate, clearly and fairly understood. Inasmuch as it is a violation of no custom, inasmuch as we have been in the habit upon indifferent matters of legislating with a conference committee, it seems to me that now is the time to correct or start to correct this evil.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me? Was there not an appeal taken on the question of order?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I did not have charge of the matter. I do not think there was.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There was no appeal taken on the question of order. The amendment was technically liable to a question of order. There is no question about that. Whenever anyone in the Senate chose to raise the question of order there could be no doubt that the amendment would have to go out on the question of order.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I wish to say further——

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator——

Mr. PETTIGREW. We have been met with all sorts of difficulties, points of order, objections, etc., in the committees of both Houses. It seems almost impossible to reach these people, so firmly are they intrenched behind the profitable plunder which they have secured from robbing the Indians who belong to these tribes.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator think that an entire session of Congress ought to be allowed to pass; that every other method known under the rules of providing for full discussion should be avoided, and that then the evil should be sought to be cured in this way? Does he think that is good legislation?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think the evil should be cured in any way that we can reach it. Have we reached the point where it is said, as a person who wants to do nothing can always say, "Oh, yes; I am in favor of it, but let us do it some other time"? Now, this provision has passed the House. It is before the Senate. In thirty minutes you can send it to the President if you want to take a step toward correcting these evils; and it is our duty to do so. There is no question of rules, no question of time or method of procedure, that ought to stop us.

Mr. CHANDLER. May I ask the Senator a question? Why has not the committee reported a special bill for this purpose some time during the present session? What excuse can he give as chairman of the committee, what excuse can the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] give, or what excuse can the other Senators on the committee give, when they could have passed a special bill on the subject in two hours at any time, and they did not report it?

Mr. PETTIGREW. The Senator from New Hampshire is not a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs. There are 12 members of that committee, and they unanimously reported an amendment to the appropriation bill to cover this question, and it was ruled out of order. Now, whether we have done our duty or not is something that we shall not leave to the Senator from New Hampshire. If I chose to criticise him, I fear that I could show failure on his part as a member of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, perhaps.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am willing to discuss with the Senator any dereliction of mine in connection with any committee to which I belong.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not care to go into that.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator is imputing motives very freely.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Not at all.

Mr. CHANDLER. He is making charges; he is talking about a lobby; he is talking about responsibility for crime, and is making the heaviest arraignment of his own committee that I ever heard any Senator make in all my life. He makes an arraignment of his own committee for the grossest possible neglect of duty. If what he says is true——

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I think the Committee on Indian Affairs will be able to survive even the criticism of the Senator from New Hampshire.

I do not think it is necessary for me to go further into this matter. I believe these questions are thoroughly understood by the Senate. I think the Senate and the country are aware of the conditions which exist in the Indian country; and it seems to me we can not possibly hesitate to take a step in the direction of correcting the present condition of things.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas rose.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I want the Senator from South Dakota to yield to me just one moment to make another suggestion before 2 o'clock in connection with the arraignment of the committee of the House and the committee of the Senate by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. During the present session of Congress the Dawes Commission has been here at the request of the committees of both Houses and each committee has been in session for a considerable time. The House committee has been more actively engaged in this investigation, and has had the Commission and witnesses, people from the Indian Territory and others, before it for days and days. After a careful investigation that committee prepared a bill which has been reported favorably and is on the Calendar of the House. It has not been considered simply for want of time. The Senate committee has not urged the report of a bill simply because it was impossible for a bill to pass unless it would go through both Houses; and we believed it was best for the House committee to push its work more rapidly than we did, if there was hope for any legislation.

This proposition is a part of a section of the House bill, which provides for a number of other very important things besides. This is a single step in the right direction, conservatively proposed, and to which we believe there ought not to be any objection in the Senate at all.

Mr. HALE. If this single provision is so important, as stated here, and will avert such tremendous evils, as is said, why has not the Committee on Indian Affairs in the House or in the Senate taken it out of the general bill and made it a single measure and passed it, when no objection would be made to it? Why does it connect it with a lot of other propositions and let them lie in the pigeonholes of the committee or on the Calendar or wherever they may have no action taken and insist on picking out this provision and passing it as a matter of initiation by a conference?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Considering the amount of active opposition it has received here, I do not know how the Senator from Maine assumes there would have been no opposition to it if it had been reported as a separate measure.

Mr. HALE. I have heard very little opposition to the merits of the measure.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, it is not——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1341) to prohibit the further issuance of interest-bearing bonds without the consent of Congress.

Mr. PETTIGREW. May I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that we complete the conference report?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. HILL. I have no objection to its being laid aside for an hour temporarily, but I must object beyond that at present. I think we understand this question pretty well, and while I do not object to reasonable debate, I do not think it is quite right to fix a time to vote upon a bill and then immediately proceed to take up another measure and exhaust all the time. If the request is made for an hour, I have no objection to it.

Mr. HALE. Let me suggest to the Senator from New York that the Senator from Utah [Mr. BROWN], who desired to go on to-day and occupy such time as he might choose in discussing the bond bill, is not able to go on, and it is not understood that any one else desires to speak upon that measure.

Mr. HILL. Oh, yes; there are other Senators who wish to speak.

Mr. HALE. It was understood, I think, when the arrangement was made about taking the vote on the bond bill that we should go on and finish this matter to-day.

Mr. HILL. How much time is wanted now?

Mr. HALE. I am not in charge of the conference report. I do not myself want to consume any time.

Mr. GRAY. An hour will do, I think.

Mr. HILL. I have no objection to an hour, and then we will see what the situation shall be. There is no disposition to prevent action. Of course the conference report ought to be disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will submit the request to the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. Before that is submitted I wish to say——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the Senator from North Carolina in a moment. The Senator from South Dakota asks that the unfinished business be laid aside temporarily for the purpose of concluding the consideration of the conference report. Is that the request of the Senator?

Mr. HILL. And I propose to amend the request by the further suggestion as a part of the unanimous-consent agreement that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for one hour.

Mr. HALE. Let it be laid aside for two hours. I think we can get through with the report in that time.

Mr. HILL. Does the Senator from North Carolina consent to two hours?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state the request.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the Senator in a moment. The Chair desires to state the request as submitted by the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask that the pending order be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the conference report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is the request, and the Chair submits it to the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. I object to it in that shape.

Mr. CHANDLER. I rise to a question of order. The conference report is privileged over the unfinished business.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask for the ruling of the Chair on the point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the unfinished business is in order at this time without——

Mr. HALE. The Senator from South Dakota will then have to make a motion, and that will displace the unfinished business.

Mr. HILL. I ask unanimous consent that the bond bill be temporarily laid aside for one hour, and then we can determine the situation and possibly accommodate Senators all around.

Mr. HALE. Let that be done.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will submit the request of the Senator from New York. It is that the pending unfinished business be laid aside temporarily for one hour in order to consider the conference report. Is there objection?

Mr. BUTLER. Tuesday has been fixed as the time for voting upon the bill. I ask the Secretary to read the unanimous-consent agreement. Inasmuch as I was not present, I want to know exactly what it is.

The Secretary read as follows:

Agreement for final vote on Senate bill 1341 some time during Tuesday, June 2.

Mr. BUTLER. Is there any hour agreed upon?

Mr. GRAY. There was no hour.

Mr. BUTLER. Is there any objection to naming some time—say before 6 o'clock?

Mr. GRAY. Let the agreement stand as it is.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It is better to let it alone.

Mr. HALE. The agreement was made in that way for the very purpose of not cutting off anyone who might wish to offer an amendment or anyone who might wish to speak. It is better for the Senator in charge of the bill in its present form.

Mr. BUTLER. All right. I said to the Senate I was anxious to get a vote on the bill, and when naming an early hour for a vote I said that I did not intend to speak on the bill if an early hour could be arranged; that I was desirous of having a vote and not speaking. Inasmuch as it has been agreed that at some time on Tuesday the vote shall be taken on the bill, I want to give notice that I expect to speak. I give notice now, because if there are others who desire to speak and who may think there will be plenty of time by laying the unfinished business aside temporarily, that they may choose to object to the request of the Senator from New York, I give notice now that on Tuesday—I will make it Tuesday, and let others come in first—as soon as Senate bill 1341 is laid before the Senate, I shall ask the consent of the Senate to be heard upon it. I want to give that notice so that others can come in before or come in afterwards, if there is no conflicting notice.

Mr. GRAY. When an agreement has been reached by unanimous agreement of the Senate to vote at a certain hour I suppose every one has the right to speak who can obtain the floor, and this notice is a mere matter of courtesy. It gives the Senator no right to the floor?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly not; but inasmuch as I gave notice that I would not speak, and now having made up my mind to do so, it is my duty to make that fact known. I have no objection to laying aside the unfinished business for one hour.

Mr. HILL. That is rather a reflection upon the arguments already made, for three-quarters of the arguments have been made in favor of the bill. What is the precise time? Is it the understanding that the unfinished business is to be laid aside for one hour?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair submits to the Senate the request of the Senator from New York that the pending unfinished business be laid aside temporarily for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the conference report for the period of one hour. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BERRY. I should like to say one word in reply to what the Senator from Maine said just before 2 o'clock.

Mr. GRAY. Is the request granted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is; and the conference report will be proceeded with.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I wish to respond to a word said by the Senator from Maine just before the hour of 2 o'clock in regard to the conference report. The Senator asked why the House had not taken up and passed this bill and passed some other bill. I will tell the Senator why. This matter was heard before the House committee for six weeks. Almost every man on both sides who felt an interest in the Territory, those who opposed any legislation of every character, the delegates from the Territory, were heard day after day and week after week. The Dawes Commission was heard, and finally the House committee made up and reported a bill unanimously, as I understand, to be passed, and which they hoped to pass during the present session. The provision in this conference report is a part of that bill, but not all of it. There were a great many other things in the bill. Now, the House committee have hoped all the time that they could get a day fixed in the House when this matter could be heard. The Senator from Maine knows the rule that prevails there, and it has been impossible to get the Committee on Rules to give them time to consider it, as I am informed.

Mr. PLATT. There has not been a single day assigned to the committee.

Mr. BERRY. There has not been a single day.

Mr. PLATT. There has not been a day assigned in the House.

Mr. BERRY. Not a day. They have been trying for weeks. I understand that it was a unanimous report, and I repeat what I said before, all parties from the Indian Territory were heard, and the delegates from those nations were heard. They took up nearly all of the six weeks that was devoted to this hearing; but a few days, probably a week or ten days, were given to the Dawes Commission, who were heard also. Those are the facts in regard to it, and there has been no dereliction of duty so far as I know upon the part of any one. Bills are pending in the Senate. They have heard this matter. The committee took from the House bill, and the House conferees, as I am informed by the Senator from Colorado, insisted that this much, at least, was absolutely necessary to be done for the peace and order of society within the Indian Territory. There were many other things that they wanted to do. There are many other things in the bill that ought to be done, but they took only that which was absolutely necessary, as I understand it, and insisted that it should go on this conference report; and without this that there would be confusion and probably bloodshed arising over questions about putting out 8,000 people in that Territory by the Secretary of the Interior.

Therefore, as the basis for any legislation, it was necessary to ascertain definitely who were entitled to rights; to ascertain whether or not certain Indians had been kept unjustly from that roll it was necessary that the full investigation could be had before any talk of allotment took place, because they wanted to know the number who would share in the allotment. Therefore they put in this provision for the Dawes Commission to make this roll, and so particular were they that they said that if any member was dissatisfied, if the Territory was dissatisfied, if the individuals were dissatisfied, an appeal lay to the courts of the United States to determine whether injustice had been done. That is all there is in it, and if the Senator defeats this, the Senator knows as well as I know that it is impossible to get a hearing in the House without the permission of three or five men who constitute the Committee on Rules; that no legislation can be had; and yet, on a technicality merely, he seeks to defeat legislation which every man who visits that Territory, every Senator who lives in that section of country, every Senator who has been there, and every man who has visited that country in an official capacity knows is an absolute necessity and is demanded, and demanded now.

Mr. HALE. I want to say to the Senator from Arkansas that I do not think the fact that legislation proper has not got the sanction of the Committee on Rules if a separate measure ought to justify us in breaking a very substantial and essential rule here. I do not think that they ought to come to the Senate and ask us to violate our rules because they can not get a special bill through there.

Now, further, if the Committee on Indian Affairs in that body found that it could not get a day assigned to it for a special bill covering this purpose, why did they not incorporate this measure, if it is so very important, in the Indian appropriation bill which that committee prepared and sent to this body? I look over the Indian appropriation bill and I find that as sent to the Senate by the House it contains in one clause and another many features as important in legislation as this; but the Indian Affairs Committee, which now beseech the Senate to override all its most important rules, waited until the conference committee met together, and did not attempt to incorporate it into their bill, that would have been boldly before the House. They did not even take the risk of a point of order, and did not get it through as they did other legislation, but waited all the stages until this last stage.

I am amazed, Mr. President, at its being urged here that it is nothing but a technicality that lies at the bottom of this objection, or that Senators are actuated by some other motive, and that there is a lobby here. I never heard of this measure—I was absent when the appropriation bill was passed—until I read what the conference committee proposed to do in submitting the conference report. I then examined into it and examined the statutes and examined the debates. I never heard the subject mentioned. I do not suppose a single Senator who is standing here now for the rules of the Senate and to prevent what will be a most disastrous result in the hereafter if this is allowed to stand as the report of the conference committee and adopted by the Senate heard of a lobby until it was stated in debate to-day that it exists here. I did not for one. I am not urging a technicality, but I am fighting to preserve the integrity of conference committees in the future. If it is the fact that on the Indian appropriation bill there have passed heretofore sub silentio important matters of legislation, that is all the more reason now, when the attention of the Senate is called to it, why it should not be allowed to be done again.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator from Maine seems to suppose that there are some rules of the Senate relating to conference reports and what shall be contained in them. It so happens that there is no rule whatever on the subject.

Mr. HALE. What is the invariable constitution and creation of a conference committee under the rules? That it is upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses. I never knew a conference report ordered and assented to that the conference was not upon that very proposition. The rules require that when matters come to a conflict between the two Houses there shall be a conference committee upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. PLATT. That is just what has taken place in this case, Mr. President. There is no rule of the Senate relating to conference reports. All that the Senator said before I rose seemed to be based upon the idea that we were violating some rule of the Senate in accepting this conference report. There are no rules relating to conference reports in the Senate, and there is no parliamentary rule relating to them so far as affects the acceptance of a report when the conferees have agreed.

The conference, of course, arises over a disagreeing vote of the two Houses. It has arisen in this case over the disagreeing vote of the two House with reference to an amendment which provides for the continuation of what is called the Dawes Commission and the payment of the salaries of the Commission. That is the matter which gave the conference committee jurisdiction, and, I agree, the only matter which gave them jurisdiction.

If you will look in Cushing's Manual, you will find there parliamentary rules laid down for conferees in their meetings; and one is—and the only one which affects this question—that if the conferees of one House, in considering a matter which comes before them, seek to incorporate matters which are foreign to the subject, or which are not directly concerned with it or legitimately associated with it, then it is the duty of the conferees to break the conference; but where the conferees of the two Houses agree, there is no rule, there is no parliamentary law, which prevents the two bodies from accepting their agreement. There may be a question of policy about it. It may not be good policy to legislate by the incorporation of anything which was not directly before one branch or the other of Congress at the time the vote was taken upon which the disagreement was had. It may be that the Congress itself—the two Houses—as a matter of policy, might limit the conferees; but as a matter of practice they are not limited by the two Houses, and it is for each House, and for both Houses, to say how far they will go in accepting the report of the conference when once made. There is no rule about it that is being violated; there is no parliamentary law about it that is being violated; it is a question for the two Houses to determine when the report is made. When the conferees have agreed to change an amendment and bring it before the Houses, the whole subject is open, and the only possible ground on which the Senator from Maine can object to this is that it is bad policy.

Mr. HALE. I said yesterday that I did not understand that it is subject to a point of order under the rules; but when I use the words "rules of the Senate," I mean the rules of conduct, of procedure of the Senate, which undoubtedly have been in the direction of not legislating in this way. The Senator knows that as well as I do, for he is an older Senator than I and he has helped in contests made heretofore against conference committees enlarging their jurisdiction.

Mr. PLATT. Perhaps, Mr. President, I have been as strenuous in objecting to legislation by conference committees as almost anyone, and I do feel myself quite embarrassed when the question arises whether I shall support this conference report; but it is not as objectionable as those who have argued against it seem to suppose. The foundation for this conference report—and all there is in it with the exception, perhaps, of the two items about the Sisseton and Wahpeton Indians and the Seneca Indians, so far as this discussion proceeds, are to my mind unimportant—is connected with and legitimately related to the amendment of the Senate which was disagreed to by the House. The Senator from Maine admits that, I think.

Mr. HALE. It is the same subject-matter; it relates to the Commission; but the Senate amendment, to which the House disagreed, is a pure limitation. It provides in its terms for a limitation: it exhausts itself and does not call for anything beyond it. The Senator has examined that, and I think he will see that.

Mr. PLATT. When the Senator was replying to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] with reference to conference reports on the last year's appropriation bill, or the one in 1891, I do not remember which, he drew the distinction between a limitation of law or an enlargement of it.

Mr. HALE. A limitation of law upon an amendment.

Mr. PLATT. A limitation of law upon an amendment or a limitation of an amendment—put it either way. The law was so that these children could be transported from their homes. The amendment was originally simply an appropriation for transporting children to schools, and the limitation put upon it was a limitation upon the law or a restriction of the law, just as much as it was a restriction of the amendment. It was new legislation, a limitation upon the amendment, a limitation upon legislation, and the Senator from Maine says, "How does that differ from an enlargement of the powers of a commission?"

Mr. HALE. I do not think the conferees ought to do that.

Mr. PLATT. If we can limit the power of a commission, if we can say they shall not do as much as they have done heretofore, why can we not enlarge their powers?

Mr. HALE. I do not think we ought to do either in conference.

Mr. PLATT. So that this is not so very serious a matter after all, and I venture to say that I can take the reports of conference committees composed of members of the Appropriations Committee, running back over a series of years, and find fifty cases where they have gone beyond the mere technical matter which was in disagreement between the two Houses by incorporating into it provisions which looked as if they were legislation and which in a certain sense were legislation. I have not any opportunity now to go over all these records, but every Senator will remember them.

Now, let us see what has been done here. Here is the Dawes Commission, appointed to negotiate with Indians and try to obtain from them some agreement by which the terrible condition of affairs in the Indian Territory may be remedied. We inserted in the Senate a clause continuing that Commission in existence, and they are authorized to negotiate now. It is perfectly apparent that negotiations will amount to nothing unless some other steps are taken, and some steps which specifically the Commission do not seem to be empowered to take. I think all that is required to be done here is within the spirit of the power which was conferred upon them in the first instance, but specifically, technically, according to the letter of their appointment, it would seem that they have not the power which is conferred upon them here. All that this provision does is to enlarge their power in the direction of the spirit of their appointment. In other words, it is to put out of the way a stumbling block to negotiation, one which the other House felt it was necessary to remove if our amendment was to stand paying the salaries of the Commissioners for conducting the negotiation. That is all there is to it; that is the length and breadth of it, and it does not seem to me so very objectionable—not so objectionable as a great many cases to which I might allude if I had the opportunity to consult the records. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] has consulted the records with reference to the Indian appropriation bill, but I venture to say with regard to other appropriation bills—the Post-Office appropriation bill, the naval appropriation bill, the sundry civil appropriation bill, and the legislative appropriation bill—in times past there have been departures from the strict rule which the Senator from Maine is trying to lay down at this time.

Mr. HALE. I do not want that statement to go unchallenged. I have no doubt the Senator thinks or believes or conjectures that what he says is borne out by the record; but I do not believe the Senator can find, with the exception of one or two instances which were referred to yesterday by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. ALLISON], outside of the Indian appropriation bill—which does not seem to have been abused heretofore, and which ought to be stopped now—any such instances in the other appropriation bills. I am quite certain that in any appropriation bill which I have had anything to do with, new matter not in controversy between the two Houses has not been admitted, because, constantly, we are obliged in conference to contest propositions of that kind made by the House conferees.

Mr. PLATT. I have known of this thing being done repeatedly and done after discussion in the Senate, and without serious objection being made to it in the Senate, that where a bill originated in the other House and was amended in the Senate, a half dozen amendments being made in quite a long bill, when a conference committee was raised upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, which were upon the amendments, the conference committee would come back with an entirely new draft of a bill.

Mr. HALE. In an appropriation bill?

Mr. PLATT. Not in an appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. I am making the distinctive point there, because appropriation bills deal with so many subjects and the Senate trusts the Committee on Appropriations so completely in its conferences that the rules which apply to other committees of conference do not apply to them. My remarks about changes in conference apply to changes by Appropriations Committee conferences; they do not apply to other conferences. I have not examined as to that.

Mr. PLATT. There is no rule as to conference committee reports on appropriation bills different from that on other bills.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly there is no rule; but does the Senator not see that the Committee on Appropriations, in its great jurisdiction over so many subjects-matter, ought to be held to a more stern scrutiny and to a more stern adherence to the rules—I will not say "rules" again, but practice of the Senate—about originating new legislation in conference committees than any other. It has more power and there is more opportunity to abuse it; its reports increase in the last days of the session, and it ought to be scrupulous, and I might say overscrupulous, about this very thing of reporting to the Senate in its conference reports new matter, new and extended legislation—much more so than any other committee.

Mr. PLATT. I am not seriously contending with the Senator from Maine as to the general policy which should be observed with regard to appropriation bills, but I remember, I think, a military bill within four or five years past containing some 15 or 20 sections, as to which there were certain disagreements upon amendments, and rather unimportant amendments, and when it came back from the conference committee there came the draft of an entirely new bill relating to the same subject-matter, but changing the provisions of the original bill to quite a considerable extent. Four States came into this Union under those circumstances, with an entirely new draft of a bill, where the disagreement had been upon a bill as to whether one State should be admitted. Similar instances are numerous. So there is no rule about it, and there is no settled practice about it which is being transgressed in this case.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator not see the difference? In a matter of that kind the moment a conference report is made it is notice to everybody of what is in it. Everybody sees it; nobody is taken unawares; but in an Appropriation Committee conference report it is entirely different. The most elaborate legislation, the most offensive legislation may be embodied, and in the vast realm the appropriation bills cover in the last few days of a session the body does not get any such notice as it did in the case the Senator cites of new States. Everybody knew of that. The truth is Senators do not know what conference committees of the Appropriations Committee report. They have to trust to the precedents that they will not put in new matter, and thereby delude the Senate.

The Senator from South Dakota alluded to one case on an Indian appropriation bill where new matter was put in, and, as he said, nobody found it out until after Congress had adjourned. That is wrong, and that ought not to take place; that ought not to ever happen again. The very thing he alluded to shows the impropriety of inserting such legislation in conference reports. If a conference committee of the Committee on Appropriations did that, perhaps nobody would find it out, but it was impossible that Senators should not discover that four States were being admitted instead of one. So the cases are not alike.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I still think if we could examine all the reports of conference committees upon appropriation bills and upon the disagreements as to amendments upon appropriation bills, we should find very many instances in which the conferees have so far departed from the technical thing which was in disagreement between the two Houses as that other matters, other forms of dealing with the question raised by the amendments, were introduced; as where there had been an appropriation for a specific purpose the appropriation was allowed to stand and a joint commission was attached to it, and various matters of that sort. The Senator, I think, will not claim that the conferees upon appropriation bills hold to the very technicality of what he is insisting upon should be held to in this case. I think not, but I have had no time to examine, and it takes time to examine the record upon points like this.

Mr. President, I think, on the whole, that the importance of a matter must be considered in determining the question as to how technical we shall be with reference to the acceptance of a conference report. I do not want to go into that matter at length. I have heretofore discussed it to some extent in the Senate. I simply want to say this: We recognize in this country that we ought to prevent the robbery of Indians. If there is anything which has stirred the philanthropic and benevolent heart of this country it is that in some way or other the Indians of the country are being robbed of their just rights by traders, by contractors, by persons who want to make money out of them; and it justly excites the indignation of the country that this thing takes place and that it can not be prevented by Congress. But, Mr. President, what I desire to do here with reference to this Indian question is this: I want to prevent the robbery of the real Indians by the pretended Indians; and when I have said that I have stated this whole case. The real Indian is being robbed and despoiled by the pretended Indian, and the pretended Indian is here insisting that there shall be no legislation to prevent it.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I regret that the point of order which was urged against this amendment was withdrawn. I should be disposed to renew it, except that I do not wish individually to assume to direct the course which those more particularly in charge of this subject have chosen to pursue. But I believe the point of order was well made by the present occupant of the Chair [Mr. CHANDLER].

I want to draw attention for a moment to the rule and then see wherein there can be an exception justly made to this rule by reason of the fact that it is proposed by managers of the Senate in conference. The third paragraph of Rule XVI reads:

No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I desire to suggest to the Chair whether a point of order can be made at this stage of the proceeding to an insertion in the bill which comes back here in a conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). No point of order is made by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, what is the significance of that rule of the Senate? Does it go simply to a mere question of the order of business? Not at all. It is the emphatic and careful declaration of this Senate, through its rules, that no general legislation ought, under any circumstances, to be put upon an appropriation bill, and the reason of it needs no particular discussion.

When we fix upon an appropriation bill general legislation, we to a certain extent deprive the Executive of his rightful part in the legislation of the country, because we threaten by the possible failure of the appropriations, injury or inconvenience, distress, perhaps, to the administration of the public business, in case he shall exert his independent judgment upon that general legislation by interposing an objection which he can only interpose at the cost of defeating perhaps the entire appropriation bill. It is for the legislative body to throw upon a coordinate branch of the Government an unfair and unjustifiable stress to compel acquiescence in measures which Congress chooses to pass; and it is unbecoming Congress, it is unworthy of the body which occupies so exalted a position in this nation and in the conduct of government among mankind, thus to abuse the power which is left in its hands.

It is impossible, Mr. President, as we all know, that a constitution should both lay down the principles of government and follow the division of the powers of government by minute and particular directions to inhibit the abuse of the authority conferred. Constitutions necessarily leave and intrust large powers to men who are supposed to be sufficiently great in character, honest in purposes, intelligent in perception to understand and observe the true principles upon which they go. Upon that basis this rule of the Senate was prescribed. It is not a rule of order merely. It is a rule which simply gives execution to the true principle of constitutional authority delegated to the Senate. The rule is, as I have said, that no amendment shall be received——

Mr. GEORGE. From any quarter.

Mr. VILAS. I was about to add that it is not to depend upon the quarter from which it comes. It depends upon the nature of the amendment.

Mr. LINDSAY. If the Senator will consent, I wish to ask him a question for information. I understand that the bill as it came from the other House made no provision for continuing the duties of the Dawes Commission?

Mr. VILAS. That is correct.

Mr. LINDSAY. And that, although the law would not have been repealed by nonaction, there would have been no appropriation under which any of its provisions could have been enforced.

Mr. VILAS. I am not so sure about that. I shall have something to say, perhaps, on that subject a little later on.

Mr. LINDSAY. Assuming that to be true for the purposes of the inquiry, the Senate amended the bill by making an appropriation to continue the execution of the duties of the Dawes Commission, and the House conferees accepted that upon the condition that certain duties should be discharged by that Commission which had not theretofore been discharged by it. Now, I ask which is the new legislation—the legislation which originated in the Senate or the amendment to the legislation which originated in the Senate?

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Kentucky fails to observe the force of the adjective in the rule. This rule is not that no new legislation shall be put upon an appropriation bill, because every addition of a dollar may be in one sense new legislation; but this rule is that no amendment which proposes "general legislation" shall be received. Now, the Senate only proposes this: Here was a commission in existence, with all its powers provided by law, with appropriations perhaps sufficient to have enabled it to proceed. The House probably thought so, for it made no amendment. The Senate, in order to insure it, in point of fact, for I offered the amendment myself with a view of adjusting certain conditions that had arisen in the Senate, proposed to supply the Commission with money in order to enable it to perform the functions which it was already established to perform. That was not general legislation. That was, it is true, in a sense new legislation. Now for the House managers to so amend it, if it is to be supposed that the House managers have proposed this—it comes from the Senate managers or from an agreement between the Senate and House managers—is none the less to incorporate upon an appropriation bill what the Senate refused to permit to be put upon it—general legislation.

Mr. LINDSAY. The Senator will pardon me again. Is this general legislation? I understand that it merely authorizes the Dawes Commission to ascertain certain facts and to report them to the Congress of the United States.

Mr. VILAS. The Senator from Kentucky will, I hope, in a few minutes, if he will give me his attention, at a later point in the argument perceive and agree with me that this is not only general legislation, but that if it were enacted it would repeal, in a manner which would be almost disgraceful to this Government, its solemn guaranties to the Five Civilized Tribes of their right to do the very thing which the amendment seeks to take from them and confer on the Dawes Commission, and which we, no later than two or three years ago, solemnly agreed should be the right of one of those tribes as a consideration and condition of our accepting from them a large body of land which it was desired to purchase.

I will pass that now for the time being with the assumption, if the Senator will indulge me in it, that this is, for the reason I have but briefly indicated, general legislation. Thus it will be seen, I am sure, that this legislation is of the very character which the rule of the Senate forbids to be put upon an appropriation bill, irrespective of the source from which it comes. The force of the Senate rule does not depend upon the authorship of the amendment. It depends upon the great principle to which I have made but a very brief allusion, for an allusion is enough in this body to recall it to the attention of everyone and to insure the force in the mind of every Senator which it ought to receive. It is the execution of, it is a due respect to the Constitution of the United States, and this is a rule to preserve in proper manner the great division of power which belongs to the several departments of the Government according to the Constitution.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me? Will he answer, before he gets through with that part of his argument, whether there is any rule positive or any rule in parliamentary law which exempts a committee of conference from an obligation to observe the rules of the Senate?

Mr. VILAS. I had hoped to have a little more time, because I had intended to point out by Cushing and by May, writers of acknowledged authority in parliamentary law, that there is no such rule whatever.

Mr. FAULKNER. Will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. VILAS. With pleasure.

Mr. FAULKNER. A case exactly similar to this was decided in the House of Representatives, I think, week before last. I myself was one of the conferees. We agreed to an amendment perfectly satisfactory to the entire body of conferees of both Houses, but it was not really involved in the question that was in conference. The point was made that it was new legislation and not within the scope of the conferees when the matter was submitted to them. The Speaker ruled the whole amendment out of order and out of the conference report, and they proceeded with the balance of the conference report.

Mr. PASCO. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator from Wisconsin, but I will read a decision substantially to the same effect. It was made as early as 1812 by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. It appears in the Journal of the House of Representatives for the first session of the Twelfth Congress, on page 383:

Mr. Wright, from the managers appointed on the part of this House to attend to conference with the managers on the part of the Senate upon the subject-matter of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill "for the more perfect organization of the infantry of the Army of the United States," made a report; which was read, and declared by the Speaker to be out of order, inasmuch as the conferees had discussed and proposed amendments which had not been committed to them by either of the Houses.

I submit it to the Senator from Wisconsin, if he wishes to make use of it.

Mr. VILAS. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Florida, whose research has discovered a precedent at so early a date in our history and so exactly conforming to the principle which I was seeking to suggest. The reading of the precedent shows itself what its force is, and I think, for myself, that the point of order ought to be made and ought to be insisted on and ruled upon. I should be very glad if others took that view, and we could have what seems to me to be the very best protection against the violation and abuse of that rule, the duty imposed upon the Chair, subject, of course, to the right of correction in the Senate, to strike out of conference reports, on objection, new legislation which is proposed, of a character like this, not amendatory, not calculated simply to perfect and make useful the amendment which was submitted to conference, but an entirely new proposition, a suggestion of legislation so new that it would be the fit subject, of itself alone, of an independent bill, and so important that in this particular instance it seeks to strike down the rights of five nations of Indians whom we have most solemnly promised to guarantee in the very right which is thus to be taken from them. It does seem to me that it would be of the utmost importance and value if we could establish here the proposition that it is the duty of the Chair to pass upon the rule of the Senate and to give it effect precisely as he gives effect to every other rule of the Senate. We shall, if we do not insist upon this, refrain somewhat from the duty which is incumbent upon us in this instance of so marked and manifest a departure from the ordinary practice of conference reports and of violation of the rule of the Senate.

Mr. President, not only is there nothing in any work on parliamentary law which gives any such authority as this to a conference committee, but according to my reading of all works of that kind conference committees are held bound precisely as any other committee is by the rule of the Senate. It can no more depart from the rule of the Senate than a Senator can. Two Senators or three Senators are no more as against the rules of the Senate than one, and they to whom a special subject has been committed ought to be rather more than less careful to observe the rules of the Senate.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. VILAS. With pleasure.

Mr. VEST. Suppose, under the rules of the Senate, granting the Senator's proposition to be true, for the sake of the argument, that this amendment ought not to have been put upon the bill, or that the rule of the Senate as to general legislation is enforced and the rules of the House of Representatives do permit such amendments, is the rule of the Senate binding upon the conferees on the part of the House?

Mr. GEORGE. It is binding on our conferees.

Mr. VEST. That is not the question. Could the Senate, by making a rule, enforce its will against that of the House of Representatives, a coordinate branch of the legislature?

Mr. GRAY. Let me ask the Senator from Missouri if the gist of the whole matter is not the question whether this matter was within the submission of the conferees by the Senate or by the House?

Mr. VEST. Of course, if it was not submitted legitimately it is not there; it can not be put there. But we contend that it was legitimately before them; that it is germane entirely to the subject-matter of the bill and the action of the two Houses. But I put now to the Senator from Wisconsin or to any other Senator the question: Can we by our rules control the action of the coordinate branch of Congress?

Mr. VILAS. I do not feel a particle of difficulty on that question as applied to this subject, and it is only as it is applicable to this question or a question presented in this aspect that we are bound to consider or that I am bound to attempt to answer the Senator's question.

The Senate made no proposal to violate the rule of the House of Representatives or to enforce anything upon the rule of the House. The House has made no attempt to violate the rule of the Senate or to impose anything upon the Senate. The Senate simply submitted as an amendment to an appropriation bill from the House of Representatives a proposal to add a further appropriation to meet the expenses of a commission already existing, and to continue it in existence only by virtue of the law which had created it, and with the powers and authority which had previously been given to it by law. They submitted simply a provision for an appropriation. That does not authorize the managers of the conference, who are but a committee of the Senate, to come in here and violate a rule of the Senate which forbids not that it shall be offered, not that somebody shall offer it, but that from any source whatever such an amendment shall be received.

That is the language of the rule, and that language of the rule depends upon the principle to which I have alluded—the principle of the division of power between the legislative and executive branches of this Government, which would be most grossly abused and overridden if Senators and Members of the other House should choose to put upon a bill like this measures which the Executive would not approve except under stress of the public necessity for appropriations.

Now, let us look at another thing in respect to this matter. See how much more flagrant this case is as an abuse of the rule when you consider that this very amendment was debated in the Senate for two or three days, both as a matter of order, as a question whether it was general legislation or not, and upon the very merits of the proposition. The greatest force of the argument presented in the Senate upon that debate against the adoption of this amendment—for the one now proposed is not so substantially different, so far as it affects the Five Civilized Tribes, that it needs to be talked about as any the less general legislation than the other; I will point that out presently—was that the subject of the proper method of dealing with the Five Civilized Tribes was too important, required too much study and attention, required too large an investigation into the facts, too much of an examination of the past history of treaties and statutes in this country, to be dealt with upon an appropriation bill; that before we could take from those Indian tribes that right and power which we had solemnly promised to them and guaranteed to them, the subject ought to be presented to the consideration of Congress in due and proper way.

So the Senate decided—it being very apparent, too, perhaps, that the Senate was not willing so to legislate at that time—that no such thing as this should be put upon the appropriation bill. It was the decision of the Senate that no legislation of this character should be received to the bill, and thereupon, after that decision was made, we committed to our conferees upon a general conference a proposition simply to maintain existing law and to provide the means for it, not to change existing law. They come back intc the Senate, under the guise of a conference report, with the very thing which the Senate had thus refused after long debate, at the proper time for the debate, when the general appropriation bill was pending.

Is it to be said that when the Senate has made a rule that no general legislation shall be received on an appropriation bill, and in a particular instance in which attempt was made to violate that rule the Senate has declared that it shall not be received to the appropriation bill, then the conferees can go out and bring it in again and compel the Senate, if by any means they can secure a change of votes sufficient now, to receive that legislation? If that is in order, what is the use of having rules of order?

Mr. MORGAN. I rise to inquire whether this debate is now in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator from Alabama that the hour will cease at ten minutes after 3 o'clock.

Mr. VILAS. I wish to draw attention for one moment to the fact that this amendment as it is proposed here is the same amendment in all substantial effect as the amendment which was proposed and rejected in the Senate as general legislation.

First look at the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], and you will see that it contains: First, a provision that that Commission are authorized and directed to proceed to hear and determine the question of citizenship in the Five Civilized Tribes. Second, they are to make for each of the tribes a full and complete roll of all persons entitled to the rights of citizenship. Third, powers are given them to send for persons and papers, and so forth. I will not stop to read it. Fourth, the rules are provided by which they are to proceed in the determination of the question of citizenship, and they are to make up rolls of citizens including those now so recognized. Fifth, their decision shall be final. Sixth, that the rolls shall include Africans admitted to the tribes.

Now, take the amendment brought in by the committee of conference. It provides, first, that the Commission shall proceed to hear and determine the question of citizenship, of precisely the same principle as we find in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut; and the difference is this: They are also to put on the rolls of citizenship those who have been adjudicated by the nations already, but the phraseology with respect to others is changed so that instead of its being directed to hear and determine all questions of citizenship, they are to hear and determine the applications of persons to be put upon the rolls. Their powers are the same; they are given them in the same way; there is the authority to send for persons and papers; they are to pursue the same method; their judgment is to be final, subject only to one qualification, to which I will call attention—an appeal to the district court for the Indian Territory. That is all the difference there is in the provision so far as the establishment of citizenship is concerned.

Is there any man in the world who would doubt that if the amendment had had that form when it was proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], instead of the form in which he happened to write it, that this, equally with that, would have been ruled out of order? Does it change the question of the right of the Senate to insist upon its rules of order that the verbiage is altered by the committee of conference? Are we governed and controlled by the words in which the idea is carried, or by the substance of the thing itself? In substance, so far as the determination of citizenship is concerned, this amendment is the same as the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], except that by the conferees authority is given to the district court to hear an appeal taken by the tribe, to whom we have given the sole power, or by the applicant, according to the determination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be read by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1341) to prohibit the further issuance of interest-bearing bonds without the consent of Congress.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be temporarily laid aside until the close of the remarks of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside until the Senator from Wisconsin shall finish his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senate is ready to take a vote on this question just at the present time, I will yield, of course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request is that the unfinished business shall be postponed until the Senator from Wisconsin shall have finished his remarks.

Mr. GEORGE. That is all.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator from Wisconsin is ready to take a vote, I will yield. Otherwise I shall be compelled to object.

Mr. VILAS. I am not asking anything on the subject. I am making no appeal, even to the courtesy of the Senator. It is the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. GEORGE. I made the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request before the Senate is that of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] that the unfinished business shall be postponed until the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] shall have finished his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. BUTLER. Unless there is some one else who desires to speak on the bond bill, I desire to proceed now, and after I finish this matter can be taken up. Therefore I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina objects.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCKENNEY, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. 886) to amend section 3255 of the Revised Statutes of the United States concerning the distilling of brandy from fruits;

A bill (H. R. 2054) to correct the military record of Charles W. Rinehardt and to grant him an honorable discharge;

A bill (H. R. 3282) to repeal section 61 of an act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, which became a law August 28, 1894; and

A bill (H. R. 6256) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to furnish to George F. Fuller Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Manistique, Mich., a condemned cannon.

ELMIRA E. DUSTIN.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the bill (H. R. 3578) granting a pension to Elmira E. Dustin, to which I am sure there will be no objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Elmira E. Dustin, of Sycamore, widow of Gen. Daniel Dustin, late colonel of One hundred and fifth Illinois Infantry Volunteers, and to pay her a pension of $50 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

M. S. HELLMAN.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a small private bill, which will take but a moment. It is the bill (S. 2653) for the relief of M. S. Hellman.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of War and the proper accounting officers of the Government to charge to M. S. Hellman, of Canyon City, Oreg., the sum of $1,000 damages, in full for all damages sustained by the United States for the breach of his contract, made July 5, 1871, with Capt. W. H. Bell, commissary of subsistence, United States Army, for the supply of flour at Camp Warner, Oreg., to remit all further claims of damage under the contract, and to settle and adjust his unsettled accounts with the Government, after the deduction of the sum of $1,000; and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the balance due upon proper vouchers therefor, the amount so found due to be in full and final settlement of all claims upon the Government.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. ELEANOR CARROLL POE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PUGH in the chair) laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives, disagreeing to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 804) granting a pension to Mrs. Eleanor Carroll Poe.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

REGULATION OF BOND ISSUES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1341) to prohibit the further issuance of interest-bearing bonds without the consent of Congress.

Mr. BUTLER addressed the Senate. [See Appendix.]

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me? I desire to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BUTLER. I yield.

Mr. HILL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, June 1, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate May 29, 1896.

PROMOTIONS IN THE ARMY.

Adjutant-General's Department.

Lieut. Col. Henry Clarke Corbin, assistant adjutant-general, to be assistant adjutant-general with the rank of colonel, May 26, 1896, vice Wood, retired from active service.

Maj. Arthur MacArthur, junior, assistant adjutant-general, to be assistant adjutant-general with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, May 26, 1896, vice Corbin, promoted.

Corps of Engineers.

First Lieut. Joseph Ernest Kuhn, to be captain May 26, 1896, vice Fiebeger, who vacates his corps commission on accepting commission as professor of civil and military engineering at the United States Military Academy.

Second Lieut. Jay Johnson Morrow, to be first lieutenant, May 26, 1896, vice Kuhn, promoted.

SPECIAL EXAMINER OF DRUGS, MEDICINES, AND CHEMICALS.

Alexander G. Maylie, of Louisiana, to be special examiner of drugs, medicines, and chemicals, in the district of New Orleans, in the State of Louisiana, to succeed Erasmus D. Fenner, resigned.

POSTMASTER.

B. O. Guthrie, to be postmaster at Burlington, in the county of Alamance and State of North Carolina, in the place of Joseph Fix, whose commission expired December 17, 1895.

CONFIRMATIONS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 29, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read, corrected, and approved.

Mr. KEM. I make the point of no quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska makes the point of order that there is not a quorum present. [After counting.] The point is overruled, there being a quorum present.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, in view that to-morrow will be Memorial Day, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine moves that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, we desire to resume the argument in the Johnston and Stokes case.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1247) to establish and provide for the maintenance of a free public library and reading room in the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 3282) to repeal section 61 of an act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, which became a law August 28, 1894; and

A bill (H. R. 886) to amend section 3255 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning the distilling of brandy from fruits.

The message also announced that the Senate has passed without amendment the following resolutions:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring). That the Committee on Enrolled Bills of the two Houses be authorized to correct the enrolled bill (H. R. 5731) entitled "An act to regulate the practice of medicine and surgery, to license physicians and surgeons, and to punish persons violating the provisions thereof in the District of Columbia," by striking out, in section 3, lines 1 and 2, "1st day of July, 1896," and inserting "passage of this act"; also, in section 12, after the word "Columbia," strike out "nor to medical students who have matriculated in any medical college in the District of Columbia prior to January, 1896."

Also:

Resolved by the House (the Senate concurring), That there be printed for the use of the Treasury Department, Steamboat Inspection Service, 300 copies each of the proceedings of the Board of Supervising Inspectors of Steam Vessels for the years 1895 and 1896.

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3279) to authorize the reassessment of water-main taxes in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 3578) granting a pension to Elmira E. Dustin.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 6739) for the relief of John N. Quackenbush, late a commander in the United States Navy, asked a conference with the House on the said bill and amendment, and had appointed Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon, Mr. LODGE, and Mr. PUGH as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 715) for the relief of B. F. Dowell; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 8293) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for prior years, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. COCKRELL as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following title:

On May 28, 1896:

An act (H. R. 6248) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. 8167) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Red River of the North; and

An act (H. R. 7285) for the relief of George McFarland.

CONFEREES ON DEFICIENCY BILL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the following conferees on the general deficiency bill: Mr. CANNON, Mr. NORTHWAY, and Mr. SAYERS.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—JOHNSTON VS. STOKES.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, after the three very able arguments that have been made in this case by my colleagues on the committee it will not be necessary at this time to have an extended statement of the case made to the House. I say that, however, upon the assumption that all the members of the House either heard those arguments or have read them in the RECORD. The majority for the contestee, as appears from the report of the minority, which is made from an accurate compilation of the figures in the case as corrected, is 4,275. The contestant, Johnston, proposes to exclude none of the returns of this district, so that in order to seat him it is necessary to prove that at least 4,276 legal voters made an offer to vote for him and had their votes rejected.

He proposes to do this, Mr. Speaker, first, by claiming that certain persons were entitled to vote who were not registered under the registration law of the State of South Carolina, on the ground that the law was unconstitutional. I think there is no doubt whatever that this position is correct so far as the unconstitutionality of the law is concerned. The registration law was passed in 1882. I may say that the constitution of South Carolina at that time was one of the freest constitutions in this country, and provided that all male citizens of the United States over the age of 21 who had been residents of the State of South Carolina one year and of a given precinct or county sixty days should have the right to vote; this, with certain exceptions or disqualifications on account of conviction for crime. That is, they had practical universal suffrage there, and any citizen over 21 years of age who had the qualification of residence referred to was a legal voter.

The law of 1882 provided for the registration of the voters of the State. There is a ground for contending, and the chief justice of South Carolina took that view in a decision which he rendered, that all persons who were at that time voters and who were not registered during the year 1882 were forever thereafter prevented from registering, and that the operation of that law in the future after the year 1882 was only intended to apply to persons who thereafter should become voters. If this construction of the law be correct, then there were at least 100,000 persons who were entitled to vote in South Carolina in 1882, who failed to register during that year, who were forever disfranchised by this registration law.

That construction of the law has been put upon it by the chief justice of South Carolina, and it is the practical construction that has been put in force there in registration. The registration officers have almost uniformly held in all the precincts involved in the four contests from South Carolina before our Committee on Elections that where a man did not register in 1882 he could not afterwards be permitted to register. So that this law was, at the outset, put to the practical use of disfranchising this enormous number of voters. But the particular point in regard to the law which to my mind makes it clearly repugnant to the constitution of South Carolina is section 137, which provides that "after a general election the registration books shall be opened for the registration of such persons as shall thereafter become entitled to register on the first Monday in each month until the 1st of July preceding the election, when they shall be closed until such election shall have taken place."

Thus the general election occurs in November. The first month when the books would be opened after that is in December; then the books are to be kept open on the first Monday of each month until the 1st of July preceding the general election, and then they are to be closed; so that it is clear that unless the 1st of July comes upon a Monday the only days for registering under that law are the first Mondays in December, January, February, March, April, May, and June, and the registration closes upon the first Monday in June, which is fully five months in advance of the time of the general election.

Now, the constitution of South Carolina gives to any man who is a citizen of the United States and who has resided in the State a year and in the voting precinct sixty days a right to vote. Take the case of a man, for instance, who has resided in the precinct for sixty, ninety, or one hundred and twenty days before the date of the election, and there is no provision for his being registered. In fact, his registration is absolutely prohibited, so that this provision is repugnant to the constitution of South Carolina, and under the pretense of regulating suffrage it imposes a new qualification; and according to the uniform decisions in such cases in the State of Massachusetts, in the State of Kentucky, and many other States of this Union, such a provision would be unconstitutional. And being a vital and necessary part of the act, it seems to me that it renders the whole act unconstitutional and void.

Now, this opinion is fortified by authority. This case has twice been considered by judicial tribunals. The question was first considered in a case in the United States court before Judge Goff, a very eminent jurist; and he held that the law was unconstitutional. The court of appeals, however, overruled him—not holding that the law was constitutional, but holding that he did not have jurisdiction in the case. So that the result of the proceeding was that one judge, an eminent judge, gave an opinion that the law was unconstitutional, and in that opinion he was in no way contradicted by his associates.

The law then came up before the supreme court of South Carolina upon appeal. There were sitting the chief justice and two associate justices. The chief justice, in a very carefully considered opinion, held that the law was unconstitutional, and the associate justices did not hold that it was constitutional, but simply that the court had no jurisdiction. Those are the only two cases where, so far as I have been able to ascertain, this law has been submitted to judicial tribunals, and the only opinions rendered with regard to it have been that the law was contrary to the constitution of South Carolina. I may say that in the Committee on Elections the opinion is unanimous that the law is unconstitutional, although my Democratic colleagues on the committee differ somewhat as to the effect of that finding upon the validity of the entire law.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is it admitted by all the members of your committee that the law is unconstitutional?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I have just so stated. It is admitted by all that the law is unconstitutional; but my Democratic colleagues do not think that the whole law is therefore vitiated and destroyed. The majority of the committee, however, hold that it is unconstitutional in such essential provisions that the entire law is void.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Do I understand the gentleman to hold that the registration law being unconstitutional, even if there was a proper expression of all the legal voters who offered to vote and had an opportunity to vote, the election would still be void?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. The gentleman is anticipating my argument. That is an obvious point that must be met in the course of the discussion of this case.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. McLAURIN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. McLAURIN. Do you hold that if the law is unconstitutional, there was no machinery there by which an election could be held?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. No; I do not claim that. The registration law is unconstitutional, but there is still an election law surviving in South Carolina with sufficient machinery under which an election can be held; and I do not think any member of the committee contends that the fact that the registration law is unconstitutional would vitiate all elections held in South Carolina.

The first proposition of the contestant, I have stated, is that the registration law is unconstitutional, and therefore he claims that all men who are qualified voters under the constitution have a right to vote, and that if they go to the polls and make proper tender of their votes for him and they are refused, then it is our duty here to count the ballots just as if they had been cast. There is no question, I think, of the truth of this proposition. But in the testimony adduced is involved the point upon which the case hinges so far as the contestant's right to the seat is concerned. The contestant had established at or near the various polling places throughout the district certain so-called list keepers; and men who had not been registered, or who had been registered and had defective registration certificates, would come to these list keepers, stationed in the vicinity of the polls, and would sign a certain paper which is in the form of a petition to the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled. Those persons signed that petition, setting forth certain facts, but it was not sworn to, and the list keeper in most cases imported that petition into the record and made it evidence by swearing that he had kept it and that it was either signed by the voters who came to him or that they authorized him to sign it for them, the men being in many cases unable to read and write.

Mr. POWERS. Were those petitions printed? Did they have a printed heading?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I would say that those petitions had a printed heading and were uniform throughout the whole district.

Mr. POWERS. They were prepared in advance of the election.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. They were prepared in advance of the election. I think, however, that no point should be made against the contestant with regard to that, because it was well known that men who did not have registration certificates would be denied the right to vote, and efforts were made to have at each polling place a record kept of the men whose votes were rejected.

Now, it seems to me there can be no doubt of the proposition, as the law stands to-day, that if a legal voter is denied the right to vote, if he makes the proper tender of his vote and if proper and legal evidence is brought into the House of Representatives showing that he made that tender, we should count his vote. This question arose in the Fifty-first Congress, in the case of Waddill vs. Wise, in the Richmond district of Virginia. There were some 500 voters in line all election day at certain precincts in that district desiring to vote. They had their ballots with them. They stayed there all day until the sun went down, until the polls closed, and they did not have an opportunity to vote. But in that case the testimony of each one of those voters who there stood in line was produced. Each voter testified that he was present there, that he got as near the poll as he could, and that he was prepared with a ballot for the contestant. He proved his qualifications as a voter, and in that case the House of Representatives—as I believe with entire justice—counted those votes. The same question arose in the case of Featherston vs. Cate, and the same principle was again sustained by the House.

Now, I want to call the attention of the House to the proposition that is here put forth for the contestant. In the first place, these petitions are unsworn. I have a sample here, which I show you, from the original record, containing the original petitions. On it you find the names of one, two, or three hundred men, all signed in the same handwriting, and all under the declaration that each of them is a voter. Some of them are signed under no declaration at all. I certainly know of no rule that has ever been followed in this House or in any of the courts that would permit the election of members of this body by petition, by evidence that is absolutely unsworn to. But it is claimed in this case that these petitions are a part of the res gestæ. Now, every lawyer knows that the doctrine of the res gestæ is often made to cover cases that are very weak, and that it is the last resort of lawyers who are trying to introduce purely hearsay testimony. But if it is res gestæ in South Carolina for a voter or for any man, whether he is a voter or not, to go around the corner or perhaps out into a neighboring grove or elsewhere at some distance from the polls and sign his name to a paper—if that is a part of the res gestæ in South Carolina it is a part of the res gestæ in Massachusetts, and if we can elect members from South Carolina by petition in that way we can elect members from Ohio or from any other State in the same way. So that the great difficulty is that, in order to seat the contestant in this case, you have to adopt a new rule of law, and one which in my judgment would be most dangerous in its operation in the future in elections held all over this country.

Most of the petitions imported into this record are imported into it by the testimony of the witnesses. But the whole case does not rest on the petitions simply, and in the report of the minority, fully setting forth the testimony in regard to these lists, you will find precisely how they are set up in the record. I think that there are very few of the lists that can be held and counted as actual votes cast for the contestant. But my able colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. CODDING], in his minority report, differing from me as he does as to the legality of most of the lists, called attention to certain lists relied on here which he says he selected at random from the report of the minority of the committee and says with reference to them:

To adopt this computation is to give to the lists an importance at once startling and revolutionary.

On page 47 of the report of the minority of the committee is list which was compiled at one of the precincts known as Bells Cross Roads and containing 86 names. In that case the list keeper, after giving his name, age, etc., says that he was near the polling place at the Federal precinct, and then was asked what he was there for. He said, "To receive the names of those who were rejected at the polls.

Q. How did you get those names?
A. I taken the names of those that applied for registration and could not get them and attempted to vote and could not vote.

Now, it could not be held, Mr. Speaker, that there is any proof whatever in that particular precinct that these men who went there were voters, that they had resided in the State a year or in the precinct sixty days; and the witness does not state even the legal conclusion that they were voters. There is no evidence whatever that the men whose names are signed to this petition had a right to vote, or that they were improperly rejected. There are also in the minority report two other cases, one at Preachers Mills and the other at Ayers precinct, involving 208 votes, which are precisely similar in all respects to the one that I have just cited.

Now, I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that the House of Representatives, in view of the precedents established in the past, and also in view of the decisions of the courts of the country, can hold that a man who simply signs a petition in the vicinity of the polling place, who makes no affirmation or oath that he is a voter or as to his intention to vote, can be made a voter and can have his vote counted by this House, as if actually cast, upon any such testimony.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. It is stated, is it not, that the Republicans had no representation on any of these boards; that they were composed entirely of Democrats?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I think that there was no representation by Republicans at a single precinct in the entire district.

Mr. HOPKINS. That they were all Democrats?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. They were.

Mr. HOPKINS. And under them these six or eight thousand Republican voters were disfranchised. Now, let me ask the gentleman if we are not to consider petitions or papers of this character as proper to be received, and as indicating that these voters were not permitted to exercise their right, although at the polling place for that purpose; petitions setting forth the facts, and signed or authorized to be signed by each one of them, that he was a legal voter, that he was a Republican, that he went to the polling place to vote for Colonel Johnston, and was denied the privilege? I say if we do not count such votes how are the Republicans in the State of South Carolina to be represented on this floor?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Well, the gentleman from Illinois is only stating a difficulty, and we have only an illustration of the old adage that bad cases make bad laws. We can not hold that a member of this House can be elected from South Carolina on such a paper as that or by such a proceeding unless we hold that members can be elected from Iowa, Illinois, or any other State in the same manner.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Have you any doubt that the persons who signed the petitions were really at the polls and ready to vote?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I can only know what the record shows, and when there is absolutely no testimony, even by this list keeper, which shows that the man who signed the list was a voter, that he lived in the precinct, and had a right to vote, I certainly can not know that he was a voter.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Then your question is one of proof and not of actuality? That is, you admit that probably the voters were there, but you say the proof was not sufficient in a court of law to prove it.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. The gentleman says my difficulty is one of proof and not of actuality. I do not think we can decide election cases upon faith here. This House can only act upon proof. Otherwise abolish the taking of evidence in these cases. I do not think we can assume things that are not proved, and this record here clearly and distinctly omits proof which has been required by this House in the past and which has been required by all courts.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Then tell us how to prove it?

Mr. HOPKINS. If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL] will allow me right there, did not the voter certify to the party in the immediate presence of these election judges, immediately after he was refused the privilege of voting, that he was a legal voter in the State of South Carolina, in the county where the election was held, and in the voting precinct where he was denied his right as a citizen, and did he not also certify that he was a Republican and had attempted to vote for Colonel Johnston?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HOPKINS. If the gentleman will allow me to proceed just a little further upon that, I think the conditions in South Carolina are entirely different from what they are in Massachusetts or in Illinois, where we notoriously have honest elections. A petition coming from a State like either of these, where everybody knows that every citizen, however humble he may be, can exercise his right, would be looked upon with suspicion; but here the gentleman from Massachusetts says that an election was being held under an unconstitutional law, in a State where notoriously the Republicans are disfranchised, and where a large portion of the Republican voters are ignorant; and under those conditions it seems to me that the gentleman is holding too high and too rigid requirements upon the voters.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not understand that we have authority here to lay down a particular rule with regard to counting excluded voters for one State that is not in the future to apply to every State in the Union. I say here with regard to these lists that there is absolutely——

Mr. HOPKINS rose.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Now, if the gentleman will permit me, he can make a speech later on.

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman misunderstood me there.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. There is absolutely no testimony in the record anywhere showing that these persons were legal voters. The only evidence—if you can consider it evidence—upon that point is contained in these petitions, these statements, which apparently were not intended to be used in a contested-election case, and which are entirely unsworn.

Mr. HOPKINS. Here is the point I desire to make. I am not contending for a different rule. The rule can be the same. But in determining the evidence it seems to me you should take into consideration the peculiar conditions in South Carolina, that are different from what they are in the State of Massachusetts or in the State of Illinois. Now, take an ignorant witness upon the stand. In judging of his evidence you take into consideration the fact that he is not trained in the schools and can not express himself so clearly and well, and just here it seems to me that you are in your argument applying the technical requirements that might apply to a gentleman of the intelligence of the Representative from Massachusetts, but not to an ignorant colored voter in South Carolina.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me with reference to the counting of votes we have got to apply one uniform law everywhere. I do not understand that because a man is ignorant he will be permitted to sign a prepared statement and have that statement received in the courts as evidence. They will not dispense with the ordinary rules of law. They will not permit hearsay testimony, and they will not permit evidence which is absolutely unsworn to be admitted to prove facts.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Will the gentleman permit me? If you adhere——

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I should be glad to proceed with my argument, but——

Mr. NORTHWAY. If you adhere to that rule, why is it that in your report you say this:

The testimony shows that many voters, some of them coming 30 or 40 miles, appeared regularly at the places of registration from month to month and were denied registration by means of a systematic obstruction. It shows further that many thousand men who had the constitutional qualification, but were not registered, and who therefore had the right to vote if the registration laws were unconstitutional, expressed their desire to vote by going to the polls. Doubtless many thousands more unregistered voters remained at home who would have come had they not known that a rule requiring registration certificates was in force and that they would be excluded if they came. * * *

The colored race is enormously in the majority in this district, and it appears—

From what evidence, I should like to know—that as a rule the voters of that race in that district were Republicans.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I am sorry that the gentleman from Ohio should have made that interruption to quote from my report. He can only make it on the assumption that I can not say everything at the same time. I shall follow my own report and consider that point when I reach it, but I am now addressing myself to the proposition——

Mr. OVERSTREET. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I should be glad to proceed with my argument, but I will yield to my colleague, certainly.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The gentleman has stated that no one of these lists is supported by any evidence showing the qualifications of the voters.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I did not state that.

Mr. OVERSTREET. You made that statement as to some of them, then. I want to ask you if all of the lists which carry the 4,608 votes that we count here are not supported by evidence of some kind which discloses the qualifications of the voter?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have referred to three lists, taken from the very able report of my colleague upon the committee [Mr. OVERSTREET], which do not give the qualifications of voters; and if the members of this House will refer to page 5875 of the RECORD, in the report of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CODDING]—if they will take the three precincts mentioned there and look upon the evidence in the gentleman's [Mr. OVERSTREET'S] own report—they will find absolutely no testimony to show that those men were voters.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Will the gentleman permit me? Are not all of these lists to which you have just referred based upon the common, uniform petition that was used in that district?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I stated that the petitions were uniform—upon printed blanks—but the gentleman himself does not rely upon the petitions alone. He claims that they are evidence because the list keepers swear to certain essential facts. I am calling attention to the absolute worthlessness in some cases of this testimony. If this House can receive these petitions, which are unsworn to, as proving the facts which are set up in them, then it will be entirely unnecessary to have any depositions taken in election cases, but a contestant can simply go around and get petitions from men who have been at an election or who say that they have the right to vote and their votes were refused.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Are there not petitions filed continuously in this House that are acted upon with greater promptness than is proposed to act on these petitions?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I do not think it has ever been the rule of this House in contested-election cases, where the statute provides a way for the taking of sworn testimony, that petitions shall be received of the character of these petitions to settle the right of a member to his seat. The gentleman's question demonstrates the weakness and the danger of his position. I should be very glad personally if I could see my way clear, without doing violence to the rules of law which have governed in such cases, to seat the contestant; but gentlemen are asking us here, in order to do what they consider a great right, to do a little wrong; and it is the old story. "'Twill be recorded as a precedent, and many an error by this example will rush into the State." Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am unable to break down every rule of evidence and law that has been set up in cases of this character and to count the signatures to these petitions as votes actually cast.

Finding that the contestant was not elected, I come now to consider the question whether the contestee is entitled to the seat. Proceeding from the conclusion that the law was unconstitutional, what are the facts? First, the population of that district is overwhelmingly black. We find, further, that the colored voters are almost uniformly Republicans; so uniformly Republican that even if this unconstitutional law had been honestly and fairly enforced a majority of Republicans and of colored voters would have been registered, enough probably to have elected the contestant. The law was not fairly enforced. There was, for instance, but one registration place in a county, and only five or six days each year in which a man could be registered; and the record is full of evidence that the colored voters came from 20 to 30 and even 40 miles and endeavored to get registered; that they were put off in one way or another, kept standing in line all day, and denied the right to register, and they came month after month and year after year legally entitled to registration and yet were denied it. That fact is established. In the next place, the law was unconstitutional, and the voter had the right to rely upon and believe that the requirements of the law as to registration certificates would be enforced against voters, and that no man could vote who did not produce a registration certificate.

Now, what is the rule laid down upon this question? In McCrary on Elections, section 241, it is declared that—

If the officers conducting an election adopt and enforce an erroneous rule as to the qualification of voters which prevents certain legal voters who offer to vote from giving in their votes, and being made known prevents other legal voters similarly situated from offering to vote, the election may be set aside, especially if it appear that such votes if offered and received would have changed or rendered doubtful the result.

That has been decided in Pennsylvania. In the case of Scranton Boroughs, where the doctrine was held that if the officers of election laid down an erroneous rule and it was known beforehand that that rule would be adopted, voters affected by it were justified in not going to the polls and go through the useless formality of tendering their votes, and if a sufficient number of legal voters were thus prevented from voting to have changed or rendered doubtful the result, then there was no election. Now, I contend that there is no question here, there can be no question whatever after reading that record, that if this unconstitutional registration law had not been enforced, or if it had been fairly applied, more than enough voters would have turned out to have rendered the election of the contestee doubtful.

When we consider the large number of legal voters who went to the polls and were denied the right to vote—and I am considering now no debatable lists—and the large number who remained at home as a natural result of their knowledge that this statute would be enforced, we are stating the conclusion mildly when we say that if it had not been for the enforcement of this rule the result would probably have been different. My conclusion, therefore, is safely within these reasonable precedents. But upon the record it is impossible, except by creating a new, dangerous, and revolutionary precedent, for us to count these votes for the contestant in this case. So that, as the result would certainly have been doubtful, and as the operation of this unconstitutional law was to prevent a fair expression of the will of the voters there, I do not believe there has been any election.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman permit another interruption?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. Where do you get your evidence that there was no election there? Do you not get it from the very petitions upon which Colonel Johnston seeks to be seated?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I do not.

Mr. HOPKINS. Where do you get it in the record?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I have stated that the record shows, or certainly the facts are, that the overwhelming majority of the voters in that district were black, and further, that those black voters were Republicans, and I contend that vast crowds of them did, as a matter of fact, resort to the polls.

Mr. HOPKINS. How do you know that?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Because there is ample proof in the record that there were great numbers of them who went to the polls. It is proven by the depositions.

Mr. HOPKINS. The very depositions upon which Colonel Johnston asks to be seated.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Yes, sir; but it is needless for me to repeat that they do not prove a sufficient number alone, and I find, as a result of the evidence and as the natural result of the operation of this registration rule, that many voters did not go to the polls, because they knew this statute would be enforced and their votes refused, who, if it had not been for this rule, would have gone in sufficient numbers to render the result doubtful.

Mr. HOPKINS. You say those people went to the polls to vote. To vote for Colonel Johnston?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I say that a great many of them went to the polls to vote; but I say further that it was not necessary for them to go to the polls to vote. I say that if they had stayed at home, relying upon their belief that that rule would be enforced as it had been enforced at previous elections—if enough of them stayed at home to make the result doubtful—there was no election. I have cited a Pennsylvania case covering that very point. But it certainly would be necessary for them to go to the polls to vote in order to justify us in counting their votes here.

Mr. PAYNE. Does it not appear that a large majority of the voters in that district were disfranchised by an unconstitutional registration law?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. It does.

Mr. PAYNE. And that a large majority of the voters of the district were Republicans? And is not that enough to set aside the election without going any further?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Certainly; and that is what I contend. I say that with such a record as we have in this case we can not seat the contestee; we can not permit him to retain a seat here without doing violence to every principle of fair elections.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Is it not true that there were over 4,600 of those voters who were at the polls, and whose names were enrolled upon a list which declared their intention to vote for Colonel Johnston?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. My friend doubtless knows what is contained in his minority report. He finds that, counting all the lists which he thinks should be admitted, there was a majority for Colonel Johnston of 233.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will say to the gentleman that that compilation in the report is erroneous. A mistake was made in carrying forward the figures. The result should be 312, instead of 233.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Well, I was simply taking the gentleman's figures. If you will go through this evidence carefully, you will find that there are enough defective depositions to wipe out that majority over and over again; so that on your own theory you do not make out your case.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Is it not true that there are 4,600 votes enrolled upon the list which recites the intention of those voters to support Colonel Johnston? I am not asking you to admit that those lists should be counted as proof.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I have not counted the names upon those petitions, but if the gentleman says that there are 4,600 names signed to them, I am willing to admit that. What I claim is that there are not a sufficient number put into the case by depositions to overcome the majority adverse to Colonel Johnston. So my conclusion is, Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to state it simply as my conclusion, that there was no valid election in the district in question; that the contestant has not produced evidence in such form as we can recognize to warrant us in giving him the seat. And I believe, on the other hand, that the election was so grossly unfair, by reason of the unfair application of this registration law, as well as its unconstitutionality, that we can not hold that the contestee is entitled to the seat. And my verdict is, and I simply give it because I feel it my duty to state my own convictions to the House—my verdict is, based on the evidence, that we can not give the seat to either party.

Mr. SETTLE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. SETTLE. I want to see if I correctly understand your argument or position with reference to the lists or petitions. They find their place in the record by being introduced by the gentleman who was keeping the lists and who was designated for that purpose at the various precincts. This list keeper is examined as a witness, testifies in the case, and corroborates his memory from the list. Does not that fact give the so-called petitions an additional weight, and put them on a very different legal plane from the ordinary petitions which are sent to Congress as the term "petition" is usually understood?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I have no question whatever that the petitions are memoranda, and can be imported into the testimony by depositions of witnesses, and I so stated in the course of my argument. But the trouble is that a sufficient number is not put in by deposition or other testimony so that we can legally count them. No matter if we do count three or four thousand of these names, you can not count a sufficient number, which are held up by depositions, to accomplish the purpose you have in view.

Mr. BRODERICK. You speak of the unfairness of the election. Was there any unfairness except from the operation of this unjust registration law?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I will say in regard to that, that I do not think the testimony shows that there was any fraudulent counting in the district, or any question of that sort; or that there was any stuffing of the ballot boxes. It was simply an unfair application of the registration law. I have no doubt, in view of the condition of that State, that this law was passed and enforced for the express purpose of disfranchising the colored voters. And so I can not find that if the law operated as it operated in this case, to prevent this great body of voters from expressing their will at the polls, that there had been an election in that district; and in cases like this, when a State sends Representatives here, claiming a seat in this House, the House should deny representation to such States until they had instituted fair methods of ascertaining the will of their voters.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him this question: In the event that the House sustains your view of the case, that there was no election, and the contestee is compelled to relinquish his seat, and the case goes back to the State of South Carolina for a new election, is not the law under which such an election is to be held more unjust and unfair than the present law?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Well, I do not think we have anything to do with the result, as far as that is concerned. We are simply passing an opinion as judges in a case upon the law and evidence now before us. We do not have any right to consider results or to hold an election here. If we could do so, I would have no doubt as to which candidate I would cast my vote for.

Mr. DOCKERY. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman state why the act of June 20, 1874, was passed applicable to this District, and disfranchising the entire colored votes?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Well, my friend is going a good long way back of the record——

Mr. DOCKERY. I simply wanted to know why the Republican party, when they had a two-thirds majority in the House, disfranchised the colored people of this District?

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts this question with reference to these petitions: Whether there is a single deposition in the record to show that any one of these men went to the polls, tendered his ballot to vote, and was refused? These lists refer to a large number who were refused the privilege, but what I wish to ask is, if there is any direct evidence to show that any one voter was refused the right to vote?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I think there is such testimony.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. In how many cases?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I have not computed them. There were quite a number of lists, but the total number presented by the contestant, sufficiently sustained by deposition, did not overcome the majority of the contestee.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in the record, no evidence anywhere, that there was any special wrongdoing in connection with the election on the part of the contestee or on the part of any of the sitting members in these South Carolina contests. In one district, certainly, where they had not for years opened certain polls, where the black voters are greatly in the majority, the contestee [Mr. ELLIOTT], before the election was held came out and urged that all the polls be opened, and it was against his protest that the polls were closed on that day.

The difficulty is that a system exists the principle of which is to disfranchise the colored voters. It is a system that permits the minority in certain districts to choose the members of the House themselves. Individuals are powerless to oppose it, and it is a duty which we owe to this Government, and even to the State of South Carolina, to refuse to seat members chosen in such a manner.

Mr. BRODERICK. Let me ask the gentleman if the constitutionality of the law under which this election was held has ever been presented to the courts for adjudication?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. It has.

Mr. BRODERICK. What decision was rendered?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. It was not adjudicated; but in two cases where the question was considered opinions were given that the law was unconstitutional. But the majority in each case held that the court had no jurisdiction.

Mr. BRODERICK. Was that prior to the election?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. It was subsequent to the election.

I reserve the remainder of my time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to detain the House for any considerable length of time; but if in the discussion of this case I should detain it a longer time than I anticipate I ask the indulgence of the members.

The constitution of South Carolina confers the elective franchise upon all the male citizens of the United States 21 years old, who have resided within the State for one year and in the election district where they seek to vote for the period of sixty days, subject to certain exceptions which it is not necessary to notice here. This constitutional right to vote can not be taken away or abridged by legislative enactment. The legislature may enact and make reasonable rules for the government of the election and for the exercise of the right, but any act of the legislature which unnecessarily restricts the right to vote is unconstitutional. The constitution of South Carolina further says that the legislature shall enact from time to time proper registration laws. In pursuance of the authority thus vested by the constitution the legislature of South Carolina has passed two sets of laws wholly separate and distinct. They have passed registration laws and election laws; that is, laws to govern the casting of the ballot upon the day of election.

The election laws are constitutional and are not attacked. The registration laws of South Carolina not only impair the right of citizens to vote, but in effect render the exercise of that right impossible to thousands of honest voters.

It is conceded by every member of the committee that the registration laws are unconstitutional.

Mr. LACEY. I should like to ask the gentleman did the Democratic members of the committee agree that this law was unconstitutional?

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. In answer to the gentleman I will say that I have never yet been able to find out what the Democratic members of the committee think about this question. They say they think it is partly unconstitutional and partly constitutional, but where they run the dividing line I have not been able to get them to say. They so state in their report. I am not here to say what the Democratic members of this committee think, except they think the Democrat ought to occupy his seat. [Laughter.]

It is manifest from an inspection of the registration law of South Carolina that it is an almost undisguised attempt to impair the right of citizens to vote under the constitution of that State. It is not a mere regulation of the right of suffrage, as prescribed by the Constitution, but its effect and operation is to obstruct and hinder and subvert the right guaranteed by the fundamental law of the State in the following particulars:

I.

It forever disfranchises and deprives of the right to vote all constitutional voters who were entitled to register in 1882 and failed for any reason to do so. In the able opinion of Judge McIver, of the supreme court of South Carolina, rendered in the case of Matthew C. Butler vs. William Ellerbe et al., on the 6th day of July, 1885, and reported in 2 S. E. Reporter, 425, this construction of the law is maintained. Says Judge McIver in that case:

> The original provisions for the registration of voters will be found in the act approved 9th of February, 1882 (17 Stat. L., page 1110), and these provisions are incorporated in the General Statutes, 1882, beginning with section 89 and ending with section 106, and such provisions, as subsequently amended, are incorporated in the Revised Statutes of 1893 as sections 131-156, both inclusive. From a careful examination of the various statutory provisions thus referred to, it seems to us that the manifest scope and intent of such legislation was that there should be but one general registration of voters, to wit, that provided for in 1882, and that when the registration books were closed for that year a person who was then a qualified voter, but who had failed from any cause, whether from sickness, absence, or other cause, to register, was ever thereafter deprived of the right of suffrage, for there is no provision by which such a person could afterwards be allowed to register; and section 132 of the Revised Statutes expressly declares that "no person shall be allowed to vote at any election hereafter to be held unless he shall have been heretofore registered in conformity with the requirements of chapter 7 of the General Statutes of 1882 and the acts amendatory thereof, or shall be registered as herein required."
> Now, on turning to the chapter of the General Statutes of 1882 and the acts amendatory thereof, we find that while provision is made in section 94 of that chapter, corresponding with section 137 of the Revised Statutes, for opening the books of registration after every general election, not, however, for the purpose of registering voters generally, but "for registration of such persons as shall thereafter become entitled to register" (italics ours), there is no provision for the registration of persons who had previously become entitled to register. Hence it follows necessarily that one who had been a qualified voter, and as such entitled to register before such general election, could not then avail himself of the privilege offered by that section. The language found in section 94 of the General Statutes of 1882 is stronger than that found in section 137 of the Revised Statutes, from which we have quoted, for in the General Statutes of 1882 the language is prohibitory, and forbids reopening the registration books except for the purpose of registration of such persons as shall become entitled to register after the next election; and even as to this privileged class, their day of grace expires on the 1st day of July preceding a general election, something over four months preceding the general election, which is fixed by law for the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November in every second year, reckoning from the year 1870. (Constitution, Article II, section 11; Revised Statutes, section 162.)
> It is true also that sections 96 and 97 of the General Statutes of 1882, as well as the corresponding sections of the Revised Statutes (140 and 141), do make special provisions for a certain class of voters, to wit: Minors who come of age and are otherwise qualified, but this provision is confined to that particular class, and is, therefore, not an impartial provision. It seems to us that this feature of the registration law, to say nothing of other constitutional objections, renders it obnoxious to that provision of the constitution above quoted, which makes it the duty of the general assembly to provide, from time to time, for the registration of all electors. The language of that constitutional provision necessarily implies that its purpose was to require the general assembly to provide every facility for the registration of all electors by providing for the registration of all electors "from time to time," so that, as far as practicable, no elector should be deprived of his right of suffrage, and that this law, which provided for one general registration more than ten years ago, and afforded no other opportunity to any elector except those of a certain class to comply with its provisions, even though his failure to avail himself of the first and only opportunity ever afforded him to register resulted from sickness, absence, or other good cause, must be regarded as a violation both of the spirit and letter of the constitution.

II.

The statute is unreasonable and obstructs the right of the duly qualified voters to register and vote, because it only provides one place of registration in each county, and that at the court-house.

A reasonable regulation for registration should provide certain days for registration at other election precincts in the county.

To require voters to leave their residences and places of business and go long distances, as much as 30 miles, to register tends to obstruct and hinder electors in the exercise of their rights.

III.

The law only allows registration on the first Monday of each month, from December to June, inclusive, and makes no provision for subsequently registering those who, from sickness, absence from home, or other unavoidable reason, were prevented from registering on those days.

IV.

The registration books are required to be closed on the 1st day of July, four months before the general election to be held in the November following, and no persons who were eligible to registration prior to the 1st day of July are allowed to register between that day and the election. This is clearly an unreasonable regulation, and manifestly intended to hinder and obstruct voters in the exercise of their constitutional rights.

V.

The supervisors of registration are to "determine as to the legal qualifications of all applicants for registration by summary process, requiring oath, evidence, or both, if he deem proper, subject to revision by the assistant supervisors and himself, in all cases where he has refused to register an applicant."

The powers conferred upon the supervisors by this section are absolute and unreasonable. There is no limitation upon his power to reject voters except his own will and his views as to the legal qualifications of applicants. He may refuse to register an applicant who makes oath as to his qualifications, and require evidence if he deem proper. The kind and quantity of evidence sufficient to satisfy him are left wholly to his own discretion.

He can register a white man on oath or without, "by summary process," or can refuse to register a colored man on the same oath and require evidence which he knows can not be produced in the case of the colored voter. It is true the refusal of the supervisor to register a voter is subject to revision by the assistant supervisors and himself. But how the revision is to be had, and when and where the assistant supervisors and the supervisor are to meet and consider the question of revision is not prescribed in the law. The rejected voter is left wholly in the dark as to the time and place and manner of such revision. But if he is fortunate enough to bring his application for revision before the supervisor and assistant supervisor and his application is rejected he has the right to review of their decision by the circuit court, "Provided he give notice in writing to the supervisor of his application for such review, and the grounds thereof, within five days from the date of his rejection, and commence his proceedings within ten days from the service of the said notice."

This provision for an appeal is indefinite, cumbersome, and in most cases would be unavailing to the injured party.

To avail himself of this right of appeal it will be necessary to call in the services and assistance of an able lawyer, and the expense would be beyond the means of a large majority of the voters. The time allowed for the notice—five days from day of his rejection, and the commencement of the proceedings within ten days from the service of the said notice—is an unreasonable limitation upon the right of appeal.

VI.

The provisions of the statute with reference to the certificate of registration required of the voter in all cases is an unreasonable regulation and unconstitutional. The name of the voter as recorded on the registration books must correspond exactly and precisely with the name upon the certificate. The certificate must describe accurately the occupation, age, and place of residence of the voter. When a new voting precinct is established the voter is required to get a transfer and get a new certificate, and can not vote without it. If the polling place is changed, the voters are required to surrender the old certificate and get new ones.

If the elector changes his residence, even from one place in the registration precinct to another in the same precinct, he is required to surrender his old certificate and take out a new one or he can not vote. If the certificate is defaced, he must surrender it and get a new one. If it is lost, he is required to make application, under oath, for a new certificate at least thirty days before an election, setting out the facts and circumstances attending the loss, and that he had not bartered or sold it, or parted with it for any pecuniary consideration, and that he had not willfully destroyed the same. Even after a voter has gone through all this trouble, and made the required affidavit as to loss of his certificate, the supervisor is not required to issue a new one; but, in the language of the law, the supervisor shall examine and consider the question and require other evidence under oath, if in his opinion it is necessary to determine the loss, and then, if satisfied, shall issue a renewal.

How long the supervisor shall examine and consider is not stated or limited, nor is it stated what other evidence under oath he may require or what in his opinion may be necessary to determine the loss, nor is it stated what shall satisfy this autocrat of registration. It would be hard indeed to satisfy a partisan Democratic supervisor that a colored voter was entitled to vote under any circumstances or upon any proof.

Another unreasonable regulation is found in the manner in which the supervisor of registration is allowed to refuse registration lists. By section 151 it is provided that a supervisor of registration shall, immediately preceding each election, revise the registration of electors and mark off the names of such electors as have died, and such as removed from one residence, precinct, parish, ward, or county to another without notifying him and obtaining a certificate of transfer.

The power conferred upon the supervisor by this section allows him, without notice to the elector, without legal evidence, and in effect without any evidence at all, to mark off the names of as many electors as he may choose to believe have died or changed their residence since the last registration. And from this arbitrary and one-sided action there is no provision for an appeal or for a review. By the one hundred and fifty-second and one hundred and fifty-third sections the clerks of the courts of general sessions and every trial justice in the State shall, on or before the 15th of October and biennially thereafter, make out a report to the supervisors of registration of their respective counties, a list of all persons convicted during the two preceding years of murder, burglary, larceny, perjury, or other infamous crime, or dueling; and such report shall be received by the supervisor as prima facie proof of the facts stated therein, and he shall immediately erase the names of all such persons from his registration books in his county, and they shall not be allowed to register or vote thereafter in any election in this State. Thus, upon mere report of these officers unaccompanied by any abstract from the record or any other legal evidence, voters may be disfranchised and forever disqualified from voting. It is true there is a proviso that if any person whose name is so furnished shall present to the supervisors within sixty days after the next following election a pardon from the governor or within such time prove to the satisfaction of the supervisor he was not convicted of the crime or misdemeanor stated in such certificate, his name shall be restored to the list of registered voters.

It will be seen that this provision violates all rules of evidence, and especially all rules of criminal evidence, by requiring a party charged with crime to prove his innocence to the satisfaction of such supervisor before he can be restored to his rights. In the language of the statute, he must "prove to the satisfaction of such supervisor that he was not convicted of the crime or misdemeanor stated in such certificate." Such a requirement is not a regulation of suffrage, but an unjust and unreasonable requirement, and one which not only obstructs the right to vote, but destroys that right.

It will further be noticed that the voter who is thus stricken from the registration list on or before the 15th day of October is not allowed to prove his innocence or claim the benefit of the pardon until sixty days after the next election, thereby absolutely disqualifying him and depriving him, without a remedy or without a hearing, of his vote at the next November election.

VII.

The provision of the law requiring that voters shall deposit nine different ballots in as many different boxes is unreasonable and manifestly intended to confuse and embarrass the voter in the exercise of his right, and to render the voting by ballot impracticable and in many instances impossible. That a ballot in legal form and cast by an elector who is entitled to vote and who does vote for a member of Congress should be cast out and made null and void merely because it is placed in one box when it should be deposited in another is an unreasonable regulation and deprives the voter of his right to have his ballot counted, which right is guaranteed to him by the Constitution.

VIII.

The manner in which the law is executed, as shown by the evidence, is a gross outrage. In the first place, the whole machinery of the election is placed in the hands of the Democratic party, and at a large majority of the voting places, if not at all of them, all the officers of election—the superintendent of registration, the manager of election, the clerks, and constables—are all of one political faith.

Such action is prima facie evidence of fraud, and the party placing itself in such an attitude should be required to prove that the elections and registrations and returns were fair and honest. The evidence shows that gross frauds were perpetrated in preventing negroes from registering; that intimidation was resorted to on the day of election.

IX.

The registration, being unconstitutional, is null and void, and as a consequence there were no registration laws in force in South Carolina on the 6th of November, 1894. All citizens of that State having the constitutional qualifications of voters under the constitution of South Carolina and who are entitled to vote for the most numerous branch of the general assemby of that State were entitled to vote for members of Congress at that election. And every voter entitled to vote for member of Congress whose vote was rejected for want of registration or for want of certificate of registration was illegally deprived of his suffrage, and his vote should be counted for the party for whom he desired to vote and for whom he was prevented from voting. It is proved that there were 7,336 legal voters excluded who were present at the polls on the day of election and would have voted for the contestant if they had been allowed to cast their ballots.

Now, right here we meet one question. What is the rejection of a voter? Gentlemen will tell you that a voter is not rejected unless he goes to the judges of election and offers and actually tenders his vote over the desk. I take issue with that proposition. The tender of the vote and the rejection of a voter does not depend upon any such narrow construction. I am reminded that most of them did actually tender their votes, but some of them did not. Now, what is a rejection? Right there I desire to notice a very ingenious but a very misleading argument offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DEARMOND]. He said that it was proved by five witnesses, managers of election, that only 50 votes were rejected, when affidavits and depositions were taken to show that 250 votes were rejected. Gentlemen do not tell this House that the votes, that the rejected votes, were not all of them actually tendered to the judges, because it was unnecessary, and because proclamation had been made that it was useless for men who did not hold certificates of registration to apply to vote, because they would be rejected. Therefore the attempt is made to attach the crime of perjury to these men who state that only 50 were rejected. The judges perhaps were right in one sense, because perhaps only 50 at that precinct were actually refused by the managers, but the remainder were men who had been told not to apply and not to offer their ballots, because they would be rejected, and that excused them from actually tendering the ballots to the judges. That is the law as laid down by all the authorities and is sustained by all the decisions of this House.

It is insisted by gentlemen that the elector, in order that his vote may be considered, must actually present himself at the polls and actually tender himself to the election managers as ready and willing to vote, and actually tender his ballot and have it rejected. This as a general proposition of law may be true, and it is true when applied to the case of a voter who had an opportunity to present himself to the managers of election and without excuse failed to do so. But the rule can not apply to a case like the one before us, where it is contended an unconstitutional law deprives the voter of his right, and where the voter knew that the provisions and requirements of such unconstitutional law rendered it useless and unnecessary for him to attempt to vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. I should like some further time.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, it was my understanding that we were to be permitted additional time. I have no time at my disposal. I think it is just to the minority that it have some more time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin has some time left.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I do not understand that the gentleman from Indiana has asked me for any time. I am certainly willing to accommodate him as far as possible; but I now yield the floor to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] for ten minutes.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I believe it is one of the dogmas of the Republican creed that we should have honest elections and honest counts; and I have always believed that this doctrine applied not only to the procedure at the polls, but that it applied on the floor of this House; and the question before us to-day is whether we shall have an honest count of the ballots that were cast in the Congressional election now under consideration. It is conceded on all hands that there was no real fraud practiced upon the voters at that election, unless it be said that the operation of the registration law itself operated as a fraud. That did undoubtedly to some extent deter them from offering their votes on that occasion. It seems to me to be pretty clear that the registration law itself was unconstitutional when measured by the limitations of the constitution of South Carolina. But any registration law, Mr. Speaker, will be found in practical operation to exclude some voters. However perfect you may make it, in every State of this Union the registration law, if there be one in force, necessarily, in its practical application to the casting of votes by the people of a whole district, works more or less disaster and more or less unfairness. Men will be excluded who ought to be included; men will be included who ought to be excluded. That is one of the incidents that attach to all human legislation. You can never make it perfect. But this law was grossly imperfect. It practically disfranchises every voter in the State of South Carolina who failed for any reason whatever to get his name upon the registration list as early as the 1st day of July, to prepare himself to vote on the succeeding first Tuesday in November. But be that as it may; concede for the purpose of this inquiry that the law is unconstitutional, what is left? Why, then the election that is held, if it be held in accordance with other law and in accordance with the requirements of the constitution itself, must be disposed of on that ground. It does not follow that because the registration law was unconstitutional that therefore no election—no legal election—has been held. On the contrary, I affirm that there must necessarily be a legal election. The Federal Constitution itself requires the State of South Carolina to send her delegates to this body, and if the State of South Carolina—without meddling with the methods of sending those Representatives here in a way that defeats the requirements of the Federal Constitution that we shall have Representatives from South Carolina—can do so under the State laws or the remaining body of the election laws of the State of South Carolina, and an election has been had that is fair and represents the will of the people, the gentleman who secures that election should have his seat in this House.

Now, then, Mr. Speaker, it is said in this case that the contestant should be seated because there were 7,000 and more legal voters who intended to vote for him. Well, upon the general proposition I would assume that we are to count the votes that are actually cast, and not those that somebody proposed to cast. That is the rule that we apply in our own cases. We come here with a certificate certifying that we actually received so many votes. But here is a case where a contestant comes, not with a certificate that he received so many votes actually cast, but with a petition—that is what it is called, and that is, therefore, what I will call it—a petition signed by 7,000 who intended to vote for this man.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. POWERS. I have not time to yield.

Now, how do these voters prove their right to vote and their attempt to vote for Colonel Johnston? I agree that, as in the case cited by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL]—the Petersburg case—where the voters stand in line with the ballots in their hands in front of the judges of election, ready to deposit their ballots in the box, and they are deprived of their right to cast that ballot—that upon their testimony that they intended to cast that particular ballot for some particular person they prove that they did, to all intents and purposes, vote for that man. But that is lacking in this case. Now, I desire to call the attention of the House to the exact import of these petitions and the exact measure of proof that we have that these 7,000 men intended to vote for Colonel Johnston, and that they had a right to vote for Colonel Johnston. It has been stated by the chairman of the committee that these petitions had printed headings that were prepared in advance of election. Now, that is a significant fact. That signifies that Colonel Johnston and his friends, instead of waiting for a fraud to be committed, went to the polls prepared to take proof that a fraud was committed. So that the language of that petition is not the language embodied by the voter himself, but he is telling his story about a wrong that somebody else prepared in advance, and the voter is asked to indorse it.

Mr. STEELE. And does indorse it.

Mr. POWERS. And does indorse it. Now, let us see what the effect of that is. I shall not take the time to read this petition. It has been read; but somebody certifies what the voter thinks. The House will notice that no way, either in the testimony or in the petition, is it stated to be under oath. It is the mere naked declaration of somebody, not testified to by himself, but testified to by a third person; so that it is nothing more nor less than hearsay testimony; a kind of testimony that would not be received on the trial of a man charged with the enormous crime of shooting a dog. Now, what does the list keeper say? The first one that I come to is this:

> Personally appeared before me, Edward Lewis, who, on oath, says that he had charge of the petition on election day last November, that it was explained to each one before signing, that each one whose name is hereunto attached, signed, or authorized his name to be signed, in the presence of deponent.

There is no certificate whatever that these voters offered their votes, or that they were qualified to vote, but simply a certificate that they signed the petition.

Take the next one:

> Personally appeared before me ——— ———, a notary public, who on oath says that he was in charge of this petition on election day last, and that each citizen who was rejected by election managers came up and signed, or authorized to be signed, his name; that each and every one was thoroughly informed as to the nature of the petition.

That is all the certificate there is in that case. Take the next one:

> Personally appeared before me ——— ———, who on oath says that each signer was informed of the nature of the petition before signing, and they each and every one signed in the presence of deponent, who had charge of the petition during the entire day.

It does not even say whether it was this particular petition or not, but simply that they signed a petition. Each one of these certificates certifies to these general facts. Then when you come to the signatures they run like this: James (his x mark) Fox, Taylor (his x mark) Edwards, Richard (his x mark) Belton, and so on. It is easy to see that the man who framed these petitions in advance and went, by his agents, to the various polling places among an ignorant set of voters could get any kind of a certificate out of them that he saw fit to ask.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JENKINS. I yield the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. POWERS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to address myself to the legal proposition which was advanced here yesterday, that this kind of testimony is admissible on the ground that it is a declaration which is made admissible as part of the res gestæ. I submit very confidently to every lawyer on the floor of this House that this evidence has no single element that brings it within the rule that a declaration can be made admissible as part of the res gestæ. These declarations were not made accompanying any act, and it is a fundamental legal proposition that before a declaration can be admitted as a part of the res gestæ it must be shown to be not only contemporaneous with, but explanatory of, the fact that is spoken of by the witness.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The gentleman, I suppose, does not undertake to say that these declarations were made at a time different from the day of election, or that they were made at a place other than the polling place, or in reference to any other subject than the casting of the votes there.

Mr. POWERS. I undertake to say, in answer to my friend, that upon each and every one of the grounds he has enumerated in his inquiry these declarations are not admissible as a part of the res gestæ. Take the case of a dying man—where these questions come in more frequently than elsewhere—he makes a declaration about the facts of his injury. If that declaration is made by him after the injury, the courts all say that it is a mere narration of a past event, but if he makes a declaration at the time his assailant is at work upon him that is a contemporaneous declaration, and serves to explain his own conduct in the matter, and it is therefore admissible as a part of the res gestæ.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is that rule applicable to cases where men are injured in accidents?

Mr. POWERS. That rule is applicable everywhere. There is no distinction between civil and criminal cases in this respect, and I invoke every text-book that treats of the subject in support of what I say.

Mr. TAWNEY. They will all refute you.

Mr. POWERS. None of them will.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. POWERS. I can not stop for a question now; I have but three minutes.

Mr. NORTHWAY. You have made a statement that needs contradiction.

Mr. POWERS. Then answer it in your own time.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that in order to make a declaration admissible as a part of the res gestæ, it must be contemporaneous with the act itself, or so near it as to prevent any possibility of self-interest creeping in to vary or influence it.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. POWERS. I can not be interrupted.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Stick to the record, then.

Mr. POWERS. I will not be interrupted. I am simply stating the law as set forth by Greenleaf and Best and by every writer on this subject, and if any gentleman can produce an authority to the contrary he is at liberty to produce it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I can produce it.

Mr. POWERS. Produce it, then, in your own time, but do not interrupt me.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I say that these parties who went up and offered their votes were engaged in the transaction which constituted the res gestæ, but when they went across the street or elsewhere and saw a man seated in a wagon and made declarations to him about it, those declarations were in no proper sense a part of the res gestæ.

Mr. TAWNEY. What is the res gestæ?

Mr. POWERS. The res gestæ is the thing that is going on.

Mr. TAWNEY. Was not that a part of it?

Mr. POWERS. No, sir. The thing that was going on was the voting at that election, and what those men chose to say about it afterwards was a subsequent narration, not a part of the thing itself.

Mr. TAWNEY. Not if made immediately afterwards?

Mr. POWERS. If made a second afterwards; if the transaction is ended, that excludes it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have been interrupted by several gentlemen who say they can contradict me on this proposition. I challenge any one of them to produce a law book or any authority from a respectable court that contradicts it.

Mr. OVERSTREET (holding a book in his hand). Will the gentleman read this authority?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. My point against the gentleman from Vermont was not that he misstated the law, but that he made a wrong application of it to this case.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JENKINS. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WALKER].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] has no time at present. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] is recognized.

Mr. JONES. I yield my time to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS. I now yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, when I was cut off in my remarks I was asserting the proposition of law that the rejection of a voter does not mean simply the rejection of a man who actually applied to the judges and was refused the right to vote, but that it applied to men where classes of voters were excluded. The language of the law is (I read from McCrary on Elections, section 200):

> And in such a case, if the erroneous rule affects a class of voters and it has become generally known to the persons who are excluded by it, they may submit to it without waiving any rights, although they do not present themselves at the polls and offer their ballots. They have the right to take notice of the decision of the board in other cases precisely like their own.
> To require each voter belonging to a class of excluded voters to go through the form of presenting his ballot and having a separate ruling in each case would be an idle and useless formality. We are to look at the substance and not the formality.
> After a decision has been made by the election officers affecting the right of a class of persons to vote, and that decision becomes known, it is not necessary that every voter belonging to such class should offer his vote and have it formally rejected.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Is not that statement of the law based upon the proposition that there was no election in that particular case?

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. I think not.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I think it is.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. I think not.

As is shown by the evidence in this case, the managers of election ruled early in the day that persons not having certificates of registration would not be allowed to vote, and they made proclamation to this effect at the polling places. This ruling was communicated to voters far and near who were on their way to the polls and were met and turned back on account of this ruling.

This principle has been sustained by the House of Representatives in a number of contested election cases. (See following cases in Digest of Contested Election Cases of the Fifty-first Congress: Miller vs. Elliott, 515; Goodrich vs. Bullit, 584; Mudd vs. Compton, 153; Waddill vs. Wise, 224.)

It seems clear, therefore, that the votes rejected as set forth in the lists furnished by the contestant and which are proved by the list keepers should be counted for the contestant.

But it is said the officers of election were guilty of no fraud and that they did their duty under the law. Mr. Speaker, if gentlemen mean by this that the election officers, all of whom belonged to the Democratic party, were guilty of no fraud, they have not read the evidence in this case. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND], and I understood he was indorsed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL], says that the election was fairly held in a general way, and that there is no evidence of fraud; that the officers of election attempted in good faith to observe the law.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I desire to say to my friend that I made no such statement.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Then I misunderstood the gentleman, and I cheerfully make the correction. Certainly that was the statement of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND], as can be seen by reference to the RECORD of this morning.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if the gentlemen mean to say that there are not many evidences of fraud upon the day of election, I accept the statement. But gentlemen know, and the record sustains the statement, that there was no necessity for fraud on the day of election. The fraud had been committed before—in the registration—which made the success and the return of the Democratic candidate a certainty beyond a reasonable doubt. There was no necessity for committing fraud on the day of election, because before that day the question had been settled by the grossest frauds ever committed upon the elective franchise of any people. Why, sir, the supervisors of registration were all Democratic officials; so were all the election officers in the State of South Carolina—all Democrats. And I say here now that whenever it is shown that every election officer at a given election belongs to one party it is prima facie evidence of fraud.

Why, Mr. Speaker, these supervisors of registration in effect denied the right of registration to voters. There was only one place of registration in each county. Voters desiring to register were required to go on foot or as best they could in order to reach the place, 25 or 30 miles away, perhaps, where they were required to register. Not only that, but the registration days were on the first Monday of each month from December till July, and on no other day could they be allowed to register. The proof in this case shows that the supervisors of registration came to the places of registration at 9 or 10 o'clock in the morning; that they dallied and fooled with the registration, and, as one witness expressed it, were the slowest men with the pen that he ever saw. They would require hundreds of men to stand in line all day when those men were of opposite politics. But whenever a Democrat came up he was promptly and immediately registered. Republican voters were told, "Stand back; we have no time to attend to you now." Some were too old and some too young to register. These supervisors would hold the poll open an hour or two in the morning, then adjourn for dinner; stay away two or three hours, and on their return hold the registry open an hour or two, and then go home, saying to those who had failed to secure registration, "Come back the first Monday of next month." When they came back on the first Monday of the next month, the same thing occurred. It is known that in some cases men attended on every registration day, six times in the year, and could never obtain registration.

When persons were registered they were furnished with a certificate of registration, which was numbered, and the number had to correspond with the name and number upon the book. When the voters went to the polls it was found that hundreds of these registration certificates did not correspond with the entries on the books. A man would be rejected, for instance, because when he presented his certificate—No. 110, we will suppose—the election officers would say, "Your name as entered here is No. 109." How did such things occur? The cases of that kind were so numerous that it can not be assumed that they arose from mistake or accident. By all the rules of circumstantial evidence we have the right to suppose that it was intentionally done. Gentlemen talk about there having been no frauds. These are illustrations of the frauds committed, not on the day of the election, but before the election—frauds which rendered it unnecessary to commit any on the day of the election.

Now, Mr. Speaker, my time is so limited that I find myself very much embarrassed in dealing with the points in this case. The evidence of these frauds appears in the result of the election. On the day of the election the contestee received 7,361 votes; the contestant only 3,090. There were rejected 7,336 votes. In other words, the rejected votes lacked only 25 of equaling the number given for the contestee. Two-fifths of the whole number of voters who went to the polls were rejected. Three-fourths of all the Republican voters who presented themselves at the polls were rejected. Hundreds of voters, as is shown, stayed away from the polls—did not offer to vote, because, being Republican voters, they knew that under the unconstitutional registration laws of South Carolina their votes would be rejected for want of the certificate of registration, or for want of some other formality required by that unconstitutional law. Almost every one of the votes rejected was rejected for failure to comply with some one or more of the provisions of the unconstitutional registration laws. This alone is sufficient to defeat the contestee.

Mr. Speaker, I ask in all seriousness whether the votes of American citizens are to be trifled with in this manner? I ask members of this House whether they can say that a man is honestly elected and returned to this House when as many votes are rejected as the number of votes he received? I say not. I say that the man who claims to be entitled to a seat in this House must show that he has received a plurality of the honest votes that were tendered at the election.

But, recognizing this, the able chairman of the committee takes the position that there was no election. Now, will it be held by this House that in this case, where it is shown that 7,336 votes were tendered, and tendered by men who are proved to have been Republicans, who were known to be supporters of the contestant, and whose votes are rejected, will it be claimed that the contestant shall be turned down and the case referred back to the people for another election? If he goes back, does he go back to be elected by the same electors? Is it contended that he will go back under the same conditions and circumstances that prevailed when the former election was held? No. We have a new election law in South Carolina by which an educational and a property qualification are prescribed as prerequisite to the right to vote. "Ah," gentlemen say, "that law does not go into effect until the 1st of next November." But the governor of South Carolina has the right to fix the time for the election, and he will not fix that time until the new law goes into effect, you may rest assured of that.

Even if you send the contestant home again to be voted for he will not be voted for by the same voters; you will not submit his rights to the same tribunal to which it was submitted before. Things have changed since then. Why, gentlemen on the other side admit that there was fraud; they admit that there is an unconstitutional law, and yet they come forward and seek to shelter themselves behind the technicalities of the law. They shelter themselves behind the strict rules of evidence applicable to a criminal or to a nisi prius trial. I claim that the members of the House are bound by no ironclad rules of evidence. I claim that there is in the House the power to do right and to do justice, but not to sanction fraud. The same gentlemen say that we must be governed by the strict rules of evidence, and that we must try the case by the strictest technicalities of the law; themselves strain at gnats when it comes to counting votes of honest electors and swallow the grossest frauds committed by sworn election officers.

Now, if I can be allowed a minute, I propose to show that the tally lists are properly counted; that they are part of the res gestæ. Why, gentlemen say and contend that the res gestæ mean just what occurred before and in the presence of the managers of the election. I contend that the res gestæ are extended to and embrace not only what occurred in the immediate presence of the judges of the election, but what occurred from the time the elector received his ballot, passed into the booth, prepared and delivered it to the managers, and until he returned and announced immediately before witnesses then and there what took place. The lists that we count are all composed of the names of men who went into the booths and were rejected. They are made up, as I have shown, of men who immediately turned, after their rejection, and made their declaration and gave their names to the list keeper. I hold it is not only part of the res gestæ but it is the best and only evidence of which the case is capable.

How would you prove that 7,000 voters were rejected? Gentlemen say you must have the best evidence. The best evidence is insisted upon, and they say you must bring every one of the 7,000 men to the book and take his testimony. If that be insisted upon, it is a practical exclusion of justice. It is insisting upon an impossibility. Why, all a candidate need do if he desires to make his frauds unimpeachable would be to make them so great, so extensive, that you could not reach them by evidence. If he defrauded 10 men, you might prove it by the evidence of the 10 men; but if he defrauded 10,000 men you make the fraud so great that it is impossible to expose it by the testimony of the parties themselves.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the names of the voters who were thus excluded were taken down by the list keepers on the day of the election and either immediately at the polls or within a very short distance thereof. This was done openly and publicly, and in one case at least so publicly that the Democratic officers of election ordered the list keepers away and compelled them to take a position farther off. In other words, these men were so close to the polls that the managers and officers of election drove them away. The depositions of these list keepers were taken and will be found in the record in this case. They prove the following facts: First, that all the persons whose names are upon the list were at the polls on that date. Every man whose name is on the list was proved to be there on that day. Second, as soon as they were rejected they reported to the list keepers in person and claimed that they intended to vote for the contestant and were refused. It is contended by the contestee that this is not strict legal evidence to establish the rights of those persons to vote and that they can not be counted for the contestant for that reason. The counsel for the contestee contends that there is no legal proof that such persons were legal voters, possessing the qualifications required by the constitution, which are as follows:

First. That they were over 21 years of age.
Second. That they had resided in the State twelve months and in the county sixty days.
Third. That they were not laboring under some of the disabilities mentioned in the constitution.

In reply we think that the evidence furnished was the very best which, under the circumstances of the case, it was possible to obtain. The statements made by the rejected voters and the list taken by the keepers at the time and place where the elections were being held were part of the res gestæ. It was the very best evidence that it was practicable to obtain without examining on oath each and every one of the 7,336 voters illegally excluded and prevented from casting their ballots. To require the taking of all this evidence would render a contest impossible to the contestant.

The persons whose names are on the excluded list did not vote at the election, because their names are not found on the list of persons voting. The poll list shows this and is conclusive proof against the contestee that they did not vote.

The registration books will also show whether the names found on said lists are upon the registration books.

These books are in the possession of the Democratic officers, and it would have been an easy task to show whether the persons whose names are on the lists were on the registration books or not.

The lists were put in evidence by the contestant, and the contestee had ample time to inspect the lists and compare them with the registration books; to inquire whether the persons claiming to have their votes counted were legally qualified voters under the constitution. No evidence is offered by the contestee to contradict the facts sought to be established by the said lists.

First. No evidence is offered to prove that a single voter whose name is on the list was not present at the voting place on the day of election.

Second. No evidence is offered to prove that the names of any of the said persons were not on the registration books.

Third. It is not attempted by the contestee to prove that a single one of the 7,336 voters were not citizens of the State of South Carolina, having resided in the State one year and in the county sixty days before the election.

Fourth. It is not shown that any of the persons claiming to be rejected actually voted on that day.

Fifth. Is is not shown that any of the persons embraced in said lists were disqualified from voting by reason of conviction of infamous crime, larceny, or dueling.

It is said that the party claiming that his vote should be counted must show that the voter offered to vote; that he is a legally qualified voter in all respects; and that to require the opposite party to prove that he is not a legally qualified voter is to require proof of a negative.

Now, we deny the first branch of this proposition in the broad terms in which it is asserted. When a citizen who is registered as a voter applies to an officer of election to vote, and his vote is objected to and challenged on a single ground and is rejected on that ground alone, it is and must be taken as prima facie evidence that the ground of objection made is the only objection relied upon and the only objection which exists. When a voter removes that objection and none other is made against him, his vote must be received. He is not called upon or required to prove without further challenge that he is possessed of all the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution. So when the 7,336 Republican voters were rejected solely on the ground that they had not been registered or did not produce satisfactory certificates of registration at a time when there was no valid registration law in the State of South Carolina, the presumption arose that there was no other objection to their voting and that they possessed the qualifications requisite to the exercise of the right of suffrage.

On the second branch, that the contestee is required to prove a negative, we reply that the person challenging a registered voter is always required to prove that the voter is not qualified, and such a requirement does not amount to negative proof; nor is it true, as a proposition of law, that the party can never be required to prove a negative.

The fact that a voter is registered is prima facie evidence that he is a legal elector, possessed of all the qualifications required by the law, and the person who challenges a registered voter must state the ground of his challenge and prove it, though it requires him to prove a negative.

The divergent views of the members of the committee result from the different interpretations of the rules of evidence to be applied by the House in this case. The able chairman of the committee concedes that the evidence clearly establishes such frauds upon the part of the election officers as render the election void, but he holds to the view that the evidence is not sufficient to count the rejected votes or any part of them in favor of the contestant. Four of the members of the majority ignore all the rejected votes, while the fifth concedes that a portion of the rejected votes should be counted for contestant, but splits hairs upon technical rules of evidence and fails to count enough to elect him. The majority ignore the frauds practiced by the election officers in coming to a conclusion, but the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS], in his very able and exhaustive speech in favor of the majority report, gives away his case when he uses the following language:

No matter how obnoxious it may be to us, we should see to it that the will of the people as declared at the ballot box is carried out. That will include condemnation of fraud and intimidation. Every effort ought to be made to have free and fair elections. It is the very substructure of government. Murder, robbery, and horse stealing should have a secondary consideration compared with the great questions involved in a free, fair election and an absolutely honest count. Any attempt at dishonesty in elections should not only be frowned upon and condemned, but those responsible for it should be punished to the full extent of the law, ostracized, and absolutely disqualified from ever participating in elections or holding any office of profit or trust. So important has the question become that it is one of the highest duties of citizenship to demand that nothing shall be more sacred than the right of the citizen to vote and have his vote counted.

All dangers of a man losing his vote by reason of technicalities should be removed. Fair and just registration and election laws should not only be favored but fairly and honestly enforced, and this political right should be so prominently advanced that it will be highly prized by every American citizen.

No American citizen can afford to uphold fraud in elections, whether he be in the North or in the South.

The safety of the individual and the success of the nation depend upon a free ballot and fair count and absolute conformity to law. It will not require any argument to prove that the lawful electors of South Carolina are by the requirements of the statute deprived of their constitutional rights, and that the statute does impair the rights of electors and imposes conditions and makes unreasonable and burdensome requirements not warranted by the constitution; and I think the law is void.

It seemed almost like a denial of justice to require the evidence of the rejected voter himself, or, what might answer as well, the evidence of a person who stood close enough to the ballot box to hear all that was said and could testify that he saw A tender his vote and heard him say that he wanted to vote for the contestant, and that his vote was refused because he was not registered; and it should appear by the testimony of A, or some one else knowing the facts, that the rejected voter was a qualified elector of the precinct where offering to vote.

Hard cases make a shipwreck of principles, and while the power of the House is very great, and while I think we ought not to be controlled by technical rules of evidence, I believe it very safe to be governed in these cases by common-law rules of evidence, and do not think we ought to formulate a rule for the government of any particular case; but think that every case can well afford to be proven by well-established rules of evidence that have come down to us through the many years of our jurisprudence, and that the case should be ruled without reference to the numbers of the rejected vote.

The gentleman in these eloquent words admits fraud and intimidation and raises a freeman's voice in behalf of a free ballot and a fair count; and yet the result reached by the majority of the committee and sanctioned by him gives full effect to the most outrageous frauds practiced under cover of an unconstitutional law. He admits and says in words that—

The lawful electors of South Carolina are, by the requirements of the statute, deprived of their constitutional rights, and the statute does impair the rights of electors and imposes conditions and makes unreasonable and burdensome requirements not warranted by the constitution.

And yet the gentleman insists that the contestee is honestly elected and that the action of the election officers of South Carolina should be approved and sanctioned. But the gentlemen who favor the majority report insist that this case must be disposed of, not upon its merits but according to the strict rules of law; that we must ignore justice and lay down rules for the government of future cases. In short, that we must do evil that good may come; do injustice to-day in order to avoid the possibility of doing injustice hereafter.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] expresses this idea when he exclaims, "Hard cases make a shipwreck of principles."

This is the special pleading of one who sees and admits the hardship and injustice of seating the contestee, and honestly seeks to do justice, but sticks in the bark of precedents and hesitates before imaginary evils. Every case must be decided by its own circumstances, and this House can not be bound by any iron rule of law or precedent to do wrong.

The only ground upon which it can be asked to set aside this election and order a new one is that it is not proved by legal evidence that the contestant received a sufficient number of votes to give him a majority. It is clear from the evidence in the record in this case that if the contestant did not receive a majority of the votes cast at the election he was unlawfully deprived of them by the partisan manner in which the laws were executed, by frauds in the election practiced by the contestee or his political friends, and by intimidation and illegal practices. To allow the contestee and his friends to obtain any advantage from their own wrong would be to offer a premium for such practices. It is but the exercise of a well-established rule of equity, that no man shall take advantage of his own wrong, and that when fraud is once proved all presumptions are against the wrongdoer.

If the purity of the ballot box is to be preserved, if the right of every qualified voter to have his ballot cast according to his wish and counted as cast is to be preserved, if the right of a majority of the electors, as expressed through the ballot box, to choose their representatives in Congress is to be protected and preserved, it must be done by the representatives of all the people of these United States in Congress assembled.

It is vain for the people of South Carolina to expect protection from their State laws or from the officers who are chosen to administer them. If fraud, intimidation, and unjust laws administered in a partisan spirit oppress the citizens of the State of South Carolina in the exercise of their domestic affairs and deprive them of representation in the halls of the State legislature, it behooves the House of Representatives of the United States to see that citizens of the United States are not made the victims of State tyranny and are not deprived of representation in the halls of the National Legislature by unconstitutional laws or by fraudulent practices.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. I do not like to ask the indulgence of the House, but I have not disturbed it very much during the session. I have but little further to say, and would ask unanimous consent to conclude my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman from Virginia concluding his remarks?

Mr. KEM. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KEM] objects.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Then I will ask permission to insert the balance of my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. KEM. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KEM] objects. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KEM] objects.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. I trust the day may come when Mr. KEM will forget to object.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Would it be in order for the gentleman to move to print his remarks in the RECORD?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It could only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I wish it were possible for me to make myself heard by every gentleman who must finally determine this case as a juror and as a judge of the law and the facts.

I consider that the right of a gentleman to a seat in the House of Representatives, under our form of Government, is what may properly be called a sacred right.

There is in this case an attempt upon the part of an interested gentleman to wrest from another man a seat that he now holds by virtue of the law, and I do not know, for my part, how gentlemen are to determine this very important question unless they are familiar with the facts that are involved in this case.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, to all of my Republican associates on the floor of this House that if they will sit down and canvass this testimony as carefully as I have canvassed it for months they will have no hesitation in coming to the same conclusion that a majority of the committee have come to in this case.

I want to say to every gentleman upon the floor of this House that there is no more question about the right of the contestee to his seat in this House than there is to the right of any other gentleman upon the floor of this House. I believe that he holds it according to law, and I do firmly believe as a lawyer, as a citizen, and as a member of this House that to undertake, under the law in this case and upon the facts as I shall present them to this House, to take that man's seat away from him would be deliberate fraud not only upon him, but upon the sovereign State of South Carolina.

I do not hesitate to say that as a Republican. I have given a large amount of time, as the chairman of this committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], can testify, to the consideration of this case. I have gone over every word of this evidence time and again, and I want to assert to this House that up to this moment the underlying facts in this case, that must govern it, and that ought to determine the right to this seat, have not been presented to this House. I am willing that you should take the most partisan lawyer who sits upon the Republican side of this House, and if it could be referred to him as a referee, I would refer this case to him and abide by his decision, if he would only examine the facts.

There is a great mistake made, Mr. Speaker, at the very threshold of this case. Many gentlemen attach too much importance, in my judgment, to what they call the power of this House. In other words, they look upon it as though this was a House having a power unto itself, that there was no appeal, that there was no limit to its power, and that no one had a right to criticise its action. While I recognize the high constitutional power of this House, I say, Mr. Speaker, that it must consider that constitutional power in connection with an implied power, that this House has the right of judging of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members according to the law and the evidence.

Now, as a member of this House and of the Elections Committee, with eighteen cases pending before that committee, I have had the honor to participate in the decisions of that committee. When I sat down to determine those cases I knew of no other guide but to anchor myself to the law and the evidence as I understood it, not as some other gentlemen understood it. I was guided in all my deliberations by the law and the evidence in this case. In other words, I have tried to treat this case and every case that came within my jurisdiction exactly as a judge would upon the bench, and not as a politician would upon the rostrum when he was addressing a political convention.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. JENKINS. For one question.

Mr. HEPBURN. You have stated that you were guided by the law. Have you been guided by the provisions of the statute of South Carolina in the cases that you have examined from that State, with regard to the method of ascertaining the intent of the voter? Have you felt that the law of South Carolina was obligatory upon you with reference to ascertaining the intent? Probably with reference to the qualifications of the voter it would control, but does it control you in the other respect?

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I can not answer all the questions now that may be asked in a discussion like this, but I think, before I get through, my very learned legal friend from Iowa will be satisfied with my explanation. I want to continue my line of thought, and I shall be willing, at the close of it, to answer any question; but the question that is now asked me is not involved in this case.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in connection with this one thought as to the constitutional power of this House, there is another constitutional provision that must be considered by this House in determining this question, and that is, Mr. Speaker, that the Constitution of the United States, which governs us, has placed the power withia the States to determine the entire question of electing members of Congress. There is also a power lying within the Constitution which permits, not the House, but the Congress of the United States, to also regulate the manner of electing Representatives, but up to this day the Congress has never asserted its constitutional power in this regard. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding that a sovereign State may not do just exactly what is right, I insist as a lawyer that there is no power within either of the Houses of Congress separately to override the law of a sovereign State as far as this question is concerned. I say that the law of a sovereign State at this time, providing for the election of members of this House, is absolutely binding upon this House according to the Constitution of the United States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is a position that I am willing to leave to the country. I do not care to submit it to a politician, but I insist that, sitting here to-day, this House ought to carefully guard these great questions. Gentlemen sitting around me here to-day have said that the time has come when we ought to reach out the strong arm of this House and assert Republican rights in those States, but I want to say to the House and the country, as I replied to those gentlemen, that there is danger lurking in positions of that kind. The very first duty that devolves upon this House is to be governed by the law itself. I tell you that the Republican party has lost more power in this country by usurping rights that never belonged to it under the Constitution than it has by any other thing it has to combat.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Will you permit me to ask you a question?

Mr. JENKINS. One question; but if I am to be constantly interrupted I can not present my views in this matter.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Will you be kind enough to state what power the Republican party has usurped?

Mr. JENKINS. I will open a law school and gladly admit you, but I can not now.

Mr. STEELE. You have made a declaration you have no right to make unless you offer something to substantiate it.

Mr. JENKINS. I do not want to be interrupted by these gentlemen unless it is necessary.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I say that I have the right to my views upon this question; and I have a right to present them to this House. I do not expect that everything that I may say as a matter of law will accord with the views of every other gentleman; but I am submitting my own views. I am speaking here in answer to those gentlemen who insist that whenever we have the power to elect a Republican we should exercise that right. I say that we are just as much under the influence and power of the law in this Congress as the humblest citizen in the United States. I say now that if there is any attempt to do what is wrong, if there is any attempt to do unlawful things, any attempt to violate the Constitution, let the Democrats do it, as they have continuously been doing. I do not want that charge successfully made against the Republican party.

I say as a general proposition that I assume that some of the States of the South have not done their duty. They have not conformed to the law, but we should not make matters worse by stepping in and absolutely violating the law and counting a man in here when the law does not justify it. I am only standing here upon the law.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in personal defense of myself I want to answer one little thrust made at me yesterday; and I am sorry that the remarks are not in the RECORD, so that I could do no gentleman any injustice about the matter. A question was flauntingly asked and answered in this House with reference to my voting with the Democrats. Well, now, Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I need to enter into any defense of my Republicanism. I stood here from April, 1861, to July, 1865, with a musket defending the principles of the Republican party in my very feeble way. For over twenty-five years I have been a humble member of the Republican party; and I can say what few other gentlemen on this floor can say—I never was guilty of voting for a Democrat in my life, and by God's help never will. [Laughter.] There is something not common between the Democracy and myself; but when a matter like this is intrusted to me as a member of this House I am going to discharge my full duty without any reference to politics. Now, then, I propose to answer the question the gentleman from Indiana asked yesterday upon this floor with reference to my position in this matter, and that is all I want. I want to know—as it is now stated that the record shows that against seating the contestant in this case there were 6 votes out of 9—3 Democrats and 3 Republicans—in the committee——

Mr. OVERSTREET. Did I not admit that?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I do not. I insist, Mr. Speaker, that I am supported by most excellent authority, by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], who has honorably served in this Congress and in previous Congresses in election cases, and by the very able gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CODDING], both concurring with my views that the contestant in this case is not entitled to the seat. So far I have very honorable support in my proposition. We did not come to a conclusion in a hurry. It took months of hard work to get down to a conclusion in this matter. The only difference is that Brother CODDING, as able a lawyer as there is in Pennsylvania, disagrees with me, and says that some of the lists can be counted, while he goes far enough to hold the minority report in this case was wrong. I am supported in my conclusions by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] that you can not count a single vote on these lists.

Now, I want to know why I should be singled out and abused, and charged with confederating with my Democratic associates. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am proud of my Democratic associates on this committee as legal gentlemen, as honest, conscientious gentlemen as I ever met in my life; and I regret the covert attacks that are made on those honorable gentlemen, as was done by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WALKER], and the assault on them in the pending minority report. Injustice was done those gentlemen. They were among the first on that committee to announce their views to us that this law was unconstitutional. It is only just to the Democrats to state that. I was absolutely surprised at them myself. My learned colleague [Mr. MCCALL of Massachusetts] is a witness to their views. He is a witness that there was no hesitation upon their part.

There was no cowardice on their part, and if my learned friend from Virginia had been as industrious in the committee as he was in getting votes in the State of Virginia at that time he would have become as familiar with their views as I am. So I say that so far as that is concerned there is no fault to be found with those gentlemen. I want to know why I should be charged with want of loyalty to the Republican party because I do not agree with these three learned gentlemen? Why, my friend who made that attack upon me was in his swaddling clothes, feeding out of a nursing bottle, when I was out here in the State of Virginia trying to keep the Democratic party from overthrowing this Government! [Laughter.] I was a Republican when my learned friend from Virginia was a Democrat, doing everything he could to overturn the Constitution of the United States. I was a Republican here when my learned friend was down in Virginia helping the Democratic party to deprive the loyal negro voters of that State of their political rights. I am a Republican yet. I admire the honesty of the gentleman. I admire his bravery and his courage. But new converts are always zealous, and he must not charge me with cowardice or want of loyalty to the Republican party because I fail to follow my colleagues on the committee in their views. Am I to be abused and charged with want of loyalty to the Republican party because I refuse to follow the views of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. THOMAS], who was not educated for the bar? I think that, with twenty-five years' experience at the bar, I am as competent to judge of these election cases as the gentlemen who have attacked me.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Who has abused you?

Mr. JENKINS (continuing). And I do not see why a man is to be charged with being lacking in loyalty to his party because he honestly disagrees with the views of gentlemen with whom he is associated.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JENKINS. For one question.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Have I ever accused you of want of loyalty to your party?

Mr. JENKINS. General, if you will sit down until I get through, you and I will talk this matter over. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am very anxious to present this case to this House, but I want to say that up to this time the particular facts of the case have not been fully presented. My very learned friend from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], the chairman of the committee, was prepared to present them, but he was interrupted so much that he was unable to complete his presentation of the questions that are directly involved in the case.

Let us see first about the constitutional provision. There has been much in the way of attack upon that provision. The committee were all agreed, not that the election laws of the State of South Carolina were unconstitutional, but that the registration law of that State was unconstitutional, and, as I have said, upon that subject the committee were unanimous.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what were the committee to do under the circumstances? We were confronted with the question which was presented in the brief and in the argument, and we had to deal with it. We held, as I have said, that that registration law was unconstitutional, but the question we had to consider was, did this House have the power to declare that there was no election because that law was unconstitutional? Let me say to my friend from Delaware [Mr. WILLIS] that we agreed that we would hold that there had been an election in that State, because there had been acquiescence in that registration law for over twelve years. But our view was that there really was no registration law there. An unconstitutional law is no law, and there was nothing, so far as the registration was concerned, to prohibit those men from voting.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Except the Democratic managers of election.

Mr. NORTHWAY. They were prohibited from voting, though.

Mr. JENKINS. The next question was, How were we to deal with the case? I have gone further in committee and in my private views, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] can testify, than any other member of the committee. I have said, as the gentleman from Massachusetts said this morning, that if we found that a voter had stayed at home because he was advised that his vote would not be accepted we would include that vote—that is, we would not count it, but we would include it for the purpose of holding that there was no election. We could not count it unless the man went to the poll and tendered his vote or was prevented from tendering it. How can you count the vote of a man who has never gone to the poll or offered his vote? That is the great question here, and I will show before I get through that the testimony of the contestant's own witnesses shows that there were enough voters to change the result who never tendered their votes. Being confronted with that question, we adopted the rule which was stated in my previous remarks upon this case. We said we would count the vote of every man whose vote ought to be counted, just as though it had been counted there on election day. But we required some conditions. We required it to be shown that the man was a voter. We required it to be shown that he went to the poll and tendered his vote or was prevented from tendering it. And I say here to-day that I join in the conclusion reached in the case of Waddill vs. Wise, that where the voter went up to vote and was prevented from reaching the poll, but was standing there intending to vote, and where it was known for whom he would vote, I would count that man's vote just as readily as though it had been cast. That is my legal position.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. What difference is there between that case and this, where these men went to the polls and tendered their votes and were not permitted to vote?

Mr. JENKINS. I am sorry my learned friend did not stay here and listen to the argument, because if he had done so he would not ask that question. The difficulty is that there is not a particle of proof as to many of these voters that they did what the gentleman says they did.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that I have listened very carefully to the argument of this case. Besides that, I have studied it for two nights at my room, and I find plenty of evidence of just that kind—enough to seat the contestant.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I object to the gentleman interjecting an argument into my time. I am not responsible for the views he may entertain. I say, Mr. Speaker, that in the case of Waddill vs. Wise the committee of this House insisted that the voters should be called. Each and every qualified voter was called and testified, showing his qualification, showing that he went to the polls, showing that he had his vote there, showing for whom he voted; and those facts being shown, the House counted the votes. But in this case that has not been done.

Now, I want to say to-day, answering the question which was asked by the gentleman from Massachusetts, that if you will sit down and examine this evidence—I am speaking as a lawyer, not as a layman—I say to-day that I am willing any lawyer should take this evidence and go through it, and I will give him a dollar apiece for every voter that he will say is qualified to vote on that list as obtained from the record.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I say to the gentleman that I will take his offer.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask protection. I do not want to be interrupted by a gentleman who knows nothing about this case. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin declines to yield and must not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Will the gentleman yield a moment to me?

Mr. JENKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I wish to ask the gentleman whether in respect to the excluded voters in every one of those six precincts in Sumter County the qualification of the voter is not shown by the evidence?

Mr. JENKINS. No, sir, not in one case; and I will demonstrate it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I hope the gentleman still keeps open his offer of "a dollar apiece," and will let me present him the proofs that he has called for. [Laughter.]

Mr. JENKINS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have made my statement. I want it distinctly understood what I am insisting upon in behalf of the Republican party in this House. If you want to count any of these votes you must have satisfactory proof that the man who offered to cast the vote was a qualified voter under the law of the State of South Carolina, that he tendered his vote or was prevented from tendering it.

Right here is where I join issue with my learned friend from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], the able chairman of this committee. I say that if he consistently accepts his own conclusion he must unite with the majority of this committee, because the only difference between us is this: He says there is no proof that these men ought to have been permitted to vote; that is, there is no proof sufficient to entitle them to have their votes counted. Well, if you can not count their votes, how can you hold a new election?

I say again, so that I may not be misunderstood, that if the proof showed that these men whose votes were rejected were qualified voters, that they were at the polls to vote and were prevented from voting, then we should count them for the purpose of declaring there was no election, but could not count them unless the voters actually tendered their votes, or were prevented from tendering them by the crowd around the polls, or something of that kind.

Now, let us see how gentlemen on the other side get at the vote in this case. In the first place, there is not a particle of difference among the members of this committee until we come to the counting of these rejected votes. We are unanimous in our view as to the unconstitutionality of the registration law. We are unanimous in counting those votes to which I called attention yesterday. The fact is, we have given the minority more lawful votes than they themselves have counted. We have been willing to do that. Now they go to work and take the vote that was contained in the official return and they add to it 427 votes obtained from Richland County. Then they say they have by that process 3,083 votes. Then they count 4,523, and, adding that to the number we have given them credit for, they claim a majority of 233. Now, remember that they themselves find a majority of only 233 out of 3,736 votes on these lists. On those lists, all they can count is 4,523.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Did the gentleman hear my statement that 233 was a misprint. It should be 312. That is an accurate computation.

Mr. JENKINS. One hundred more?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes, sir.

Mr. JENKINS. Now, we will give them credit for 100 more, so that they will have 333. They have made a mistake in footing up the official returns. We called attention to it in the majority report, but the minority ignored it in their report. That reduced their count 9, according to their own confession.

Now, they start out with a majority of only 333 according to their claim, which will be reduced in the manner I have stated to 312. The question is, how do they obtain this vote? The attention of the House has been called to the fact that prior to the election certain persons went to work and had printed a petition or the heading of a petition which they circulated at each poll, and the minority report claims that the heading to that petition recites every requisite to establish the right of the voter to have his vote counted. In common fairness to the rights of these parties, I will submit the heading of this petition to any gentleman familiar with the law on this subject; and I claim you will not find a single element there that qualifies the voter. The petition is addressed to this House, and it alleges that the persons who claim to have their votes counted are over 25 years of age, male residents of the precinct, and are qualified to register and to vote. Now, I do not want to be hypercritical or technical, but I will leave it to any lawyer whether that is not "leading" of the worst character. Here are men permitted to testify in this way, and no opportunity is given to cross-examine them to ascertain whether their statements are true or not.

But what do they say? They say that they desired and intended to vote. Mark that; they desired and intended to vote, not that they offered to vote, not that they tried to vote, not that they were prevented from voting, but that they desired and intended to vote. That may be all true; but what we are complaining of is that it is not sufficient evidence to show a direct offer on their part to vote.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JENKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Have you any doubt that if there had been an entirely fair election in that district the contestant would have received a majority of the votes cast?

Mr. JENKINS. I want to say to the gentleman that when a judge sits on the bench—I do not care what view he may have as to the guilt or innocence of the person arraigned—he must be governed by the record.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman answer my question specifically?

Mr. JENKINS. We are not here to give opinions; and I am surprised that any gentleman who claims to be a lawyer should ask another what his opinion is in a case of this kind outside of the record.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I asked the gentleman whether he had any doubt on that point.

Mr. JENKINS. Now, in the first place, I want to say there is not a word of evidence in this case from first to last to show that there was any fraud at the election. On the other hand, I will show you by the statements of leading men—witnesses called by the contestant—that it was as fair an election as was ever held in the State of South Carolina. What right has any gentleman to sit upon the floor of this House as judge and jury and make up his opinion outside of the evidence in the case as to what the result of the election would have been in a certain contingency? It would not be fair for me to express an opinion one way or the other. I have no right to know anything about this case except what this record discloses. When you take these lists and read them over, you will find, as has been so well said by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS], that there is nothing in them going to show a single qualification of these supposed voters, except what they desired to do. Take the report, page 47—and whatever statement I make about this case I propose to follow it up by the proof. Let us take page 47 and see what the witness there swears to. Just at this point it comes to my mind that I have objected to the fact that these lists are not properly brought before this House; were not properly offered as evidence.

I never made the objection which it was charged yesterday I had made, that they were never filed. That would be hypercritical. My point was that these lists ought to be brought here as evidence, so that the House would have power to look over them, just as you would bring a document into court through the aid of a deposition. Now, I refer to this evidence, about the middle of the page I have named, where it is stated expressly that there is no paper in evidence. The witness was asked where he was on that day. He says, "I took the names of those who applied for registration and attempted to vote and could not vote"; and he says he returned that paper to Mr. Meyers. That is the statement of a gentleman who is called to introduce into this record a large number of votes—86 in all; and there is not a single word in that deposition with reference to what those men said whose votes are now to be counted. This man simply states that he took down the names of those who offered to vote and could not vote.

There is not a single statement that one of the men was qualified as a voter or that he even tried to vote. Now, let me bring your attention for a few moments to the question about which so much is said here—the res gestæ of the case. Right here is where we seriously divide on the question of the legal effect of the evidence. They say it can be introduced because it is a part of the res gestæ. What, then, is the res gestæ? It is simply the thing itself. Let me illustrate: If there is a railroad accident, that is the res gestæ; it is the railroad accident itself. Now, I may be laughed at when I say that when the engineer or the conductor leaves the train he does not take the res gestæ with him. It remains. If, at the moment the accident happens, that engineer or the conductor or any other employee of the road speaks out instantly and says, "I told the master mechanic this morning that that train was not fit to run; that it was not safe," that is a part of the res gestæ, and can be offered in evidence against the company by anybody who heard it. But when a man goes away a distance and talks generally of the accident, narrating the facts, it is not a part of the res gestæ. It is difficult to determine as to the exact time and place which marks the line of demarcation. But I have in mind a case in Missouri where it was held that after the conductor had crossed the road, only a very short distance from where the accident occurred, and had charged the company with negligence, it was not considered to be a part of the res gestæ. What a man says and does at the time is the test.

Now, the affidavit and lists are not evidence in any sense, because they are not memoranda. What is a memorandum? They must be considered, if they are considered as evidence at all, upon one of two propositions: Either that they are memoranda or that they constitute a part of the res gestæ. When we get down to it we find that the men made no statements. Is the House to hold, as a matter of law, to establish a precedent for all time, that a man can sign a paper which never was seen by the parties in interest and never was heard of, to sign a paper of that character and make it a declaration.

They say that there are over seven hundred electors, according to their statement, who have not declared any intention, and you are asked to count them without a particle of evidence of intention or anything else, simply on the mere fact that they belonged to the Republican party, and so would have voted for the Republican candidate.

Now, they say that they are forced to do that. I will demonstrate, Mr. Speaker, that they were not forced to do it. I will demonstrate that they were not confined to this class of evidence. There were abundant ways to prove it, and they are not denied any of their rights because of the number of the men and the difficulty of securing their testimony. But supposing, for the sake of the argument, that the number of men is large, and it would be hard to run around and hunt them up and take the affidavits of each and every man, ought we, as has been well said, to violate every rule of law? Hard cases do make shipwreck of legal principles, but it will not do to abolish and absolutely overturn all principles of law for the purpose of counting a man in.

These men, then, never made a declaration. I say that these lists can not be memoranda, because a memorandum is where a matter is in the memory of a man, who writes down the fact, to which he can always refer afterwards, for the purpose of refreshing his memory. But how can you call a paper a memorandum when another man signs it without a word and hands it to you? I am at a loss to understand on what principle such a contention can be based.

But now suppose you call it a declaration. I wish to submit this proposition to any lawyer on this floor (I raised it heretofore in the remarks I made on this case): That you can not find a single instance anywhere in the books, emanating from any authorities, text writer or jurist, that warrants you to receive the declaration of a man as to what he intended to do in this regard. The declaration of a voter is only received in one particular instance, and that is to impeach his right to vote. It is never received in favor of himself, but always as against himself.

Now, I am warned to hurry, as the time is very brief. But, as I was saying, they can not be considered as memoranda or received as evidence as such, because the man who made the memorandum is not here to verify it. They can not be received as declarations, for no man is in the record testifying as to what the electors said. I say he can not sign a paper and have it regarded as a declaration. I am not begging the question either. I am not asking any extreme rule to be applied, but I am sheltering myself within such authorities as Paine and McCrary, and the other great Republican authorities, who say that the best evidence the case in its nature is susceptible of applies to election cases——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, may I ask how much time I have remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has ten minutes.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I yield that to the gentleman from Wisconsin, but would like to say first that if the substitute of the minority shall prevail, I will ask for a separate vote on the two resolutions presented by the majority of the committee, in order to test the proposition which I made to the House.

Mr. JENKINS. As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, in order to unseat this contestant, this House has got to lay down as a matter of law that whatever a man says with reference to his intention to vote and his denial to vote is evidence. Let us bring it home, so we can understand it. Suppose there is an election contest for the office of sheriff, and the successful party has 3 majority. According to the position taken here to-day, all that the defeated party has to do is to go out and take the declarations of three men that they offered to vote and were denied the right to vote, and get them to sign a petition, and he thereby secures the office.

Now, when you undertake to apply this principle so that you understand it at all you will readily see why I have not consented to count those votes in this way. Every man has a right to be confronted with the witnesses, and in this case here it is asked that the bare, naked statement of over 4,500 men be taken here and not a single effort be made to examine them and find out whether what they are telling is true or not.

There is one thing that I want to briefly call attention to, Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen have anticipated it in their report and in their argument, a matter that I should not refer to if not in self-defense. That is with reference to the division in the Republican party.

I want to say here that this case can not turn upon the proposition as to whether or not Mr. Johnston was a good soldier or a bad soldier, whether he was a Republican or a Populist, whether he was the unanimous choice of his party or not; but gentlemen have desired to give it out to the country that there was great unanimity down there in the State of South Carolina in the Republican party, that there was opposition to Mr. Stokes in his party, and that therefore any charge that is made that there was a divided Republican party is false. Now, I say I would not have introduced it except in self-defense; but I want to call attention first, Mr. Speaker, to the statement that was read here last night by my learned colleague from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND]—a statement signed by Charles F. Manderson and six gentlemen of this House who have a right to vote on this case, in which they have stated to the Republican party throughout the nation that Mr. Johnston was not the Republican candidate in that district.

and that Mr. Brayton was, and urging the Republican voters of that district not to vote for Mr. Johnston, but to vote for Mr. Brayton.

This was on the 21st day of September, 1894. Over their signatures they say that they invited Mr. Johnston to confer with them about this question and that he absolutely refused to do it. Does that show that there was no opposition to Mr. Johnston? Who were these learned gentlemen, sitting now in this House, who sent that forth to the country? They were W. B. HOOKER, of New York; L. D. APSLEY, of Massachusetts; J. W. BABCOCK, of Wisconsin; J. A. T. HULL, of Iowa; ROBERT R. HITT, of Illinois, and THOMAS SETTLE, of North Carolina. There is the statement of these six men that on the 21st day of September, preceding the election, Mr. Johnston was not the nominee of the Republican party, a statement advising the Republicans of that district not to vote for him, but to vote for Mr. Brayton.

Mr. STEELE. The gentleman understands that Mr. Brayton withdrew; that he was not in the race on election day at all.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin allow one question? Is it not a fact that before the election Mr. Brayton specificially withdrew from the race?

Mr. JENKINS. Now, my friend is too quick. If he had only waited, that is just what I was going to state.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. And whether the State executive committee did not decide in favor of Mr. Johnston's candidacy?

Mr. JENKINS. Before the election day, but at what time is not known, Mr. Brayton, it is said, withdrew; but there is nothing in the record to show when he withdrew. It is a mere statement that some time before the election he withdrew. But I will show you before I get through that it was unknown to the Republican voters in that district that he had withdrawn, and it does not make any difference. I say that at the time which I have indicated the statement signed by these gentlemen whose names I have read was sent out to the Republican party of this country, saying that Mr. Johnston was not its candidate.

Now, Mr. Speaker, so that there shall be no question, I propose that any gentleman shall have the page of the record and the record itself to verify the statements I make; statements by the witnesses called by the contestant to show that Mr. Johnston was not the Republican candidate, that he could not poll the full vote, and that they refused to vote for him, and that the colored people were not unanimous for Mr. Johnston, and that there was a fair election. The following question was asked of C. B. Brock, on page 19:

Q. Did the full Republican vote of Walterboro precinct vote or attempt to vote on the 6th of November last?

Remember, "vote or attempt to vote."

A. I don't think that the full Republican vote of Walterboro precinct voted or attempted to vote.

Now, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, in all candor, if men will not attempt to vote, how in the world can we count their votes? There is the statement of one of their leading witnesses that these men in that precinct did not vote or attempt to vote.

Q. Don't you know that there was dissension in the Republican party and that both T. B. Johnston and E. M. Brayton claimed the Republican nomination for Congress from the Seventh Congressional district?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Don't you know that until his withdrawal Colleton supported E. M. Brayton?
A. Yes, sir.

The following question was asked James Davis, on page 23:

Q. Did all the Republican voters of the Walterboro precinct vote or attempt to vote on the said 6th of November?
A. The greater portion did not vote; a few voted.

Samuel Sumter (page 125):

Q. Did not many colored voters remain away from the poll that day?
A. Yes, sir. A great many white people stayed away from the poll that day also.
Q. Did not Mr. Brayton and his friends claim that he had received the nomination from the convention, and that Colonel Johnston was a bolter?
A. Yes; they did.

R. H. Jenkins (page 130):

Q. If you are in a position to know who were the bolters, please state who were the bolters from the nomination of the Republican party for member of Congress from the Seventh district?
A. E. M. Brayton and his friends.

F. R. Springs:

Q. Was there not a large number of colored people preferred him to Mr. Johnston?
A. At Summerville there was.

* * * * * * *

James Meatchem:

Q. Then those who did not appear at the last election did not manifest much interest in the election, did they?
A. They did not turn out; that is all I can say.

Thomas H. Howard:

Q. Did the colored people take as much interest in the last election as they did in former elections?
A. No, sir.
Q. Were there not many colored Republicans who did not vote in the last Congressional election?
A. Yes, sir.

Carolina Holmes (the very witness they depended on more than any other):

Q. Were not the Republicans at one time divided up as to whether they should support Brayton or Johnston?
A. Yes, sir.

M. E. Boozer:

Q. Was not the said T. B. Johnston nominated on that day by a set of bolters from the regular convention?
A. We considered them as such.

W. A. Smith:

Q. Was not E. M. Brayton regularly nominated by a majority of the delegates present?
A. Yes.

J. F. Boyd:

Q. Did you vote at the Federal poll on that day for member of Congress?
A. No, sir.
Q. Did you offer to vote?
A. No, sir.

His name heads the list of those rejected.

Now, I want to say that there was a man who was at the polls and kept a list, and yet he signs this petition and tells this Congress that he did not have his political legal rights there, and he testifies that he did not offer his vote; and his name is on the list of those who said they had tried to vote.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Why was it that he did not offer his vote; was it because the judges of the election declined to accept their votes?

Mr. JENKINS. He was asked the question, and says he did not offer it. I do not know why.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Was it because the judges would not receive them? I am asking for information.

Mr. JENKINS. I am reading what he said.

Mr. NORTHWAY. He did not register?

Mr. JENKINS. How do you know?

Mr. NORTHWAY. I am asking for information.

Mr. JENKINS. The record shows that he was asked if he voted, and he said that he did not; and yet he comes and signs one of these lists. And I cite this to show what little reliability there is in this class of testimony.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. JENKINS. I want a little further time, if I can get it from my colleague.

Mr. BELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield to my colleague on the committee so much of my time as he desires.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Wisconsin will suspend a moment I will say to him that gentlemen are asking when a vote is to be reached. Can any information be given as to when he will move the previous question?

Mr. JENKINS. I did say to the Speaker that I expected to only occupy a few minutes further.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Would an objection defeat this arrangement which has been made granting further time to the opposition? They have now consumed nearly an hour more than the minority has been granted, and if I can defeat the further continuation of that arrangement I desire to do so. I have objected to the arrangement to extend further time to the gentleman from Wisconsin, and I ask the Chair whether that objection is in order?

Mr. BELL of Texas. I claimed the floor as a member of the committee.

The SPEAKER. It has been the custom in the House for members to yield time to individual members. The Chair thinks that that can be done.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Is it not also the custom that the two sides shall have equal time?

The SPEAKER. It is usual for them to have equal time, but it is not the custom in the sense that the other is.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. The other side prevented me from having more time, and cut me off in the middle of a speech. I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is that either just or generous?

The SPEAKER. The justice or generosity of any proposition is not a parliamentary inquiry. [Laughter.]

Mr. DINGLEY. If the gentleman from Wisconsin will pardon me, I will simply state that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WALKER] was recognized and yielded a portion of his time and used the remainder; so that he has had his hour.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I desire to give notice that at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin I shall move the previous question.

Mr. JENKINS. I supposed, Mr. Speaker, that I had the floor. I suppose that I am to have some time of the gentleman from Texas, a member of this committee, and I shall not abuse that privilege, but get through as rapidly as possible.

Without consuming the time to read, I want to say to this House that I have the evidence here that I took out last night of over 100 gentlemen who testified in this case, all tending to show just exactly as I say, that so far as the election is concerned it was absolutely fair; that there was this great division inside of the Republican party; and I have the statement here of over 40 colored men who testified that they did not vote for the contestant in this case because they did not believe he represented the Republican party. I only speak of it as emphasizing the fact that there was not that great unanimity down there that they are talking about.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. May I answer the gentleman about that?

Mr. JENKINS. I can not hear myself.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. If the gentleman can have four hours to my one, I do not see why he should not permit an interruption to answer the question he is asking.

Mr. JENKINS. I want to call the attention of my legal friends to this proposition, so far as that evidence is concerned. Now take, for instance, the report of the minority. They are here insisting that the headings of these petitions are all sufficient in order to count the votes. So that there may be no question about it, I am going to give this record to my learned colleague from Delaware [Mr. WILLIS]—I know he is an honest lawyer—and ask him to look at these petitions.

Mr. Speaker, there is no heading to that petition. Now, stop and think that they are asking you to take away a seat in this House by counting those votes, when they claim that the declaration in the heading of this petition is all-important in the case, and when in fact there is not a single declaration made on the part of any of these 117 men signing that petition. I produce the record and ask gentlemen to look at it. I will not make a statement that is not backed up by the record. Read the deposition upon which they seek to count those 117 votes; it does not contain a single word in the form of a declaration. Now, Mr. Speaker, there are 326 names in my colleague's report signed to petitions which have no heading. How are we going to count those votes for the purpose of unseating a gentleman holding a seat in this House?

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. No, sir; not now. I submit that question, Mr. Speaker, and I submit the record, and I would like any gentleman who is interested in this question to answer me how we are going to count those votes.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. How can I answer the gentleman if he will not give me the time? [Laughter.] I desire to answer him, but he will not give me time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia will please be in order. The gentleman from Wisconsin declines to yield.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. The gentleman from Wisconsin called for an answer.

Mr. JENKINS. No, General, you mistake me. I say I ask any gentleman to solve the question for himself. When the deposition itself is silent and contains not a word with reference to the intention of the voter or his qualifications, and when the petition has no heading, how are you going to count those votes? That is what I want to know.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Does the gentleman really want to know it? [Laughter.]

Mr. JENKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Then if you will give me ten minutes of your time I will tell you. [Laughter.]

Mr. JENKINS. You are asking too much. It is not worth the time, I will say, with all due respect to my learned friend, because my question can not be answered. There is the record in the hands of my colleague from Delaware [Mr. WILLIS]. Look at it. There is no heading to that petition. Three hundred and twenty-six names are signed to petitions without headings, without a word to show that the men had a right to vote, or that they tried to vote or offered to vote or intended to vote.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Where does the gentleman find that?

Mr. JENKINS. It is on page 141 of the record. They call 44 witnesses. Those 44 witnesses have been divided by me into three different classes for the purpose of analyzing their testimony. Eleven of those men testify they did vote. Nine of them state that they did not vote. Twenty-four of them do not say a word about it.

Now, those 24 names are signed to the list as representing that they did not vote and could not vote, but those 24 men were on the stand, and they were not asked a word in reference to whether they had voted or had tried to vote. So of the 9 who stated that they did not vote there is not a word as to why their votes were refused. There are 44 of these men, all of whom, except 1, according to their own statements, were electors of that district, but they do not give any reasons for that statement. Mr. Speaker, this is certainly a new method of obtaining a seat in Congress.

Now, in order to save time, I want to call the attention of gentlemen interested in this case to page 60 of the report. Bear in mind that they are trying to count 91 votes that have not been referred to. Now look at the testimony. The witness is asked, page 60:

Did you secure the names of the Republican voters and those rejected voluntarily?

He answers:

I received the names from each person themselves.

He goes along and states that he did not make any threats or anything of that kind, and then he is asked:

Do you know of your own knowledge whether those men offered to vote?

He says he does not. He says he was there all the time at the polls; that he was not excluded, but was at the polls. He is asked if he knows of his own knowledge whether they did offer to vote, and he says he does not. He is further asked:

Do you know of your own knowledge whether any one of these names were rejected or not?

He says that he does not know.

That is obviously the grossest kind of hearsay testimony. It is, in fact, no testimony at all. Now, I pass further along to his testimony on page 61, where he is asked:

Then those whose names appear on this list No. 2 did not attempt to vote?

He answers:

No, sir; had no certificate.

Mr. Speaker, I am addressing myself now to lawyers, and I call attention to the fact that this witness, who undertakes to draw in 91 votes to be counted in this case, himself testifies that not one of them offered to vote. They did not attempt it. He does not say that they offered to vote; he says they did not attempt to vote.

Mr. OVERSTREET. That man had two lists, had he not?

Mr. JENKINS. Yes, sir; and I am referring to the right one. He is asked this question:

Then your only possible objection to the management and result of the election is that 91 persons, who neither had certificates nor presented themselves to vote, were not allowed to vote.

He says, "Yes, sir," that that is the only objection. That is his testimony. And yet the list says that they did try to vote. Now, how are you going to count those 91 votes when this witness swears that the men did not even present themselves to vote?

As I hurry along I wish to call attention to one other very important question. I have been criticised because I raised an objection to the incompetency of the testimony. Now, if you will refer to the record, you will find that there are 779 names on lists that were not kept by the men who testified to them; 779 names by actual count that are on the lists here. And the men who testified did not keep the lists. Now, I want to know how you can count those 779 names. It appears that somebody else kept the list. There you have the grossest kind of hearsay.

Now, there are 415 names that are not on original lists; and there is no explanation as to why these names were copied. The men merely say that they copied them—that they had permission of the men whose names are given to copy them, and they made copies. There is no sort of testimony here to make that evidence competent. You will find by actual count 187 names on lists which are not identified. You will find, according to the admission of the minority in their report—they will not deny this—that there are 715 names on lists where the record is silent as to any intention on the part of the voter. But this House is asked to count those votes—presumably because the men were Republican voters.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Does not the gentleman know that not one of those is counted?

Mr. JENKINS. I will show the gentleman that they are. I refer to page 83 of the report of the minority; and I emphasize it again by reading the report. They concede that there is no evidence here as to the intention of those voters; but they say, "It is reasonable to assume that the voters at these precincts mentioned intended to cast their votes for the contestant." Now, I ask any legal gentleman here whether, sitting as a judge, he would count 715 votes when the witness himself—and we must regard this report as a witness—says there is nothing to show what was the intention of the voters, but "it is reasonable to assume that the voters at these precincts mentioned intended to cast their votes for the contestant." Sir, I could not consent to count votes on any such assumption.

There is one very important point to which I ask the attention of gentlemen, and that is this: In two counties—Lexington and Orangeburg—the attorneys took occasion to furnish proof as to the number of votes actually rejected. Remember that this was done in those two counties only, and in those two counties there were 730 names on these lists. Now, at each one of those polls every sworn officer of the election was there to testify as a witness as to the number of votes actually rejected. Remember, there are 730 names of men who the minority of the committee undertake in this very weak way to say were there as lawful voters and were denied the right to vote. Now, in opposition to this claim the sworn officers of the law testify that instead of there being 780 votes rejected, there were only 21, of which 2 were the votes of Democrats. Mr. Speaker, I can not for a single moment believe that this House is going to say that each of these sworn officers of the law committed perjury in reference to this question. In order to seat the contestant this House must act without a particle of evidence, upon mere presumption, and hold that every single precinct officer committed perjury in coming forward and testifying that there were but 21 votes rejected in those two counties. They assign the reason for the rejection of those 21 votes that each of the 21 men, including 2 Democrats, was denied the right to vote because he did not hold a registration certificate. And the record so shows.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield a moment for a question?

Mr. JENKINS. If the gentleman will keep quiet the balance of the afternoon, I will yield.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. JENKINS. I say that I will yield now, but I do not wish to yield again.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Does not the gentleman know that these men whose votes, it is conceded, were rejected belonged to a class—the class of men without registration certificates; that it had been announced publicly at the polls that men who were without registration certificates would not be allowed to vote, and for that reason numbers who had gone to the polls to vote did not apply to vote?

Mr. JENKINS. What I am saying is that according to these lists there were 780 men who actually tendered their votes, while in opposition to that claim the sworn officers of the law testify that there were but 21 votes rejected.

Now, there are one or two general observations which I wish to make, and then I shall conclude my remarks. It is utterly impossible for a man to say in a case like this all that he wants to say and ought to say, because there are so many things crowding upon one's mind. But there are one or two things to which I wish to invite attention as offsetting the prejudice that was sought to be created here yesterday against the contestee.

A large amount of time has been consumed in arguing in reference to the notaries public. I have felt it unjust to intrude upon this House that question. But the inquiry has been made here in a very learned way whether the law did not put the whole power of appointment of notaries public in the governor. Why, sir, as I understand, that power is vested in the governor in every State of the Union. Certainly such is the case in the State that I have the honor to represent. But the real point is here: There was not a single question raised in that whole district in reference to the action of a notary public. There is not a suggestion but that every notary yielded readily and promptly to the contestant all his rights; and if lawyers will look over the record they will see that the attorneys representing the contestee made objections all along the line—to almost every question—and every objection was overruled by the notary public and every particle of testimony admitted. Then why should we assail South Carolina and the laws of that State, or the acts of her executive, in presenting this question, unless there is evidence that there was fraud on the part of the notaries or a refusal to act?

My learned friend from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] stated on yesterday that it was but fair to presume that something was wrong, because Mr. Stokes, the contestee, had such a majority and had never canvassed his district. Why, Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House to the district of one of my colleagues, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SAUERHERING]. The gentleman who preceded him in the House from that State as a member of the Fifty-third Congress came here with a majority of 6,500 votes. Mr. SAUERHERING never made a speech in his district, and yet he came here by a very large majority, overcoming the majority of the Democratic contestant and winning the election. Now, upon the arguments made in this case, the Democrat that he beat had better come here and insist on his right to have his seat in this House.

It is entirely outside of the record; there is nothing to show whether Mr. Stokes participated in the campaign or not; but he assures me, personally, on his honor as a gentleman, that he canvassed every single place in the district, made speeches in every part of the district, and just before the election; and the proof is ample, he assures me, that he spoke in every place in the district; and why should the empty charge be made that he never participated in the campaign and that he stayed at home, for the purpose of arguing or creating the inference that he felt assured that he was safe, and need not take any part in the canvass?

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Does the gentleman want me to give him an answer?

Mr. JENKINS. Not now, General.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Because if I am permitted to answer I would say that he felt sure there was no need for him to do so. It was all arranged for him.

Mr. JENKINS. Now, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the record in the case does disclose that Mr. Stokes did take part in the campaign, it is very unfair to say that he did not participate, and allow a latitude for belief that he felt so conscious of success that he could safely remain at home.

I want to call your attention now to one other point with reference to the vote in Richland County. Great stress is laid on the fact that but 8 votes were returned from the township. Mr. Stokes got 8 and the contestant 427 in Richland County. Did my learned friend go far enough on yesterday and tell the House that there were but two townships of the county in that district? No, only one township; I overstated it. Why did not my friend say that there was but one township in the county in that entire district?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I so stated.

Mr. JENKINS (continuing). And that accounts for the small vote; and in that one township Mr. Stokes got 8 and the contestant 427 votes.

Now I want to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, my colleague on the committee [Mr. CODDING], and at the end of that time I will move the previous question.

Mr. CODDING. Mr. Speaker, I come to this subject entirely unprepared for any formal remarks, and accept this time to speak only in deference to the opinion which has been expressed that some misunderstanding might arise as to my position in reference to this contest—not personal, for that would be of no importance, but as a member of the Committee on Elections in connection with these reports.

My colleague, Mr. DE ARMOND, kindly read to the House, or caused to be read yesterday, the brief views that I had prepared with reference to the dissenting or rather contending opinions presented by the Committee on Elections No. 3. I have the distinction of disagreeing, to some extent, with both sides. In the main, however, the opinions which I have formed, based upon the legal principles involved, are those expressed in that report as read—a line following the opinion of the minority of the committee, but still just as firmly fixed in the opinion that pursuing that line leads to the retention of the seat by the contestee. For under no possible circumstances which I can conceive, having read carefully, day and night, every word of testimony embodied in the record, can I be convinced on the legal testimony that enough votes can be computed for the contestant to entitle him to the seat.

Throughout the course of my life I have been a Republican, like the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS], and never voted any other ticket. But I can not but believe that in a case like this, where a judicial investigation is made and a judicial opinion needed, there can be nothing righteous, nothing justifiable, in a decision which excludes a contestee or a contestant from a seat in this body on account of his politics, or by any straining of the rules that have been followed by this House so far as precedents are concerned, or by twisting or contorting the rules of law in the presentation of ordinary evidence.

Now, I state conclusions, for the time compels such a course—conclusions and not reasons. Those conclusions have been mostly presented before. I present them here as my own, simply following the idea with which I started in these remarks: That the registration law of South Carolina, and not the election law, is unconstitutional. There has been no division in the committee on that subject; none whatever. Republicans and Democrats, almost at the very outset of the argument of the South Carolina cases, have agreed entirely, or without any marked dissent. Next the votes of those who are proved to be voters—and of that I require proof outside of these so-called lists—voters who are proved to be such and who offered their votes for the contestant, Colonel Johnston, should be counted either by the committee or in this House, or in any other way the computation should be made; should be reasonably computed and allowed to him. But in doing this it is doing violence to just principles to take a census of the colored voters of that district of South Carolina and on the presumption that they are Republicans count them bodily for the contestant. No such rule can be fairly allowed.

One other conclusion, and I have done. It is a conclusion so well expressed, so ably put, by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS], I think, that I can agree with it, as I understood him, without the modification of a single word.

The doctrine of res gestæ, so far as I have ever been able to understand it—and it is in any case but the refuge of a man who can not prove his case in any other way—that doctrine has no application here. The lists as they were made up, I think, without a single exception, are far enough removed in time at least, and in circumstances certainly, to form no part of the actual transactions at the voting booths or polls that day.

I should prefer, Mr. Speaker, to advocate the cause of the contestant. Natural and political sympathy go that way, but I desire to raise my voice to-day simply to say to the House that I trust that neither in this case nor in any other will this House drift toward the dea or the standard that the rights of a contestant or a contestee are to be judged by the political complexion of a majority of the House.

Mr. JENKINS. I now move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolutions and the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That J. William Stokes was not elected and is not entitled to a seat in the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Seventh Congressional district of South Carolina; and

Resolved, That Thomas B. Johnston was elected and is entitled to a seat in the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Seventh Congressional district of South Carolina.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the substitute.

Mr. OVERSTREET. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I understand that the substitute resolutions have been first read, and they are to the effect that the contestant is entitled to his seat. There seems to be some doubt in the minds of members. Let it be stated.

The SPEAKER. The substitute is in favor of the contestant.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I desire to withdraw my demand for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws his demand for the yeas and nays. The question is on agreeing to the substitute.

The question was taken; and Mr. JENKINS demanded a division.

Mr. POWERS. I desire to know what the pending question is?

The SPEAKER. The pending question is to substitute the resolutions of the minority for those of the majority.

Mr. HOPKINS. I understood the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] to present the minority resolutions, and on them to ask the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. But he withdrew the demand. Gentlemen in favor of the substitute will rise in their places and be counted.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 78, noes 84.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, can these resolutions be divided and voted on separately?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is too late, they having already been voted upon together, and the yeas and nays having been ordered.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I shall ask a separate vote on the majority resolutions if these resolutions do not prevail.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 95, nays 105, not voting 155; as follows:

So the substitute was rejected.

The following pairs were announced:

Until further notice:

Mr. COUSINS with Mr. MEYER.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana with Mr. COX.

Mr. ARNOLD of Pennsylvania with Mr. LIVINGSTON.

Mr. PICKLER with Mr. MILES.

Mr. FOSS with Mr. SPARKMAN.

Mr. CORLISS with Mr. MOSES.

Mr. SNOVER with Mr. MADDOX.

Mr. BOWERS with Mr. MINER of New York.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan with Mr. COWEN.

Mr. HULL with Mr. OGDEN.

Mr. COFFIN with Mr. LAWSON.

Mr. MEIKLEJOHN with Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana.

Mr. BROMWELL with Mr. DOWNING.

Mr. HEATWOLE with Mr. HUTCHESON.

Mr. WOOMER with Mr. RUSSELL of Georgia.

Mr. PUGH with Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky.

Mr. LEFEVER with Mr. BAILEY.

Mr. W. A. STONE with Mr. RUSK.

Mr. KULP with Mr. MEREDITH.

Mr. DALZELL with Mr. CRISP.

Mr. ROYSE with Mr. TURNER of Virginia, except on Tucker-Yost election case.

For this day:

Mr. HOWE with Mr. CROWLEY.

Mr. MILLER of West Virginia with Mr. WOODARD.

On this question:

Mr. STEPHENSON with Mr. NEILL.

Mr. HEMENWAY with Mr. WHEELER.

Mr. COOK of Wisconsin with Mr. SHUFORD.

Mr. HULING with Mr. ELLETT of Virginia.

Mr. FISCHER with Mr. PATTERSON.

Mr. ELLIS with Mr. OTEY.

Mr. BELKNAP with Mr. CLARKE of Alabama.

Mr. DOLLIVER with Mr. BLACK of Georgia.

Mr. SORG with Mr. GROSVENOR.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the original resolutions.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a separate vote on those resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks for a division. The Clerk will report the first clause of the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Thomas B. Johnston was not elected a Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Seventh Congressional district of the State of South Carolina, and is not entitled to a seat therein.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. May I rise to a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. McMILLIN. For the information of the House, Mr. Speaker, I will ask for the reading of the second part, so that we can see what the division effects.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. A parliamentary inquiry. If this resolution is adopted it declares that there is no election?

The SPEAKER. If both branches of the resolution are defeated.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. What is the portion now offered?

The SPEAKER. The resolution now offered has just been read to the House, but without objection it will again be read.

Mr. KEM. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KEM]. [Laughter.] The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. A parliamentary inquiry. If both of these resolutions are defeated the effect will be to declare the seat vacant, will it not?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The second part has not been reported.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. LACEY. Which resolution is being offered first?

The SPEAKER. The first.

The SPEAKER put the question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. POWERS. I would like to know what I am voting upon.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will please read both resolutions.

Mr. McMILLIN. That is what I wanted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Thomas B. Johnston was not elected a Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Seventh Congressional district of the State of South Carolina, and is not entitled to a seat therein.

Resolved, That J. William Stokes was duly elected a Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Seventh Congressional district of South Carolina, and is entitled to a seat therein.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the portion of the resolution which is to be voted on now by the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Thomas B. Johnston was not elected a Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Seventh Congressional district of the State of South Carolina, and is not entitled to a seat therein.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. JENKINS. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 96, noes 91.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The yeas and nays. [Cries of "Tellers!" on the Republican side, and cries of "Oh, no!" on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. Does any gentleman rise to demand the yeas and nays?

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 103, nays 99, not voting 153; as follows:

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I desire to know how I am recorded?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recorded in the negative.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I desire to change my vote to the affirmative.

The following additional pairs were announced:

On this question:

Mr. WILSON of New York with Mr. HALL.

Mr. SIMPKINS with Mr. ADAMS.

The SPEAKER. On this question the yeas are 103, and the nays are 99; and accordingly the resolution is agreed to.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the last vote.

Mr. JENKINS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. SETTLE. Pending that, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House adjourn; and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I make the point of order that the motion to reconsider is not in order at this time, the House not having yet voted on the whole proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the motion to reconsider is in order.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Then I move to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. SETTLE. Mr. Speaker, I have a motion to adjourn preceding the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. Prior to the motion to adjourn the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] had moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. SETTLE. Pending that, Mr. Speaker, I move, if it is in order, that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is not in order.

Mr. SETTLE. Is a motion to adjourn in order, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the motion to adjourn is in order.

Mr. SETTLE. Then I move that the House adjourn; and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken; and the Speaker declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. SETTLE. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 82, noes 111.

Mr. SETTLE. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SETTLE and Mr. JENKINS were appointed.

Mr. POOLE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. If the motion to adjourn prevails, will that do away with the Friday night session?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. POOLE. Then we do not want to adjourn; we want to take a recess.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is a privileged matter pending.

The SPEAKER. The House is now dividing.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that I made the motion partly in the sense of a parliamentary inquiry, as I had been advised by gentlemen whom I supposed to be thoroughly informed on the subject that the conference report would be in order at this time.

The SPEAKER. One of the express exceptions in regard to the privilege of conference reports is when the House is dividing.

Mr. CANNON. If the motion to adjourn is voted down, the conference report would be in order.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 54, noes 106.

Mr. SETTLE. I call for the yeas and nays.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I now present the report of the committee of conference on the naval appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] presents the report of a conference committee.

Mr. McMILLIN. The yeas and nays having been demanded, I make the point that the House is still dividing—that the vote is not yet complete.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I raise the point that a conference report is not of higher privilege than the right of a member to his seat.

The SPEAKER. The rules think it is.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That question is not involved. The pending question was on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. McMILLIN. I do not wish to argue the point, but it strikes me that when a vote has begun all the steps in the process of taking that vote are of equal importance; and what can not interfere with one part of the process can not interfere with another.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there is a distinction between the different methods of making the count.

Mr. McMILLIN. The Chair, then, would hold that after the conference report is acted upon, the taking of the yeas and nays on this question will still be in order. I presume that would inevitably follow. If it is now in order, pending the call for the yeas and nays, to introduce this conference report, the Chair, I presume, must hold that when the conference report has been disposed of the demand for the yeas and nays may still be acted on by the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so. The conference report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7542) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 23, 30, and 55.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 19, 20, 21, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 31, 50, and 54, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 10: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 10, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Add at the end of the matter inserted by said amendment the following: "And the Secretary of the Navy shall detail a clerk of class 1 to perform clerical services in the Navy Department necessary to carry on the work incident to this appropriation"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 18: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 18, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the comma (,) after the word "laboratory," in line 3, page 22 of the bill, and restore the matter stricken out by said Senate amendment; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 22: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 22, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out, in lines 4 and 5 of said amendment, the words "made for the same" and insert in lieu thereof the word "completed"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 24: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 24, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: Strike out the words inserted by said amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following, "at $2,500 each; one of English studies, history, and law (after thirty years' service), $2,500"; and strike out, in lines 22 and 23, page 36 of the bill, the words "at $2,500 each"; and the Senate agree to the same.

On amendments numbered 2, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 51, 52, and 53 the committee of conference has been unable to agree.

C. A. BOUTELLE,
JNO. B. ROBINSON,
AMOS J. CUMMINGS,
Managers on the part of the House.

EUGENE HALE,
M. S. QUAY,
A. P. GORMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, as the Clerk, not unnaturally, finds the chirography of some gentlemen difficult to read——

Mr. RICHARDSON. I make the point that this conference report should be accompanied with a written statement of the House conferees.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will my friend do me the great favor to listen for a moment? I was about stating that as a matter of courtesy to the Clerk, who would find some difficulty in reading some very poor handwriting in this statement, I will read it myself.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not object to that. I was only inquiring whether there was a statement.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am about to read it, if that is entirely satisfactory to the gentleman.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Entirely so.

Mr. BOUTELLE (reading)—

The Senate recedes from its amendments 23, 30, and 55.

No. 23 is merely verbal.

No. 30, as agreed upon, restores the provision making mileage of marine and naval officers uniform in rate.

No. 55 embraced legislation for the safety of passengers and others on excursion steamers, etc., at regattas, which has been otherwise provided for.

The House recedes from its disagreement to amendments—

No. 1, which makes the provision for enlistment of additional men immediately available.

No. 3 authorizes employment of one draftsman at $1,200 at Naval War College.

No. 4 is a verbal correction.

No. 5 appropriates $50,000 for testing methods of throwing high explosives on board ship.

No. 6 is a verbal correction.

No. 7 increases appropriation for reserve guns for auxiliary cruisers from $250,000 to $400,000.

No. 8 authorizes the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to purchase by contract all or any part of said guns.

No. 9 is a typographical correction.

Nos. 11, 12, and 13 are corrections in computation.

No. 14 provides $5,000 to purchase additional land at naval station at Port Royal, S. C.

No. 15 corrects footing.

No. 16 provides $8,000 additional to former appropriation for paving certain streets in Annapolis connected with Naval Academy.

No. 17 authorizes the Board of Visitors to inquire and report advisability of acquiring additional grounds for use of Naval Academy.

No. 19 corrects typographical error.

No. 20 changes location of proposed model tank from old observatory grounds to the navy-yard, Washington.

No. 21 authorizes use of one of the old boilers of the Galena for training ship Enterprise.

Nos. 25, 26, and 27 are verbal corrections.

Nos. 28 and 29 provide a contingent fund of $1,000 for Superintendent of Naval Academy.

No. 31 provides quarters for leader of Marine Band.

No. 50 authorizes Secretary of Navy to contract for two additional submarine torpedo boats of Holland type, at a cost not to exceed $175,000 each, provided that the vessel now building proves successful and satisfactory.

No. 54 authorizes official examination of systems for propulsion of vessels by direct action against the water without the use of screws.

The House recedes with amendments from—

No. 10 modifying the provisions of the appropriation for the naval militia, and providing that the Secretary detail a clerk of class 1 for the office work.

No. 18 restores the words "department of instruction, museum of hygiene," under Bureau of Medicine and Surgery.

No. 22 provides that the Secretary be authorized to examine and report to next session of Congress upon claims against the Government for building hulls and machinery of naval vessels completed since January 1, 1891.

No. 24 provides that after thirty years' service the professor of English studies, history, and law shall have the same salary as is now paid to the professors of mathematics, chemistry, and physics.

On amendments numbered 2, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 51, 52, and 53 the committee of conference has been unable to agree.

No. 2 relates to officers appointed to any corps, after service in a different corps, having all the benefits of their previous service in the same manner as if said appointments were a reentry into the Navy or Marine Corps, and further that hereafter officers on the active or retired list of the Navy are prohibited from taking employment with any company or person furnishing material to the Government.

No. 32 is Senate amendment reducing the number of battle ships from four to two.

Nos. 33 to 38, inclusive, relate to the number, speed, type, and cost of the torpedo boats.

No. 39 provides that not more than two battle ships or three torpedo boats shall be built in one yard or by one party.

Nos. 40 and 41 are provisions for the construction of one battle ship and three torpedo boats on the Pacific coast.

Nos. 42 and 43 are merely verbal.

No. 44 provides for the construction of one torpedo boat on the Missouri River.

Nos. 45, 46, and 47 are mere verbal changes.

No. 48 extends the time within which the contracts for the construction of the vessels shall be made from ninety to one hundred and twenty days from the passage of the act.

No. 49 prohibits the Secretary of the Navy from contracting for armor plate for battle ships at exceeding $350 per ton in case of separate contracts for hulls and armor, and requires him to report to next Congress if unable to contract at that price.

No. 51 is an amendment of the Senate reducing the amount appropriated for construction and machinery from $7,670,679 to $6,370,679, based on reduction of the number of battle ships, etc.

No. 52 is an amendment reducing the appropriation for armor and armament from $4,871,454 to $4,371,454, based on same changes.

No. 53 directs the Secretary of the Navy to cause one of the light-draft gunboats heretofore authorized to be finished for a training ship for the Naval Academy.

Mr. Speaker, a number of these amendments brought up in conference were formally disagreed to, as they depend upon what may ultimately be done as to the number of battle ships which shall be provided for. The disagreement in regard to the torpedo boats is one which will be easily adjusted, the question being as to the relative number of vessels, their size, etc. The general scope of the appropriations is not substantially changed.

The important items, as the House will readily see, relate to the number of battle ships and to the contracts for armor plate. The Senate inserted an amendment providing that where the Secretary of the Navy may make a contract for the furnishing of armor plate he shall not pay more than $350 per ton. It was thought desirable to further consider that provision in view of the various representations which have been made, including an important paper from the Secretary of the Navy, which in a moment I will read to the House. Of course everybody connected with the Government and with every department of the Government is desirous of obtaining the armor plate for our ships at the most reasonable price that is practicable. Some question, however, arose in the minds of the conferees as to the feasibility of the terms of the amendment restricting the Secretary to $350 per ton. I may say in substance that the contracts for the armor of the two ships now under construction have been at a rate in the vicinity of $500 per ton, and so far as I have been able to learn that is about the price which is paid by the great Governments of Europe for similar material.

A committee of the other branch of Congress made an investigation in connection with the furnishing of armor plate during this winter, and as one of the results, I understand, this amendment was reported to the Senate. I will say, however, that the House conferees were not satisfied at the time of our former conference that it was wise to make this restriction in the terms provided in the Senate amendment, and I find that the Secretary of the Navy has had a similar doubt as to the desirability of this provision. Hence, we disagreed in regard to it in order to obtain fuller information, and after further discussion of the whole subject we hope to be able to deal with it in a more intelligent, comprehensive, and satisfactory manner.

The Secretary of the Navy, under date of the 8th of May, addressed a letter to the chairmen of the two committees of the House and Senate, calling attention to this provision. I will read the entire communication:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, May 8, 1896.

SIR: I desire, through you, to call to the attention of the conferees hereafter to be appointed on H. R. 7542, making appropriations for the naval service, the forty-ninth amendment, which reads as follows:

"And provided further, That in case the Secretary of the Navy shall make separate contracts for the armor and armor plate for said battle ships, he shall not accept bids at a rate exceeding an average of $350 per ton of 2,240 pounds; and in case the said Secretary can not make contracts for said armor and armor plate within said limit, he shall delay action and report the offers made to the next session of Congress."

If this amendment becomes law in its present shape it limits the price to be paid by the Navy Department for armor only in cases where the Secretary of the Navy shall contract directly with the manufacturers of armor for armor and armor plate for battle ships, and does not apply in case the Department should decide to contract with the shipbuilder for a completed vessel, armor included. It has heretofore been a question seriously considered by the Department whether it should continue to contract, as has been done in the past, with the shipbuilder for the hull and machinery and separately with the armor manufacturers for the armor, or contract with the shipbuilder for the completed vessel, armor included. The amendment as it now reads leaves it within the discretion of the Secretary to pay indirectly to the shipbuilder, by contracting for a ship complete, a higher price for armor than he would be permitted to do if he should contract directly with the manufacturers of the armor. The reading of the amendment might carry with it the impression from the words used in the outset, "That in case the Secretary of the Navy shall make separate contracts for the armor and armor plate for said battle ships he shall not accept bids," etc., that it was the intention of Congress not to limit the Department at all in the price to be paid for armor in case contracts should be made with the shipbuilder for vessels complete. I can not think, however, that such is the intention, and therefore desire that this matter be called to the attention of the conferees on this bill.

It is, perhaps, proper that I should also state that the amendment, as it now reads, is somewhat indefinite in another respect. The Department is forbidden, in the case mentioned, to accept bids for armor and armor plate "at a rate exceeding an average of $350 per ton." Simple steel armor can be manufactured at a very much lower price, say from 35 to 40 per cent lower than the armor which the Government is now procuring. The expense of incorporating nickel in the armor is about $11.20 per ton, exclusive of the cost of nickel oxide, which amounts to about $30 per ton. The expense of face hardening by the Harvey or similar process, or by reforging, averages about $4 per ton.

It is suggested that if the law be passed limiting the price to be paid for armor it might be well to have the law state definitely whether the price mentioned is to include the price to be paid for the armor, finished and complete, according to the requirements of the Government.

I have written a similar letter to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate.

Very respectfully, H. A. HERBERT, Secretary.

Hon. C. A. BOUTELLE,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs,
House of Representatives.

I will say that this is the desire of the House conferees. We wish to consider it more thoroughly and comprehensively as to its application, and especially in connection with the points raised by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will permit me, I understand you to say that we are paying now $500 per ton for this armor plate?

Mr. BOUTELLE. In the vicinity of that price.

Mr. CANNON. I am asking for information, as I do not know anything of the subject. Is that also the price at which it has been furnished to anybody else?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I will state what is well known to those who have followed the developments connected with the building up of the Navy——

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear this exciting debate between the two gentlemen over there; it is impossible to hear it here.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am very much gratified by this complaint of too little instead of too much of my oratory. [Laughter.]

But I will say to the gentleman from Illinois and to the House that last year the Bethlehem Iron Works, which has provided a large portion, in connection with the Carnegie Works, of the armor for the use of the Navy, made a contract with the Russian Government for a certain number of tons of American armor at a very low price; at a price which they claimed at the time would give them substantially no profit, but which was very likely to cause a loss. They made the contract for the purpose of introducing American armor into Russia. Since that time they have made another contract with the Russian Government for armor at a price almost twice that paid for the experimental lot. They are now executing a contract, as I understand, with that Government at approximately the same price paid by our Government; and so far as I have been able to learn the price we have contracted to pay for the armor for the two ships at the Newport News yard, the Kentucky and the Kearsarge, is approximately that which is paid by European governments for this class of armor.

Of course this whole matter of the price at which armor can be furnished is largely in the realm of experimentation as yet. It is a business by itself. It is a business which has only one class of customers. Governments are the sole customers. There are no private works in this country which require the output of the great steel works, as there is no other use for the great steel forgings turned out by these works except by the Government for war purposes.

The conferees desire to take the matter under further consideration in another conference; and the other branch have in a formal manner, as I learn from the RECORD, sent it back to conference on the basis of the statement that there were a number of matters that it was believed might be adjusted thereby. I ask that the House may in a similar way formally insist and send the bill with its amendments back to a further conference, as was done by the Senate.

Mr. MERCER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maine if amendment numbered 44 is in conference yet?

Mr. BOUTELLE. What is the subject of the amendment?

Mr. MERCER. It relates to the one torpedo boat on the Missouri River.

Mr. BOUTELLE. It is either in conference or has been agreed to.

Mr. HEPBURN. I hope the gentleman will yield to me for a moment or two, as I had something to say about the torpedo boat on the Missouri River when the bill was before the House. I live up that way——

Mr. ALLEN of Mississippi. Will the gentleman from Maine allow me a question?

Mr. BOUTELLE. With much pleasure.

Mr. ALLEN of Mississippi. I notice that there are many verbal amendments mentioned in this report. I would like to know if in the report the House has yielded its dignity to the verbal superiority of the Senate? [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, if I felt sure that it was strictly in order to make even a remote allusion to the verbal superiority or inferiority of the august body which is supposed in some vague way to be located in the vicinity of this Capitol I should be very happy to answer my friend from Mississippi, but I will say to him that for a large number of the verbal errors referred to the responsibility lies between the clerks of the committees and the Public Printing Office.

Mr. ALLEN of Mississippi. The House is not involved?

Mr. BOUTELLE. The House is not involved. [Laughter.] And I think I may assure my friend from Mississippi that if the House will send the bill back to conference we will see that the dignity of this body is fully maintained, typographically and otherwise.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. HOPKINS. If there were time, I should like to be heard on the battle-ship question, but I will take some other time to submit remarks on that subject.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I think I ought to insist upon my right to be heard upon this question of the torpedo boat on the Missouri River. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Iowa.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is entitled to the floor for one minute.

Mr. HEPBURN. Not having any rivers in my district, I have never been able to get it into the river and harbor bill. Not having any war claims there, I did not get in on the deficiency bill. For the reason that none of my constituents were in that region of the country at the proper time, I was unable to get in on the French spoliation claims.

Mr. GIBSON. You had better move to a better country.

Mr. HEPBURN. My only hope is on this question of the torpedo boat. I am a little disturbed about that, Mr. Speaker, because, as conditions now exist, we should, if we built this torpedo boat in the only town in my district near to the river, be compelled to transport it some miles across the Missouri River bottom. [Laughter.] A few years ago we had a harbor there on the Missouri River, after the manner of the Vicksburg Harbor, but the Missouri being somewhat eccentric, one night it cut across a bend and left my town 6 miles high and dry on the prairie. [Laughter.] But we are hoping, Mr. Speaker, that the eccentricity will be repeated, and that we shall be in a position to compete for the building of this torpedo boat.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that, unless otherwise ordered, the conferees will consider themselves instructed to look out for the interests of the Missouri River. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I ask that the House insist on its disagreement to the other amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves that the House insist on its disagreement to the other amendments, and agree to the request for a conference.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed as conferees Mr. BOUTELLE, Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania, and Mr. CUMMINGS.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 5731) to regulate the practice of medicine and surgery, to license physicians and surgeons, and to punish persons violating the provisions thereof in the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. 2777) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to donate condemned cannon and condemned cannon balls to certain posts of the Grand Army of the Republic;

A bill (H. R. 335) to provide for the lease of Fort Omaha Military Reservation to the State of Nebraska;

A bill (H. R. 3279) to authorize the reassessment of water-main taxes or assessments in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 3282) to repeal section 61 of an act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, which became a law August 28, 1894;

A bill (H. R. 886) to amend section 3255 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning the distilling of brandy from fruits;

A bill (H. R. 6256) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to furnish to George F. Fuller Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Manistique, Mich., a condemned cannon; and

A bill (H. R. 2054) to correct the military record of Charles W. Rhinehardt and to grant him an honorable discharge.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the bill (S. 715) for the relief of B. F. Dowell was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Claims.

VETO MESSAGE—RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith without approval House bill No. 7977, entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes."

There are 417 items of appropriation contained in this bill, and every part of the country is represented in the distribution of its favors.

It directly appropriates or provides for the immediate expenditure of nearly $14,000,000 for river and harbor work. This sum is in addition to appropriations contained in another bill for similar purposes amounting to a little more than $3,000,000, which have already been favorably considered at the present session of Congress.

The result is that the contemplated immediate expenditures for the objects mentioned amount to about $17,000,000.

A more startling feature of this bill is its authorization of contracts for river and harbor work amounting to more than $62,000,000. Though the payments on these contracts are in most cases so distributed that they are to be met by future appropriations, more than $3,000,000 on their account are included in the direct appropriations above mentioned. Of the remainder, nearly $20,000,000 will fall due during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and amounts somewhat less in the years immediately succeeding. A few contracts of a like character, authorized under previous statutes, are still outstanding, and to meet payments on these more than $4,000,000 must be appropriated in the immediate future.

If, therefore, this bill becomes a law, the obligations which will be imposed on the Government, together with the appropriations made for immediate expenditure on account of rivers and harbors, will amount to about $80,000,000. Nor is this all. The bill directs numerous surveys and examinations which contemplate new work and further contracts, and which portend largely increased expenditures and obligations.

There is no ground to hope that in the face of persistent and growing demands the aggregate of appropriations for the smaller schemes not covered by contracts will be reduced or even remain stationary. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, such appropriations, together with the installments on contracts which will fall due in that year, can hardly be less than $30,000,000; and it may reasonably be apprehended that the prevalent tendency toward increased expenditures of this sort and the concealment which postponed payments afford for extravagance will increase the burdens chargeable to this account in succeeding years.

In view of the obligation imposed upon me by the Constitution, it seems to me quite clear that I only discharge a duty to our people when I interpose my disapproval of the legislation proposed.

Many of the objects for which it appropriates public money are not related to the public welfare, and many of them are palpably for the benefit of limited localities or in aid of individual interests.

On the face of the bill it appears that not a few of these alleged improvements have been so improvidently planned and prosecuted that after an unwise expenditure of millions of dollars new experiments for their accomplishment have been entered upon.

While those intrusted with the management of public funds in the interest of all the people can hardly justify questionable expenditures for public work by pleading the opinions of engineers or others as to the practicability of such work, it appears that some of the projects for which appropriations are proposed in this bill have been entered upon without the approval or against the objections of the examining engineers.

I learn from official sources that there are appropriations contained in the bill to pay for work which private parties have actually agreed with the Government to do in consideration of their occupancy of public property.

Whatever items of doubtful propriety may have escaped observation or may have been tolerated in previous Executive approvals of similar bills, I am convinced that the bill now under consideration opens the way to insidious and increasing abuses, and is in itself so extravagant as to be especially unsuited to these times of depressed business and resulting disappointment in Government revenue. This consideration is emphasized by the prospect that the public Treasury will be confronted with other appropriations made at the present session of Congress amounting to more than $500,000,000.

Individual economy and careful expenditure are sterling virtues which lead to thrift and comfort. Economy and the exaction of clear justification for the appropriation of public moneys by the servants of the people are not only virtues but solemn obligations.

To the extent that the appropriations contained in this bill are instigated by private interests and promote local or individual projects, their allowance can not fail to stimulate a vicious paternalism and encourage a sentiment among our people, already too prevalent, that their attachment to our Government may properly rest upon the hope and expectation of direct and especial favors, and that the extent to which they are realized may furnish an estimate of the value of governmental care.

I believe no greater danger confronts us as a nation than the unhappy decadence among our people of genuine and trustworthy love and affection for our Government as the embodiment of the highest and best aspirations of humanity, and not as the giver of gifts, and because its mission is the enforcement of exact justice and equality and not the allowance of unfair favoritism.

I hope I may be permitted to suggest at a time when the issue of Government bonds to maintain the credit and financial standing of the country is a subject of criticism that the contracts provided for in this bill would create obligations of the United States amounting to $62,000,000 no less binding than its bonds for that sum.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 29, 1896.

[The message was received with applause.]

Mr. HERMANN. I move to refer the bill and message of the President of the United States to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman kindly indicate when the message can probably be returned to the House?

Mr. HERMANN. It is my impression, Mr. Speaker, that it will be not later than Tuesday.

Mr. DOCKERY. Not later than Tuesday, and probably on Monday?

Mr. HERMANN. I am not speaking by authority. That is simply my opinion.

Mr. DOCKERY. I hope the House will take notice.

The motion of Mr. HERMANN was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The time having arrived under the rule, the House will now be in recess until 8 o'clock this evening, when the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] will act as Speaker pro tempore.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order at 8 o'clock p. m. by Mr. PAYNE as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

2. The House shall on each Friday at 5 o'clock p. m. take a recess until 8 o'clock, at which evening session private pension bills, bills for the removal of political disabilities, and bills removing charges of desertion only shall be considered; said evening session not to extend beyond 10 o'clock and 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first bill.

Mr. KEM. Mr. Speaker, I move that in the consideration of pension bills to-night each bill be taken up in its regular order and considered, and that no exception be made to this rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Nebraska that this is the Calendar of unfinished business, and the regular order will be to take them up in their order. The motion of the gentleman is not in order at this time. The Clerk will report the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 819) granting a pension to Catherine Leary.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, I move that that bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will first report the bill.

The bill was read.

The amendment recommended by the Committee of the Whole was read.

Mr. CROWTHER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill be passed over without prejudice, retaining its place upon the Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. LONG. Why do you do that?

Mr. CROWTHER. In explanation I desire to say this: There are ten Senate bills on this Calendar of unfinished business. The probability is that before ten days shall have expired from this time this session will have closed; and if the bills should pass at this time it might be that perhaps the President would be unable to sign them all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the bill be laid aside and retain its place on the Calendar.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. May I ask, then, if this action is to be taken in reference to this bill——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is not debatable.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I am not going to debate it. A parliamentary inquiry. In view of the motion made by my friend from Missouri, or the request made by him, would it not be proper to have a motion made that all Senate bills on the Calendar of unfinished business be laid aside without prejudice?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It can not be done except by unanimous consent.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I ask unanimous consent, in view of the statement made and the probability that unless that is done it would lead to their defeat, that all Senate bills be laid aside without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks that all Senate bills on the Calendar of unfinished business be laid aside without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. JENKINS. I do not want to object, but I have a Senate bill that I want passed.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. With the exception of the bill to which the gentleman refers, I make that request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made, and the Clerk will proceed.

The amendment recommended by the Committee of the Whole was again reported:

Strike out "eight" and insert "twelve"; so as to read: "At the rate of $12 per month."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. There was no objection to this bill retaining its place on the Calendar unprejudiced, as I understand.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair asked if there was objection, and objection was made.

SAMUEL D. GILMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7127) granting a pension to Samuel D. Gilman.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

AUGUSTA G. CARY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4405) granting a pension to Augusta G. Cary.

The amendments recommended by the Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MRS. CHRISTINA GRAHAM.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4268) granting a pension to Mrs. Christina Graham.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

JOHN R. ROW.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3380) granting an increase of pension to John R. Row, of Toronto, Kans.

The amendment recommended by the Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

JACOB M. HAMBURGER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 948) to remove the charge of desertion against Jacob M. Hamburger.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES WILLIAMSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 807) granting a pension to Charles Williamson.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask that this bill be passed over without prejudice, and that it retain its place on the Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. ERDMAN. I think the Calendar ought to be cleared up, and I will object to that request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM GREER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6590) granting a pension to William Greer.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

HELEN M. MALLERY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 724) granting an increase of pension to Helen M. Mallery.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the rules be suspended and this bill retain its place on the Calendar without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent.

Mr. CROWTHER. Then I will state that I have been requested to ask that this bill retain its place on the Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over and retain its place on the Calendar.

Mr. KEM. I think we had better make no exceptions here.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. CROWTHER. I hope the gentleman will not object to this bill being passed over and retaining its place on the Calendar. That is the request of the gentleman who introduced it in the Senate.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Regular order.

Mr. CROWTHER. There can be no objection to this bill retaining its place on the Calendar. It simply saves the bill.

Mr. WOOD. I move that this bill be laid aside without losing its place.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the bill be laid aside, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I make the point of order that it requires unanimous consent to lay aside the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York makes the point that it requires unanimous consent to lay aside the bill. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. NORTHWAY. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Would it not be in order to postpone the consideration of this bill until the second Monday of December, 1896?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is in order.

A MEMBER. Move to postpone its consideration for a week.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Then I move to postpone the further consideration of this bill until one week from to-night.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio moves to postpone the further consideration of this bill until one week from to-night.

The motion was agreed to.

PRISCILLA R. BURNS.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 5938) for the relief of Pricilla R. Burns.

The bill was read.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MRS. WILLIAM LORING SPENCER.

The next business was the bill (S. 1699) for the relief of Mrs. William Loring Spencer.

The bill was read.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that this bill be laid on the table. A similar House bill has been passed and sent to the Senate, where it has been amended and sent back to the House and a conference thereon has been ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be laid on the table.

Mr. KEM. I object.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

ALEXANDER C. MORRISON.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 6552) granting an increase of pension to Alexander C. Morrison.

The bill was read.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

GIDEON L. M'GINNIS.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 6549) granting a pension to Gideon L. McGinnis.

The bill was read.

An amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MARY A. STACEY.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 6046) granting a pension to Mary A. Stacey, dependent mother of Manley T. Stacey, late private Company D, One hundred and eleventh Regiment New York Volunteers.

The bill was read.

An amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole striking out "Mary" and inserting "Sarah" was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended to conform to the amendment in the body of the bill.

OLIVE M. LEWIS.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 6472) granting a pension to Olive M. Lewis.

The bill was read.

An amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

JOSIAH P. BRADBURY.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 5852) to increase the pension of Josiah P. Bradbury.

The bill was read.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MISS JENNIE E. MOORE.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 6247) to grant a pension to Miss Jennie E. Moore.

The bill was read.

An amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

CATHARINE DILLON.

The next business was the bill (S. 148) granting a pension to Catharine Dillon.

The bill was read.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, I move that this bill be postponed until next Friday evening.

Mr. ERDMAN. Is that in order, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the motion is in order.

Mr. ERDMAN. I want to say that a quorum will have to do that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the motion must be decided without debate, unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, if there is to be objection I withdraw the motion.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM GROSE.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 515) granting a pension to William Grose.

The bill was read.

In accordance with the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole, the bill was laid on the table.

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. I think the intention was that this bill should lie over until the result of the action on a Senate bill of similar tenor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to lay the bill on the table is not debatable.

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. I understand that. I was simply inquiring as to the situation.

The question being taken, the bill was laid on the table.

LUE R. BROWN.

The next business was the bill (S. 1672) granting a pension to Lue R. Brown; which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELISE BLENKER.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 4410) to increase the pension of Elise Blenker from $30 to $50; which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GREENVILLE PUCKETT.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 5880) granting an increase of pension to Greenville Puckett; which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

LENA D. SMITH.

The next business was the bill (S. 1342) granting a pension to Lena D. Smith.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Is it in order to move to amend this bill now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A motion to amend is in order, the previous question not having been ordered.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I move to amend by striking out "$50" and inserting "$30."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ROBERT SMALLS.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 1874) to place the name of Robert Smalls on the pension roll.

The amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELLA D. CROSS.

The next business was the bill (S. 997) granting a pension to Ella D. Cross; which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. JANE STEWART WHITING.

The next business was the bill (S. 1511) granting a pension to Mrs. Jane Stewart Whiting.

The amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole, to strike out "$75" and insert "$50," was read.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "$50" and inserting "$30."

The amendment was agreed to; and the amendment as amended was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BARTON S. DAWSON.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 4494) granting a pension to Barton S. Dawson.

The amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DOLLY S. BROWN.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 1646) for the relief of Dolly S. Brown.

The amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE JOHNSON.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 4281) granting a pension to George Johnson, of Lenox, Iowa.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SILAS ADAMS.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 4841) granting a pension to Silas Adams, reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments.

The amendments were agreed to, and the bill as amended ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The title of the bill was amended to conform to the amendment reported from the committee.

CALEB L. JACKSON.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 6417) to complete the military record of Caleb Jackson; which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

JOHN ZELLERS.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 4519) granting a pension to John Zellers, reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments.

The amendments were agreed to, and the bill as amended ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

GABRIEL WIDMER.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 4267) granting an increase of pension to Gabriel Widmer; reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments.

The amendments were agreed to, and the bill as amended ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

HANNAH R. QUINT.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 6792) granting a pension to Hannah R. Quint.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The question being on the passage,

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that this is another case of a divorced widow. Now, I think she ought to have another chance. We ought to let her wait a little while longer. Perhaps she will marry again. We ought not to hamper her; and we may seriously injure her chances by pensioning her.

Mr. RANEY. I ask for the reading of the report in that case.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be laid over. The matter is pending before the Committee on Invalid Pensions on a vetoed bill; and I suppose the same action will be taken with this as in the other case.

Mr. KEM. I can not agree to that.

Mr. LACEY. I move that it be laid over for two weeks.

The motion was agreed to.

CELESTE A. BOUGHTON.

The next business was the bill (S. 1291) granting an increase of pension to Celeste A. Boughton, widow of Bvt. Brig. Gen. Horace Boughton, reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments.

The amendments were agreed to, and the bill as amended ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ELIZA G. PYNE.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 3990) granting a pension to Mrs. Eliza G. Pyne.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

AUGUSTA TULLER.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 3398) for the relief of Augusta Tuller, reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments.

The amendments were agreed to, and the bill as amended ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MARGARET J. YOUNG.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 9139) granting a pension to Margaret J. Young; which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ETHAN A. SELLMAN.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 4490) to restore the name of Ethan A. Sellman to the pension roll, reported from the Committee of the Whole with an amendment.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TALBERT. I ask to take up——

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KEM. I desire to renew my motion, if it is in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the statement of the gentleman?

Mr. KEM. A parliamentary inquiry. I desire to renew my motion now, if it is in order.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I had the floor, I think.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the motion? The Chair recognized the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WOOD], but if the gentleman has a question to ask——

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the votes by which the various bills have been passed be reconsidered, and I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay upon the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the various bills were passed was agreed to.

Mr. KEM. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to renew my motion.

MRS. CLIFFORD NEFF FYFFE.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. TALBERT. I ask that the House consider the bill, Calendar No. 877, granting a pension to Mrs. Clifford Neff Fyffe.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina asks for the present consideration of the following bill——

Mr. KEM. Is that by unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. He asks unanimous consent——

Mr. TALBERT. I ask unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER pro tempore (continuing). For the present consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will report, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection.

Mr. KEM. Then I must object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KEM].

A. S. LOUDERMILK.

Mr. FARIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate bill 1139, increasing the pension of A. S. Loudermilk, who is suffering from a gunshot wound.

Mr. KEM. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KEM] asks for the regular order, which is equivalent to an objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. KEM. Now I desire to offer my motion, if it is in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WOOD] moves that the House do now adjourn. That is in order. That is the regular order which the gentleman is demanding.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. POOLE) there were—ayes 43, noes 51.

So the motion to adjourn was rejected.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill H. R. 7969, and I hope no gentleman will object until he hears the report.

Mr. KEM. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KEM] demands the regular order, which is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. WOOD. As the House has refused to adjourn, I move that it resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole to take up bills that are subject to the order for to-night.

Mr. KEM. Now, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WOOD] moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar under clause 2 of Rule XXIV.

Mr. KEM. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to know if my motion is now in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the motion of the gentleman?

Mr. KEM. The motion that I made a while ago.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the motion? The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KEM. Namely, that in the consideration of pension bills to-night we take them up in the regular order and dispose of them, and that no exception shall be made to this rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion will be in order after the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole. The Chair does not think it is in order now.

Mr. SWANSON. A point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The rule states that the Committee of the Whole may determine the order in which bills shall be considered. The Chair does not recall any words of the rule that authorize the House to do it.

Mr. SWANSON. A parliamentary inquiry. As I understand the rule, it provides that the Committee of the Whole can do it, provided the House has not determined before it goes into Committee of the Whole as to what the order shall be.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman may be right about it. The Chair will cause the rule to be read.

Mr. KEM. All I desire to do is this——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will cause the rule to be read.

Mr. SWANSON (to Mr. KEM). Offer your motion as an amendment to the motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will be in order. The Clerk will read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

4. In Committees of the Whole House business on their Calendars may be taken up in regular order, or in such order as the committee may determine, unless the bill to be considered was determined by the House at the time of going into committee; but bills for raising revenue, general appropriation bills, and bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors shall have precedence.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the gentleman's motion would be in order.

Mr. WILLIS. I move to amend the motion to go into Committee of the Whole——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KEM] has the floor.

Mr. KEM. Mr. Speaker, on last Friday night we went into the Committee of the Whole——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman desire to submit a motion? This motion must be decided without debate.

Mr. KEM. I have already submitted my motion, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KEM], pending the motion to go into Committee of the Whole, moves that the House, in Committee of the Whole, proceed to take up the cases in the order in which they appear upon the Calendar.

Mr. KEM. And that no exception be made to that rule.

Mr. HICKS. I rise to a point of order. The point of order is this: That the House can not direct the Committee of the Whole as to what business they shall take up.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair caused the rule to be read, and the Chair thinks from the rule it is in order. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. ANDREWS. I rise to ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (S. 2758) granting a pension to Hiram H. Palmer.

Mr. KEM. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MILNES. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SWANSON. I make the point of order that that is a dilatory motion.

The question was taken on the motion to adjourn; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. CROWTHER. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 36, noes 53.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KEM], that when the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole it take up the bills in the order in which they appear on the Calendar without exception.

Mr. ANDREWS. I offer an amendment to that motion.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. May I offer a word?

Mr. ANDREWS. My motion is to amend the motion so that the roll be called and that each member as his name is called in alphabetical order may be permitted to call up a bill in which he may be interested or which is urgent.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Make that so the call shall begin at the bottom of the alphabet.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize no gentleman until the House is in order.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. All gentlemen will be seated. The gentleman from Nebraska will please reduce his amendment to writing.

Mr. ANDREWS. I will withdraw my amendment rather than reduce it to writing.

Mr. SWANSON. I would like to substitute, "to commence with the letter 'S.'"

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A substitute is not in order until the amendment to the amendment is reported to the House.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I understand that it is withdrawn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS] will reduce his amendment to writing and send it to the Clerk's desk to be read.

Mr. ANDREWS. If it is insisted upon.

Mr. WHEELER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHEELER. I have prepared a speech that I want printed in the RECORD, and I would like, in a parliamentary way, to have the assistance of the Chair to get it in. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Alabama that to-morrow he will be glad to give him some instructions upon that point if he needs them.

Mr. WHEELER. Then I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to print this in the RECORD.

Mr. KEM. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KEM].

Mr. CROWTHER. I desire to make the suggestion that inasmuch as the gentleman from Alabama has not had an opportunity to speak during this session, that he be permitted to have these remarks printed in the RECORD.

Mr. KEM. What is the regular order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will not entertain any other request until the gentleman from Nebraska has reduced his amendment to writing.

Mr. WILLIS. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair. Is the motion made by the gentleman from Nebraska debatable?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. WILLIS. As I understand the parliamentary situation, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KEM] offered an amendment that when the House went into Committee of the Whole it should take the bills up in their regular order. Then another gentleman offered a substitute before taking a vote on the amendment to the original proposition.

Mr. KEM. That was my amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Nebraska offered a motion, pending which his colleague [Mr. ANDREWS], offered the following amendment, which the Clerk will now report, and the House will be in order until it is reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KEM moved that in Committee of the Whole bills on the Calendar be considered in the regular order as they appear on the Calendar.

Mr. ANDREWS moves that the roll of members be called, and that each member as his name is called be permitted to call up one bill for consideration.

Mr. WILLIS. I move to amend the amendment.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I hope this amendment will not prevail.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. WILLIS. I move to amend the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of the belief that the amendment is not in order under the rules, as it might include bills not reported from committees and bills which the Committee of the Whole would not have power to consider. [Applause.] The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KEM].

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I move as an amendment to the amendment that the roll be called, and that each member as his name is called have the privilege of calling up one bill that has been reported from a committee and that is in order in this committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York will reduce his amendment to writing. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIS. I have an amendment to offer to that.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that that is a dilatory motion. The House has just voted upon it twice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, the Speaker pro tempore declared that the noes seemed to have it.

A division was called for.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 32, noes 50.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Speaker, I send to the desk an amendment which I offer to the motion of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KEM].

The amendment was read, as follows:

That the roll be called of members, and each member be entitled to call up one bill as his name is called, provided that such bill shall have been introduced by such member and reported and on the Calendar.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the original motion and also against the amendment. The point of order is that when we are about to go into Committee of the Whole the House may direct what particular bill shall be taken up in committee, but in the absence of such an order selecting some particular bill the whole matter is in the control of the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has already ruled on that point of order so far as the original motion is concerned; but the Chair thinks that the amendment of the gentleman from New York is obnoxious to the point of order, in that it may include bills which are not in order at a Friday night session. The Chair therefore rules the amendment out of order.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Then, Mr. Speaker, I renew the amendment, with the modification that it shall include only bills that are in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will reduce his amendment to writing. [Cries of "Question!" "Question!"]

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WILLIS. I rise to offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not yet before the House.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, is not this debatable?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from New York as modified.

The Clerk read the amendment as modified, as follows:

That the roll be called of members, and each member be entitled to call up one bill as his name is called, provided that such bill shall have been introduced by such member and reported and on the Calendar, and such a bill as is in order at a Friday night session.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend that amendment.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, is not that debatable?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not debatable.

Mr. WHEELER. I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state the point of order.

Mr. LACEY. It was stated a few moments ago, and the Chair sustained it, as I understood.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not sustain the point made by the gentleman from Iowa, and the Chair overruled the same point when previously made by some other gentleman. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FAIRCHILD].

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by adding to the amendment to the amendment that in calling the roll we begin at the bottom of the roll call. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the amendment of the gentleman from New York, as proposed to be amended by the gentleman from Delaware, on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That would lay the whole matter upon the table.

Mr. KEM. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KEM. If that is adopted, will it carry with it the original motion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. SWANSON, the Speaker pro tempore declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. ERDMAN. I ask for a division.

Mr. POOLE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is dividing.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. SWANSON; and it was rejected—ayes 14, noes 28.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ERDMAN] makes the point of no quorum.

Mr. EVANS. Call the roll.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (having counted). There are 128 gentlemen present; not a quorum.

Mr. POOLE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, the Speaker pro tempore declared the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HARDY and Mr. MCRAE asked for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 70, noes 66.

Mr. EVANS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 42 voting in favor thereof.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 67, nays 58, not voting, 230; as follows:

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, with a favorable recommendation, a draft of a bill making appropriation for the immediate repair of the United States Marine-Hospital buildings at St. Louis, Mo.—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, with a favorable recommendation, a draft of a bill to make certain amendments in the act entitled "An act to adopt regulations for preventing collisions at sea"—to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting, with a favorable recommendation, a draft of a bill to make certain amendments in the act entitled "An act to adopt regulations for preventing collisions at sea"—to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. WANGER, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 3170) entitled "An act to authorize the Butler and Pittsburg Railroad Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Allegheny River," reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2091); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. BENNETT, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred House bill No. 2282, reported in lieu thereof a bill (H. R. 9252) to facilitate the construction and maintenance of telegraphic communication between the United States, the Hawaiian Islands, Japan, and China, and to promote commerce, accompanied by a report (No. 2092); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona, from the Committee on the Territories, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 243) to enable the people of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2093); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. McRAE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 7044) for the better improvement of the Government reservation at the city of Fort Smith, in the State of Arkansas, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2094); which said bill and report, were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GROSVENOR, from the Committee on Ways and Means, to which was referred the joint resolution of the House (H. Res. 191) to authorize a scientific investigation of the fur-seal fisheries, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2095); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CUMMINGS, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 1991) to purchase a painting of Abraham Lincoln, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2096); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 8321) to authorize the county of St. Louis, in the State of Minnesota, to build or authorize the building of a foot and wagon bridge across the St. Louis River between Minnesota and Wisconsin at a point near Fond du Lac, in said State of Minnesota, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2097); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

By Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

The bill (H. R. 6215) to increase the pension of Ambrose D. Manion. (Report No. 2069.)

The bill (H. R. 8463) granting a pension to Milo Dixon. (Report No. 2070.)

By Mr. BAKER of Kansas, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

The bill (H. R. 8511) granting a pension to Ann M. Tate. (Report No. 2071.)

The bill (H. R. 7420) granting a pension to Elizabeth M. Sale. (Report No. 2072.)

The bill (H. R. 5750) granting a pension to Joseph Crow, of Eldorado, Kans. (Report No. 2103.)

By Mr. CROWTHER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions: The bill (H. R. 3805) to increase the pension of Clark W. Harrington, late sergeant of Company I, Ninety-third New York Infantry. (Report No. 2073.)

By Mr. KIRKPATRICK, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

The bill (H. R. 6962) granting a pension to Dennis B. Sanford. (Report No. 2074.)

The bill (H. R. 4621) granting a pension to Andrew J. Arnett. (Report No. 2075.)

The bill (H. R. 9157) granting a pension to Blanche E. Barlow. (Report No. 2076.)

The bill (H. R. 6971) granting a pension to Mary E. Bucklew. (Report No. 2077.)

By Mr. LAYTON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

The bill (H. R. 8524) to pension William Rice, Company G, Tenth Ohio Cavalry, at an increased rate. (Report No. 2078.)

By Mr. HITT: Resolutions adopted by the eighth annual encampment of the Division of Rhode Island Sons of Veterans, United States Army, held at Providence, R. I., February 12, 1896, sympathizing with the Cuban patriots, urgently supporting the Monroe doctrine, and deploring the massacre of Christians in Armenia—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. KIEFER: Resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of St. Paul, Minn., in favor of increasing the pay of letter carriers—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

SENATE.

MONDAY, June 1, 1896.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Friday last, when, on motion of Mr. HILL, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

PROPOSED FINANCIAL LEGISLATION.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I desire to state that I shall ask the leave of the Senate to address it upon the subject of the House tariff bill with the Senate silver-coinage substitute to-morrow in the morning hour, immediately after the conclusion of the routine business.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a memorial of the Pathological Society of Philadelphia, Pa., and a memorial of the State board of health, of Indianapolis, Ind., remonstrating against the passage of Senate bill No. 1552, for the further prevention of cruelty to animals in the District of Columbia; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. McMILLAN presented a petition of Typographical Union, No. 122, of Kalamazoo, Mich., praying for the Government ownership and control of the telegraph lines; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of the Baptist, Congregational, and Methodist Episcopal churches of Bronson, Mich., praying for the enactment of a Sunday-rest law for the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SHERMAN presented sundry petitions of citizens of Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation to restrict immigration; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LODGE presented resolutions adopted by Sons of Veterans, Division of Rhode Island, favoring the Monroe doctrine, sympathizing with the Cuban patriots, and deploring the Armenian massacres; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PEFFER. I present the petition of A. E. Redstone, asking for the passage of Senate bill 2118. In making this request the petitioner sets forth certain important facts that on the western slope of the Sierra Nevada Mountains certain settlers, himself among others, for whom he speaks, settled upon certain public land, made farms and other improvements, and when the Sierra forest reserve was made by act of Congress it inclosed the homes of these settlers, and that from that time until the present their homes have been practically valueless to them, cut off from all communication with the outside world, and he and his neighbors have been asking Congress from year to year since that time for relief.

Senate bill 2118 is a bill that has been introduced in the Senate and referred to the proper committee for the purpose of affording that relief. Among other things the petitioner asks that a typewritten copy of testimony which was taken at Fresno, Cal., by the Felton Commission, of the Fifty-third Congress, be printed in the RECORD, etc.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE presented a memorial of the Trades League of Philadelphia, Pa., remonstrating against the adoption of the proposed amendment to section 10 of the interstate-commerce act; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. STEWART presented memorials of John H. Carper and 42 other citizens of Farmington, Wash.; of W. I. King and 19 other citizens of Clay, Cal.; of A. J. Kershner and 47 other citizens of Claylick, Pa.; of William H. Daniels and 21 other citizens of Fairhaven, Wash.; of J. W. Baker and 18 other citizens of Magnolia, Ark.; of N. G. Wilson and 37 other citizens of Auburn, Ark.; of J. F. Gwin and 75 other citizens of Galt, Cal., and of the Order of the Patriots of America of Galt, Cal., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Loud bill, to amend the postal laws relating to second-class mail matter; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. DANIEL. I present the memorial of John Cowdon, of Washington, D. C., relative to certain items contained in the river and harbor appropriation bill.

I beg leave to state, in presenting it, that I do not mean to intimate any approval or dissent from the opinions therein expressed. I present it as a matter of courtesy upon my part, and I communicate to the Senate the request of the memorialist that his memorial may be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). As a document, does the Chair understand?

Mr. DANIEL. As a document of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be made. The memorial will lie on the table.

REGULATIONS CONCERNING FILLED CHEESE.

Mr. SHERMAN. In the nature of a resolution, I will ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that at 4 o'clock to-day the vote be taken on what is called the filled-cheese bill. The Senate has been very kind in regard to other bills, and I hope that it will allow this bill to be voted on at 4 o'clock to-day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will submit the request of the Senator from Ohio to the Senate.

Mr. HILL. What is the request?

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that at 4 o'clock this afternoon the vote shall be taken on the cheese bill and any amendments that are pending or any amendments that are offered.

Mr. HILL. I am in favor of that bill and expect to vote for it on its final passage, but in the absence of several Senators who are opposing the bill I do not think it is quite right to fix a time now for its final passage.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have inquired of several Senators about it and they made no objection at all to the proposition I now make; but I will defer the request if the Senator from New York desires and will let me know when the time comes.

Mr. HILL. I have no objection myself, but I think it would be wiser to wait until several Senators who are now absent are present.

Mr. SHERMAN. There was an agreement made on Friday last to dispose of the bond bill to-morrow. I should like to have this bill disposed of without further debate, so that it may go into conference.

Mr. VEST entered the Chamber.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Missouri is now here.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair submits to the Senate the request of the Senator from Ohio that the vote be taken at 4 o'clock.

Mr. HARRIS. I object.

Mr. SHERMAN. At 4 o'clock to-day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At 4 o'clock to-day.

Mr. HARRIS. I object to any agreement on the subject.

Mr. HALE. I call for the regular order of business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there are no further petitions and memorials, reports of standing and select committees are next in order.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2941) to authorize the Baltimore and Washington Transit Company of Maryland to enter the District of Columbia, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2288) to provide for the removal of snow, ice, and dirt from the sidewalks, crosswalks, and gutters in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. McMILLAN. There are corresponding House bills on the Calendar.

Mr. SHOUP, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1277) for the appointment as lieutenants on the retired list of certain survivors of the Lady Franklin Bay expedition, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3049) to incorporate the Maritime Canal of North America, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2504) to incorporate the Maritime Canal of North America, and for other purposes, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BRICE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2989) to increase the pension of Caroline S. Baker, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

ELVIRA BACHELDER.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, reported a bill (S. 3245) granting a pension to Elvira Bachelder, and submitted a report thereon.

The bill was read twice by its title.

Mr. GALLINGER. A bill granting a pension to this old lady passed both Houses, but was vetoed by the President the other day for the reason that the military record was not correctly given. The President says:

> On the merits of the case I am satisfied this mother deserves a pension. I withhold my approval of the bill intended to grant her this relief solely because I am advised that the law would be inoperative for the reason that the deceased soldier never served in the Seventh New Hampshire Infantry, and should have been described in the bill as a member of Company D, First New Hampshire Heavy Artillery.

This bill proposes to correct the soldier's record, and I ask for its immediate consideration, a bill granting the pension having passed the Senate before.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension roll, at the rate of $12 a month, the name of Elvira Bachelder, dependent mother of J. K. P. Bachelder, late a private in Company D, First New Hampshire Heavy Artillery.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

W. H. MICHAEL.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate to W. H. Michael the sum of $1,600 for compiling and indexing all the acts imposing duties on imports heretofore passed by Congress, the said compilation having been made and completed under the authority of the Joint Committee on Printing, as authorized by concurrent resolution of January 16, 1896.

FLAGSTAFF AND CANYON RAILROAD.

Mr. TELLER. I am directed by the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7578) granting the Flagstaff and Canyon Railroad Company right of way for railroad purposes through the Grand Canyon Forest Reserve in northern Arizona, to report it without amendment. As the bill is simply for a right of way across a forest reservation, I ask that it may be now considered.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask to have the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill laid before the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from South Dakota allow me to present a conference report, that it may be printed?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. TELLER. I submit a conference report on the bill (H. R. 5210) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes. I ask that the report be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5210) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 6, 22, 23, 24, 28, 29, 30, 50, 52, 59, 60, 62, 63, 68, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 79, 80, 81, 83, 102, 104, 105, 107, 112, 113, 114, 118, 122, 123, 127, 128, 129, 130, 132, 134, 144, 146, 148, 152, 153, 157, 158, 162, 170, and 199.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 7, 8, 10, 12, 13, 14, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 25, 30, 33, 34, 38, 48, 49, 53, 56, 58, 64, 65, 66, 67, 70, 71, 72, 78, 82, 84, 85, 108, 109, 110, 111, 115, 126, 133, 136, 138, 142, 145, 151, 159, 160, 161, 164, 165, 166, 168, 169, 192, 197, and 198, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$51,089"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 5: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "expenditures," at the end of line 4 of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the following: ", not exceeding in the aggregate $9,713.50"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 9: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "deputy collector, $1,800, and such deputy collector shall hereafter perform such duties as may be required of him by the collector, and the collector may require the said deputy collector to give bond for the faithful performance of such duties; but the collector shall in every respect be responsible, as now provided by law, to the United States, the District of Columbia, and to individuals, as the case may be, for all moneys collected;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 11: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$16,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendments numbered 15 and 16: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 15 and 16, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the matter inserted by said amendments, and on page 4 of the bill strike out all after the word "markets," in line 21, down to and including the word "dollars," in line 23, and insert in lieu thereof the words "one thousand two hundred dollars"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 27: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter proposed to be stricken out by said amendment, and strike out all after the word "law," in line 5 of the matter inserted by said amendment; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 28: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 28, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$9,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 31: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 31, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$7,500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 32: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 32, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$3,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 35: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 35, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$2,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 36: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 36, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: Strike out the sum named in lines 6 and 7 of said amendment, and insert in lieu thereof "$10,000"; and strike out all of said amendment after the word "highways," in line 13; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 37: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 37, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$10,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 131: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 131, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the number named insert "286"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 135: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 135, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed in said amendment insert "$576,940"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 137: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 137, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$19,500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 139: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 139, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$37,750"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 140: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 140, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the number proposed insert "eight"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 141: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 141, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$142,100"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 143: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 143, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$5,500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 147: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 147, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$38,500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 149: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 149, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 150: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 150, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$4,200"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 155: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 155, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 156: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 156, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$10,900"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 163: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 163, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out and inserted by said amendment insert the following: "$1,800, to be expended under the direction of the Attorney-General"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 167: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 167, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$1,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 196: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 196, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$5,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 200: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 200, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$37,934"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference have been unable to agree on the amendments of the Senate numbered 40, 61, 69, 87, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 105, 154, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 193, 194, 195, and 201.

FRIEZE IN THE ROTUNDA.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I am directed by the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 152) appropriating $6,000 for completing the painting of the frieze in the Rotunda of the United States Capitol, to report it without amendment; and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read for information.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, etc., For completing the painting of the frieze in the Rotunda of the United States Capitol by Filippo Costaggini, after designs to be furnished by him and approved by the Joint Committee on the Library, $6,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution? The Chair hears none, and it is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment. If there be no amendment as in Committee of the Whole, the joint resolution will be considered as having been reported to the Senate for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am not quite satisfied with the manner in which that frieze is being finished or conducted. I make no special criticism upon the President of the United States for various reasons, and he might find his place upon it, but I am not quite satisfied with an attempt to approve a history of the United States, which the frieze is supposed to suggest, that omits George Washington and Abraham Lincoln and presents Mr. Cleveland, when we consider the respective positions of Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Cleveland during the great war of the rebellion.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. In my judgment there is not an appropriate place in this fresco work for a representation of any of the Presidents, and this is the judgment of the Committee on the Library. The joint resolution proposes an appropriation of $6,000 to complete the fresco work in the Dome of the Capitol. It is very important that the unsightly scaffolding that has been hanging there for two or three years, and which one of these days will fall and kill some one, should be removed.

I have here two sketches which it is proposed to use in completing the fresco work. The one that the Senator from Connecticut objects to, or believes he objects to, represents President Cleveland pressing the electric button which notified the world that the World's Fair was open. It also represents in the background the Duke of Veragua and his family, the remnants of the Columbus family, and all there is left of it.

It will be remembered that the first painting in the frieze of the Dome is a fresco representing Columbus landing in America. The last one will be a fresco representing the opening of the World's Fair, attended by the only living descendants of the Columbus family. The committee think it a very appropriate sketch. I do not believe the Senate should permit, or any Senator here should permit his prejudices, if he has any, against the President of the United States to stand in the way of carrying out the purpose of the joint resolution.

Mr. HAWLEY. The artistic purpose of the frieze evidently is to suggest a great deal more than it tells. I wonder how a man giving the history of the United States could entirely skip the great war for the Union. If you ask how I would put it upon the frieze, if I did nothing else I would represent the apple tree at Appomattox and Grant and Lee shaking hands, with surrounding touches and intimations of troops and various designs. I am sure that an artist who had poetry and patriotism in him could easily suggest the whole history and show the whole happy conclusion of that great event. I think the scheme lacks something. I do not object to the Senator's idea of giving a hint of the great exhibition at Chicago, but I object to the utter absence of the greatest historical event since the war of the Revolution—one of the greatest in all history. However, I will let it go. It will, by the absence of what ought to be there, suggest criticism and consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair did not understand the Senator from Connecticut to object to the present consideration of the joint resolution. If the Senator objects——

Mr. HAWLEY. No, sir; I do not object, for there is more criticism of its propositions. The Committee on the Library is preparing for us, to put here in this Hall in one of these niches, a bust of John C. Breckinridge, who left the chair you now occupy, sir, to engage in the rebellion. You may say, without reference to what he was or was not in the war, that he had the elements of nobility in his character; you may say, without reference to that, that it is simply his historical relations we must consider, and he must be given his place among those honored men in the list of Vice-Presidents. I make no objection. I do not quite like some of these things, however. I want history told simply as it is; that is all.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. With regard to the bust which is to occupy a place in this Chamber, I will say that it will be placed here in compliance with a statute and at the request of at least one of the Senators from the State of Kentucky and other Senators on this floor. I am one of those who are liberal enough to believe that the war is over.

Mr. HAWLEY. Well, Mr. President, I object to that sneer.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. It was not intended as such.

Mr. HAWLEY. It was one. I am liberal about these things. I have toward the men who were in the rebellion not one particle of hostility, and I thank heaven there are many among them with whom I am upon terms of warmest friendship, and I could easily cast my eye upon some of them here, not to mention others scattered all about the country. But I do not believe in telling a falsehood about the history of my country. There was an enormous war over a great principle, which involved untold volumes of history of brave transactions, and the Confederates need not be ashamed to be mentioned as soldiers, nor the Union men, either. No, sir; I have voted here for liberal treatment of the men who were in the rebellion. They may come into public office; they may go into the Army if they get appointments now. We have wiped all those things out, but there is no use in wiping out of history the war and its significance, and it will be quite impossible to do so.

Mr. SHOUP. I desire to submit a report from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Do I understand that the joint resolution has been disposed of?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution reported by the Senator from North Dakota has been passed.

Mr. WILSON. Do I understand the Chair to state that the joint resolution has been passed?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair had announced that without objection the joint resolution was passed before the Senator from Connecticut addressed the Chair. The Chair then inquired of the Senator from Connecticut whether he interposed an objection. The Chair understood the Senator from Connecticut to say that he did not object.

Mr. HAWLEY. When I heard the joint resolution read I had not been paying very close attention. I thought it was the reading that precedes consideration. I did not know that it was announced that it was passed. However, I should have asked leave to speak even had I known to what stage the bill had arrived.

Mr. WILSON. I certainly thought an objection had been interposed. Then I understood the Senator from Connecticut to withdraw whatever objection he had, and I thought perhaps the Chair would ask if objection was made, whereupon I intended to interpose an objection to the joint resolution. If the joint resolution has already been passed——

Mr. SHERMAN (to Mr. WILSON). You can move to reconsider.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the Senator from Washington to object now to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. WILSON. If the Senator from Washington has that right under the rule, I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being interposed, the joint resolution will go over under the rule.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PEFFER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3246) to promote aerial navigation for military purposes; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ALLEN (for Mr. THURSTON) introduced a bill (S. 3248) granting an increase of pension to Edward Yarton; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (for Mr. THURSTON) introduced a bill (S. 3249) granting an increase of pension to Andrew J. Cook; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GEAR introduced a bill (S. 3250) for the relief of Julia A. Devier; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

THE NICARAGUA CANAL.

Mr. MORGAN. I introduce a bill, and I wish to make a brief remark about it.

The bill (S. 3247) to amend the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua," approved February 20, 1889; was read twice by its title.

Mr. MORGAN. I understand that a bill similar in import has been agreed to by the House committee, and probably it may be reported to-day; I do not know. But I introduce this bill without committing myself to all its provisions, and yet I think I could agree to every one of them personally.

The bill is the production of Hon. Mr. MAHON, of Pennsylvania. It was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in the House and has been considered by them very laboriously, and after long investigation they have concluded to report it back to the House, as I am informed. At all events, I introduce it upon that supposition.

I think, Mr. President, that the country is to be congratulated that both Houses in their action, in some form or other, have indorsed all of the great outlying propositions which are involved in the Nicaraguan Canal subject. I believe it would be hardly possible, at least in the Senate, to get action upon this bill at the present session of Congress. I do not hope to realize that expectation. At the same time, if the Senate of the United States, before it should disperse, would reenact the bill that it enacted here at the last session of the last Congress, or this bill, which is substantially the same in its general features, I think that the country would feel great satisfaction with the idea that we were doing something for the benefit of the world as well as our own people.

I move that the bill be referred to the Select Committee on the Construction of the Nicaragua Canal.

The motion was agreed to.

ISSUE OF BONDS.

Mr. BROWN. I submit a resolution and ask that it may lie on the table. I shall discuss it in the course of the day.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Be it resolved, That, in the opinion of the Senate of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury has no authority under the act of January 14, 1875, to issue any further or other bonds in addition to those already issued, and that any such bonds that may hereafter be issued by him will be without authority of law and void.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table for the present.

SEIZURE OF SCHOONER FREDERICH GERRING, JR.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to report to the Senate the facts in regard to the seizure of the American schooner Frederick Gerring, jr., by the Canadian revenue cutter Aberdeen; whether there is any proof that said schooner was fishing inside the 3-mile limit at the time of the seizure, and to inform the Senate what action, if any, has been taken by the United States Government in regard to the seizure of said schooner.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on May 28, 1896, approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 144) granting an increase of pension to T. Clarkson Ingalls;

An act (S. 145) granting a pension to Maud Ardelle Bliss;

An act (S. 177) granting an increase of pension to Sophia D. Clendenin;

An act (S. 247) granting a pension to Wallace McGrath;

An act (S. 466) granting an increase of pension to William Brown;

An act (S. 1051) granting a pension to Elizabeth New, widow of Jethrow New;

An act (S. 2014) granting an increase of pension to Sarah A. Bull;

An act (S. 2175) granting a pension to James Lloyd Young, late of Company A, Sixth Regiment Kentucky Volunteers;

An act (S. 2823) to increase the pension of Theodore V. Purdy; and

An act (S. 888) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Capital Railway Company," approved March 2, 1895.

The message also announced that the President of the United States had on May 29, 1896, approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 246) granting a pension to Nancy Carson Blunt;

An act (S. 705) granting a pension to Emily B. Muncey; and

An act (S. 746) granting a pension to Elizabeth E. Donohoe.

The message further announced that the President of the United States had on May 30, 1896, approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 616) granting a pension to Matilda Gresham, widow of the late Walter Q. Gresham, at the rate of $100 per month;

An act (S. 404) granting a pension to Samuel Goldwater;
An act (S. 1924) granting a pension to Carrie L. Yeaton;
An act (S. 1493) granting a pension to Mary Clare Kelly;
An act (S. 1215) granting a pension to Ellen Kingsley;
An act (S. 1044) granting a pension to Mary Newman;
An act (S. 125) for the relief of Elizabeth Cook, of Arkadelphia, Clark County, Ark., widow of Robert T. Cook;
An act (S. 739) granting an increase of pension to C. E. Philbrook, major of Twenty-fourth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers;
An act (S. 1435) granting an increase of pension to Nathan Kimball; and An act (S. 3011) for the relief of Nicolai Bros.

The message also announced that the President of the United States had on this day approved and signed the act (S. 1659) to amend the laws of the District of Columbia as to married women, to make parents natural guardians of their minor children, and for other purposes.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

The message further announced that the following bills were presented to the President May 13, 1896, and not having been returned by him to the House of Congress in which they originated within the ten days prescribed by the Constitution, have become laws without his approval:

An act (S. 981) relating to the testimony of physicians in the courts of the District of Columbia;
An act (S. 2790) for the relief of Sophronia S. Stowell; and
An act (S. 2843) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Boonville, Mo.

The message also announced that the bill (S. 730) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Helen Morrell Carroll was presented to the President May 15, 1896, and not having been returned by him to the House of Congress in which it originated within the ten days prescribed by the Constitution, has become a law without his approval.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CHAPELL, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7542) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, further insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments numbered 2, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 51, 52, and 53 to the bill, agreed to the further conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BOUTELLE, Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania, and Mr. CUMMINGS managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 148) granting a pension to Catharine Dillon;
A bill (S. 807) granting a pension to Charles Williamson;
A bill (S. 887) granting a pension to Ella D. Cross; and
A bill (S. 1672) granting a pension to Lue R. Brown.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills, each with an amendment; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 9139) granting a pension to Margaret J. Young.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask that the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill be laid before the Senate.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the conference report on the bill (H. R. 6249) making appropriations for current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, at the time when the hour expired in the consideration of the conference report on Friday, I was still discussing the question of the point of order. I do not wish to spend too much time upon that point unless it shall be renewed and discussion be perhaps important to it, but I do desire to add a few words from which I was cut off on Friday.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] asked a question, "whether there is any rule positive or any rule in parliamentary law which exempts a committee of conference from an obligation to observe the rules of the Senate." I understand the precise contrary to be the rule of parliamentary law. The conferees or managers on the part of either body of Congress or Parliament or legislature were originally directed when a conference was ordered to submit to the managers of the other House on the part of that House which asked the conference simply the reasons in support of the amendment which had been passed by the House and disagreed to by the other. The old practice was to put those reasons in writing. They were carefully considered by the House which sought the conference, and they were submitted by the conferees to the managers on the part of the other House without the right to argue, and the disagreement continued if they were not accepted as sufficient to justify the proposed action.

Then came the other course, which is called a free conference, in which the managers were intrusted with the presentation verbally of the reasons which supported the course desired to be pursued by one House.

Now, I will turn to a word or two only in Cushing on Parliamentary Law to show the nature of conferences and what may be done in conference. Speaking of communications by conference, he says that—

> The most usual occasions, upon which it is competent for either house, according to the practice of Parliament, to demand a conference with the other, may be arranged under the following heads, namely—

There are five, the fifth of which only is important to the present consideration—

> 5. To offer reasons for disagreeing to, or insisting on, amendments made by one house to bills, resolutions, or addresses, passed or agreed upon in the other.

Then later he lays it down that—

> The duty of the managers, on the part of the house proposing the conference, is confined to the delivery to the managers for the other of the communication, whatever it may be, which it is the purpose of the communication to make; and the duty of the managers for the other house is merely to receive such communication. They are not at liberty to speak, either on the one side to enforce, or on the other to make objections to, the communication.

After the practice of the free conference superseded the more limited method of presenting the reasons, the difference was, in the eye of parliamentary law, only that the reasons were presented verbally, and the reasons of the other House for disagreeing were also presented verbally, and if no acceptance of the amendment resulted, the managers reported back to the House their disagreement. There is in no treatise upon parliamentary law any provision which I have fallen upon which authorizes the conferees to make amendments of their own volition to a bill. They are limited by the principles of parliamentary law to the presentation pro and con of the reasons which support the proposed amendment or the disagreement to it. So far from the rule being that conferees are exempt from the limitations in the rules of the Senate so that they can introduce to the legislation under discussion general legislation, or provisions of a character not merely in nature to perfect that which is proposed, the rule is laid down thus by Mr. Cushing, in paragraph 841 of his work:

> The only rules relating to the manner in which the discussions at a free conference are to be conducted seem to be the same by which a debate in either house on the same subject-matter would be conducted; namely, 1. That no personalities, either toward the managers on the other side or the house which they represent are to be indulged in; and, 2—

To which I ask now particular attention—

That no irrelevant topic, that is, one not embraced within the subject-matter of the conference, as agreed upon, is to be introduced.

Such is the parliamentary law in respect to conferences. Conferences are to be conducted upon the same principles as a debate, and of course conferees are to be governed by the rules which limit debate in the House, and especially by a rule which prohibits the introduction of a new subject of legislation.

Now, let us see what is the duty of conferees in case a violation of this principle should happen in the conference, as, for example, if the House conferees in this particular issue insisted upon proposing general legislation upon this bill in violation of the rules of the Senate, the introduction of what is declared to be an inadmissible thing, an irrelevant topic, not embraced in the subject-matter of the conferences as agreed upon. He says:

If either of these rules is infringed by the managers or any of them on the one side there is no other remedy but for the managers on the other to object to any further proceeding, stating at the same time the reason of their objection, and then to withdraw from the conference and report the whole matter to the house of which they are members.

That indicates at once what the proper course of procedure of these conferees was, that the managers on the part of the Senate, if we are to suppose that this general legislation which had once been ruled out of order in the Senate was proposed again to this bill by the managers on the part of the House, instead of accepting it and reporting it as an agreed measure, it was the duty of the conferees to have reported that the managers on the part of the House declined to accept the amendment proposed by the Senate, but added to it as a condition the proposal of new legislation of a general character, which, under the rules of the Senate, they were not authorized to accept.

Now, Mr. President, it seems to me that that is a perfectly plain expression of what common sense teaches. It has been the crying evil of the legislation of Congress that too much of it was originated in conference. The same rule, however, does not in all its particulars apply, at least with equal force, to conferences upon other bills than appropriation bills, because other bills are in their nature general legislation for the most part, and there is no rule of the Senate which would forbid the offering of an amendment to such a bill germane and proper in its nature; but in the case of an appropriation bill there is the express and particular rule of the Senate that no general legislation shall be received to it from any quarter whatever, for that is the import of the rule, relating not to the source from which the proposal comes, but to the nature of the proposal, and for the reason which I gave the other day.

I might add, as was suggested to me afterwards by the Senator from Mississippi, that another strong reason supports it, and that is that Senators ought not to be put to the necessity of voting for some measure which they themselves can not approve, or else to defeat perhaps the passage of an appropriation bill which they are conscious the needs of the public service may require. In every aspect in which this business can be viewed, from the standpoint of parliamentary law, as to the obligation resting upon conferees or managers on the part of the Senate, it seems to me perfectly clear that the duty of the Chair is to protect the Senate against the imposition upon appropriation bills of legislation of this character, when proposed by the managers of the conference, with the same force which it lies upon him to protect the Senate from the imposition of such propositions when offered in the course of the discussion of a measure. I therefore think the point of order ought to have been insisted upon and sustained. Of course it comes to the same thing if the Senate takes a vote to reject it, but if we tolerate that practice we have taken away one of the safeguards which the rule provides against legislation of this character.

I called attention the other day to the fact that this is new legislation of a general character, not merely new legislation but general legislation, and I pointed out, and I do not propose to repeat it, that the difference between the original amendment which was ruled out of order in the Senate and that proposed by the conferees is insignificant so far as any claim may be made that the one is different from the other in the sense of this rule. Limiting it to the subject of the citizenship of the Indian tribes, the amendment is substantially the same; in most particulars practically identical. But there is another thing in the amendment, which was not in the amendment proposed in the Senate, that is of very great importance. Here is a declaration in the amendment proposed by the managers of the conference that goes far beyond the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. It is far more radical in its nature than the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut. After having made the same provisions substantially with reference to the determination of citizenship and the making up of the roll of citizens which was included in the former amendment, this one now proposes the following declaration of public policy on the subject of the government of the Indian tribes:

It is hereby declared to be the duty of the United States to establish a government in the Indian Territory which will rectify the many inequalities and discriminations now existing in said Territory and afford needful protection to the lives and property of all citizens and residents thereof.

The last clause is merely an explanation of the reasons or objects of the Government, not all that might be mentioned, but the leading ones. Thus, by this amendment Congress is asked not only to interfere with the right of the tribes to make up their rolls of citizenship but to go much further than has yet been suggested—to declare the duty of this Government to establish a government in the Indian Territory.

Let us consider for a moment what that means with reference to the condition of the Indians under the treaties which have been made with them by this Government. Of course if the amendment proposes radically to alter the established government which the United States have caused to be created in a single one of those five tribes, it is not only general legislation but general legislation of a most important character; and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY], who asked a question the other day in respect to the subject, will, I am sure, agree with me that that is a fair statement.

Let us, for an illustration, take a single one of these tribes, and I am now only repeating the argument which the Senate heard when the Indian appropriation bill was before it and upon which the Senate manifested its entire unwillingness to receive this proposal of general legislation. Take the case of the Cherokee Nation, and I shall not trespass upon the patience of the Senate to go at greatest length into the history of treaties with any one of those tribes. However, I desire to call attention to the engagements between the United States and the Cherokees. The Cherokee Nation formerly lived in certain Southern States, and the United States had dealt with them repeatedly as an independent nation. Finally it sought to secure their removal beyond the Mississippi River, and several different conventions were had during the course of a number of years in order to reach that result. Treaties were made in 1816, 1817, 1828, 1833, and 1835. The treaty of 1828 contained a covenant on the part of the United States to grant to the Cherokee Nation a tract of 7,000,000 acres of land west of the Mississippi, within defined bounds, and an additional agreement to grant them an outlet to the western border of the United States, so as to give them access to the Spanish or Mexican territory lying to the west of it. That outlet embraced over 6,000,000 acres. The United States covenanted to give them a patent for the land, so that the title of the lands bestowed upon them in consideration of the cession of their lands in the South and their removal to the West should be absolute and perfect in the Cherokee Nation. Now see further what was agreed to by the United States in the fifth article of the treaty of 1835, which has never been qualified or in any measure withdrawn:

The United States hereby covenant and agree that the lands ceded to the Cherokee Nation in the foregoing article shall, in no future time, without their consent, be included within the territorial limits or jurisdiction of any State or Territory. But they shall secure to the Cherokee Nation the right, by their national councils, to make and carry into effect all such laws as they may deem necessary for the government and protection of the persons and property within their own country belonging to their people or such persons as have connected themselves with them: Provided always, That they shall not be inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States and such acts of Congress as have been or may be passed regulating trade and intercourse with the Indians.

The last part of the article it is immaterial to read. It is in relation to travelers in the country. Now, take the next article:

ART. 6. Perpetual peace and friendship shall exist between the citizens of the United States and the Cherokee Indians. The United States agree to protect the Cherokee Nation from domestic strife and foreign enemies and against intestine wars between the several tribes. The Cherokees shall endeavor to preserve and maintain the peace of the country and not make war upon their neighbors. They shall also be protected against interruption and intrusion from citizens of the United States who may attempt to settle in the country without their consent; and all such persons shall be removed from the same by order of the President of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, what was the legal consequence of our creating, in the solemnest manner that the United States can make an engagement, an autonomous nation of Indians and bestowing upon that nation the full title, by patent granted by the United States to them, of all the territory which was to be theirs, in no future time to be included within a State or Territorial government of the United States except by their own consent? First, it implied, if it may not be said to be an explicit declaration, that they possessed the right to determine the question of their own citizens. The Supreme Court of the United States recognized that in two or three cases in terms which leave no opportunity for doubt about the meaning of those provisions. No lawyer will pretend, no man who will address his mind to this subject as a matter of fair legal interpretation will pretend, that to create an autonomous government, with full power of legislation according to their own methods, is not to invest them with the full power of determining who constitute the citizens within that government. The Supreme Court in the Cherokee trust fund case said distinctly:

By treaties with the Cherokees the United States have recognized them as a distinct political community, so far independent as to justify and require negotiations with them in that character.

Then there followed in that case a further discussion of the right of the Eastern Cherokees, who had not migrated to the lands of the Cherokee Nation, to participate as citizens in the funds and property of the Cherokee Nation there domiciled and settled. The Supreme Court in that case said of that question:

The claim presented by the Cherokees of North Carolina to a share of the commuted annuity fund of $214,000, and of the fund created by sales of lands west of the Mississippi ceded to the Cherokee Nation, resting as it does upon the designation in the treaties of the lands originally possessed by the Cherokees and ceded to the United States, or subsequently acquired by them from the United States as "the common property of the nation," or as held for the "common use and benefit" of the Cherokee people, has no substantial foundation.

And the reason was given; and I quote further to illustrate that reason and to reenforce the proposition I am making:

If Indians in that State, or in any other State east of the Mississippi, wish to enjoy the benefits of the common property of the Cherokee Nation, in whatever form it may exist, they must, as held by the Court of Claims, comply with the constitution and laws of the Cherokee Nation, and be readmitted to citizenship as there provided.

It did not need that explicit declaration of the Supreme Court; but if anything were necessary in the way of judicial determination, that is ample and sufficient to fix the absolute and exclusive right of the Cherokee Nation to determine for itself who constitute citizens entitled to share the property and the privileges of the Cherokee government and the Cherokee people.

But let us go a step further. A few years ago the advance of frontiersmen upon the Indian Territory created a demand for the country known as the Cherokee Outlet. We created a commission to negotiate with the Cherokee Nation to buy the Outlet. It resulted in an agreement by which the United States paid a sum of money, exceeding $6,000,000, for their title to that Outlet, such as it was. It was a title limited in character and different from that by which they hold the territory of their nation. They were reluctant to give it up, but they acceded to the desire of the United States and they made a bargain to sell. But at the same time, in making that bargain they stipulated afresh not only for money but for what they regarded as of at least equal importance. They stipulated again that the United States should guarantee and protect their right to determine the question of citizenship; and now I desire to note the covenant in that agreement which the United States made only four years ago last December:

For and in consideration of the above cession and relinquishment, the United States agrees:

First. That all persons now resident, or who may hereafter become residents, in the Cherokee Nation, and who are not recognized as citizens of the Cherokee Nation by the constituted authorities thereof, and who are not in the employment of the Cherokee Nation or in the employment of citizens of the Cherokee Nation, in conformity with the laws thereof, or in the employment of the United States Government, and all citizens of the United States who are not resident in the Cherokee Nation under the provisions of treaty or acts of Congress, shall be deemed and held to be intruders and unauthorized persons within the intent and meaning of section 6 of the treaty of 1835—and sections 26 and 27 of the treaty of July 19, 1866, and shall, together with their personal effects, be removed without delay from the limits of said nation by the United States, as trespassers, upon the demand of the principal chief of the Cherokee Nation.

Which I have read—

Mr. President, when that treaty was laid before Congress and became the subject of discussion, it was held up for some time without being ratified by Congress. But finally a law was passed—I think it was March, 1893, if I am not mistaken as to the date—by which the treaty was ratified, and this particular clause was especially ratified, with the addition only of an amendment to the effect that before any intruder should be removed the value of his improvements should be appraised and paid him, etc. I shall not stop to read the detail of that limitation.

Mr. GEORGE. May I ask the Senator from Wisconsin if that addition or modification of the agreement was made by act of Congress alone, or was it dependent upon ratification by the Cherokees?

Mr. VILAS. It was in the act ratifying the treaty, and no provision was made, as I remember, for a resubmission, nor has there ever been any other acceptance of it than may be implied in the fact that the Cherokee Nation received the money which was paid for the Outlet. But that does not alter this question at all. We thus see that from the original institution of that nation they have had the covenant of the United States guaranteeing to them their own independent autonomous form of government, their own right to determine who constitute citizens within it, authorized to share the property which that nation owns.

What is proposed by this amendment? Not general legislation. This amendment proposes to leave it to the Dawes Commission to make up a roll of citizens. True, it instructs them to accept the roll as it has already been made by the Cherokee authorities, but it commits to the Dawes Commission to determine every disputed and doubtful question, and that is all there is of value in the treaties; that is precisely what is the right of the Cherokee Nation itself by the treaties which have been made, repeated, reiterated with that nation, and only three or four years ago confirmed afresh by an act of Congress, accepting from them a large tract of country with that confirmation as one of the considerations of the trade.

If there is anything in the world that should give Congress pause, it is the attempt to override by power the obligations which the Government has made and which depend only on its good faith and its integrity.

It is said here that there is an appeal from the Dawes Commission to the district court, and the appeal may be taken within sixty days, but the judgment of the court shall be final. Why should the Cherokee people be put to take an appeal from a Commission when, by the terms of our solemn engagement with them, their judgment is final, and by what right are we to declare that it is the duty of the United States to establish a government there? Have we not covenanted, and are we not bound to respect our covenants, that no government shall be established there without their consent?

Mr. President, I recognize the fact, which no doubt will be urged in argument here, that the power lies with the United States—that Congress may, if it will, trample down every security which the pledge of this Government to those people would seem to have given to them. I recognize that we may, if we will, take from them their property, that we may divide it up and give it to the horde of adventurers who are seeking to enrich themselves at the expense of those people. We have that power. We have the power to do a great many things; but is it possible that that power shall be exerted unless the necessity has become so great and overruling as to furnish in the eye of moral, respectable, upright people a justification for the breach of an agreement like this? It may be that an engagement of such a nature as this can be justified in the breaking; it may be that in dealings between peoples you can proceed to overthrow the obligations which if a State of the Union had made, no power would tolerate the overthrow of, and no excuse could allow it; but before that is to be done Congress ought to be well advised. It is alarming that when questions involving such vast interests—the happiness of a people who have confided themselves to our faith and our sense of justice—are under discussion we can hardly get attention to the subject. Now it is proposed to do all this thing; to overthrow and override every right of these people by an amendment to an appropriation bill which the Senate has once declared to be not in order.

Mr. ALLISON. And which is unamendable.

Mr. VILAS. And which is unamendable as proposed to us, as suggested by the Senator from Iowa. If that be the method of procedure which can prevail in the Senate of the United States, there will be found justification in the fact for a greater lament over the decadence of public morals and the sense of public duties than has been heard here from any man heretofore, however eminent in character or exalted in place.

Sir, I do not intend to weary the Senate with a protracted discussion. I had desired to point out only in a direct and simple way how far-reaching is this proposed amendment in character and in principle, how contrary to every one of those rules of good faith which should govern and restrain the Congress of the United States.

I said it might happen—and I am willing to admit it may happen—that such a thing as the breach of a public engagement, even of this character, may be committed and defended without casuistry, but the case must be an extraordinary one. If a case exists in respect to our dealings with the Indian tribes to whom we have given these rights of separate existence and independent government that case ought to be submitted to Congress in an independent bill. It ought to be a measure which will carry in every part of it proper provision for the redress of such wrongs as exist, for the security of such rights of property as ought to be preserved, for the security of such rights of persons as can not but be acknowledged to be sacred even with Indians. It ought to be a measure formulated with that care which belongs to statesmanship, and be considered in the Congress of the United States with solemn attention. It is little short of legislative outrage to propose such a thing upon an appropriation bill, especially in the last moments of a session and in the guise of a conference report.

Mr. President, it is said, and it will undoubtedly be said again in the course of this debate, that disorder exists in the Indian Territory and among these tribes. It will be said that bribery and corruption prevail in their courts, yet let me remind Senators that it is not ten years since it was our habit to point to those Five Civilized Tribes as evidence of what the Indian nature was capable of when properly guarded and left to work out its rightful condition. A few years ago there were councils, as there are yet, that enacted such laws for the government of those tribes respectively, and annually their books of session laws were printed, and they would compare favorably, at least not at all discreditably, with the volumes of session laws enacted in the States. We rejoiced in the success of that experiment. What is it that has created disorder there? It is the breach of duty on the part of the United States.

We covenanted to protect them in their independence; we covenanted to prevent them from being overrun by a horde of intruders; and we have permitted 300,000 people to go into the territory of one of those tribes where but fifty or sixty thousand Indians were living in independence, peace, and good order.

It is said that there is great misrule there. Read what Judge Stewart said of them only a short time ago, a judge of the United States court. I wish I had his language before me, so that I could give it with accuracy; but he commended that government; he commended those people as equal in obedience to law and the order of their society to their neighbors in the surrounding States.

Sir, it is perfectly evident that the trouble which those Five Tribes suffer under results from the United States having failed to discharge its duty. Shall we proceed to make that an excuse for the most flagrant disregard of every national obligation which we have entered into with those people?

I hope the Dawes Commission may continue their labors. I hope that they may secure an eventual agreement by which the United States shall be empowered to act without dishonor. I think it possible to be done. At all events, I hope before we shall proceed to such steps as those who favor this legislation would demand of us, before we shall overthrow so ruthlessly and pitilessly rights which depend only for their security upon the solemnity and good faith of our promise, that we shall wait until the Dawes Commission by further efforts have given us a greater excuse than we now possess.

It will not be difficult to find in isolated instances in States of the Union as flagrant violations of the principles of morality, of the principles of judicial administration and political government as have been pointed out in that report to have taken place in particular instances in the Indian Territory. We have in them as yet, in my judgment, no sufficient warrant for such a course of action as is now proposed to us.

Here is another thing in this amendment which it was said by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] we have to swallow whole, if we take it at all, not suggested in the bill. Let me read it:

> Sisseton and Wahpeton Indians: That all the interest due the Sisseton and Wahpeton Indians on March 3, 1896, is hereby appropriated to be paid at once in cash per capita; and hereafter all interest on the permanent fund of said Indians, after deducting the amount expended for education, shall be paid in cash per capita on the 1st day of November of each year.

I should like to ask the manager on the part of the Senate, the Senator from South Dakota, where the Sisseton and Wahpeton Indians are? I think perhaps I know, but I shall be glad to be accurately informed.

Mr. PETTIGREW. What was the question of the Senator?

Mr. VILAS. Where do the Sisseton and Wahpeton Indians abide?

Mr. PETTIGREW. In the eastern part of South Dakota, near Lake Travers.

Mr. VILAS. What connection has the interest upon the funds of the Sisseton and Wahpeton Nation to do with the appropriation for keeping alive the Dawes Commission?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Does the Senator want an answer?

Mr. VILAS. If the Senator will give it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I am not aware that it has anything to do with it. I will say, however, if the Senator has no other objection to this report than that he intimates in regard to the Sisseton and Wahpeton and Seneca Indians, and will address himself to that, I do not think I shall resist very long sending it back, but the real fact of the matter is that those questions would never have been here at all had it not been for the other question, which is properly here under the precedents.

Mr. VILAS. I should like to know for what reason there should be a change of law as to the mode in which the interest should be paid to the Sisseton and Wahpeton Indians?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will say that under the treaty made with those Indians some years ago we purchased a large tract of land from them. The treaty provided that the money should remain in the Treasury and should bear 5 per cent interest, and that the principal and interest should be appropriated by Congress. The ratification of the treaty provided that it should either be appropriated by Congress and spent for the benefit of the Indians, or by order of the President. This is simply carrying out the provisions of the treaty itself; and until either Congress acts in this way or the President issues his order none of this money can be expended for this purpose. To-day, through the neglect of the President, who for months has refused to issue the order, these Indians are starving, and the Western papers are full of complaints of their misery and distress. It is about time for Congress to step in and do something when the Executive fails to do his duty.

Mr. VILAS. Is it not somewhat curious that that state of facts first became disclosed to the Senate through a conference report, when the Indian appropriation bill was depending, and the Committee on Indian Affairs has had charge of our relations to the Indians during this entire session?

Mr. ALLISON. Allow me to say to the Senator that the provision was put on the deficiency bill in the Senate.

Mr. VILAS. I was not aware of that.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I can answer the Senator with regard to that matter if he desires.

Mr. VILAS. If the Senator from South Dakota desires to do so, I will hear him with pleasure.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I understood the Senator to ask a question, and that he wanted to know why the subject had not been disposed of before. In the first place, it was supposed the President would act, and every effort has been made in that direction. Since this bill went to conference these Indians have sent a committee of their number here to urge action in this connection. They were very desirous of securing this legislation and escaping hereafter the neglect of the Executive.

Mr. VILAS. I suppose the truth is that the treaty with the Sisseton and Wahpeton Indians provided that this interest should be expended, under the direction of the President, by the Interior Department, for the benefit of those Indians.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will say to the Senator that it has been the custom to pay to them in cash per capita, for they are voters and citizens of the United States.

Mr. VILAS. Am I not right that the treaty provided that this interest should be expended by the Interior Department for the benefit of the Indians?

Mr. PETTIGREW. The treaty provided that the money should be expended upon appropriations to be made by Congress, nothing more and nothing further.

Mr. VILAS. But the money when appropriated by Congress was to be expended, under the direction of the President, through the Interior Department, for the benefit of the Indians, was it not?

Mr. PETTIGREW. No, sir; it was not.

Mr. VILAS. I venture to say, without now being able to recall accurately in memory all the provisions of that treaty with the Sisseton and Wahpeton Indians which was made when we purchased their country in the Dakotas, that there was provision there for expenditure for education, for the purchase for them of various articles and implements of value to them, for the assistance of the individual Indians in the art of agriculture, providing them with instructors, and other things of that kind, and this direction which now would at once put into the hands of those Indians per capita this fund into a fund which would be gathered annually year after year is a change at least of the law as it existed before. Congress has not hesitated regularly to appropriate the interest which is due upon the Indian funds. The question is one of the mode of expenditure—whether it shall be placed in the hands of the Indians themselves, with the ordinary result, that some traders have it within forty-eight hours, or whether it shall be applied according to the method hitherto pursued to insure its expenditure with benefits to their families and children.

Mr. President, there are thus in this particular instance, and as well in the Seneca Nation of Indians, two additional provisions brought in here on the conference report, and proposed to be legislated upon this bill by Congress. Where is the limitation? If the question of order is not to be made, where is the limit? Why may not conferees bring in subjects entirely independent of the measure in the last days of the session for the first time, and we be required to take the whole dose at one gulp?

The objections that may exist to that measure with reference to the Sisseton and Wahpeton Indians I am not able to declare. I know nothing of the reasons that should support that legislation; but I am of opinion that we ought not to be challenged to give our assent under such circumstances to such a measure.

With reference to the others, it is perfectly obvious that the objections are of the most importance. They are of a character which should call a halt if they were proposed in an independent bill. Why has it not been done? During this entire session this same report of the Dawes Commission had been lying on the desks of Senators or accessible to them. The Committee on Indian Affairs have had since the first day of this session of Congress every particle of information upon which action ought to have been taken, if any should be taken. Why have not that committee, or those Senators interested in the matter, proposed some scheme of legislation to meet the evils which they declare to be so insistent? For one I believe that Congress will proceed more safely if they shall wait until another session at least before they undertake to deal with a subject of so vast importance, affecting property rights so enormous—because I have no doubt that the property rights of those Indians in that Territory of theirs are worth at least $50,000,000—affecting considerations of a nature so delicate, addressed to every sentiment of national honor and good faith. I think, sir, we can wait until another session can intervene. We can, perhaps, though I hardly know if that is possible, get over something of the frenzy which seems to rule the political hour; we can, I trust, at all events, assemble at the next session of Congress with more composure of judgment, with greater freedom, to consider questions of this kind and address ourselves to the duty, if it be a duty, of dealing so ruthlessly with the rights which these people have obtained from our covenant and are entitled to enjoy at our hands, and deal in such manner as that we shall not add another terrible imputation upon the honor of the United States in its transactions with a people so utterly helpless as these are.

Mr. President, if the Senate will not have this question of order ruled as such, I do sincerely trust that it will send this report back into conference, and with an instruction that, if the other House will not accept the amendment which the Senate has made, the Senate conferees shall no longer urge it upon them. Let us abide by the rules of conferences as laid down in Cushing's work on parliamentary law, and insist that the conference shall relate to the subject which is committed to the conferees by the two Houses of Congress.

When we debated this subject some weeks ago while this bill was under discussion, similar views to those now entertained were urged upon the floor by myself and others, and seemed to secure the almost unanimous judgment of the Senate—no, that would be too strong a statement—but seemed to secure the judgment of the Senate. We took no vote, but when the Chair ruled the amendment out of order there was no question raised of the sufficiency of the ruling, and the usage of the Senate has been to vote anything in order which they wanted to do. I think the Senator from Colorado will agree with me in that.

Mr. TELLER. I think the ruling of the Chair on that subject was right.

Mr. VILAS. No doubt.

Mr. President, after that ruling was made, after that bill had been thus left, without this injustice ingrafted upon it, at the suggestion of some of those who had favored the amendment I myself offered, with the hope that it would be a satisfactory arrangement, the amendment which proposed an appropriation for the salaries and expenses of the Dawes Commission. I do not know that they absolutely need the appropriation. I believe $50,000 was provided for them when that Commission was started. We have had, I think, no report yet to show that that has been exhausted. I believe there must still remain a considerable portion of that appropriation unexpended. But the Senator from Colorado says not much remains. It was upon the understanding that the sum named was probably insufficient that I offered the amendment which was adopted by the Senate. It seems to me that under all the circumstances the Senate is well entitled to insist that that should be regarded as a finality, that that should be regarded as not a compromise, but so much of the nature of a compromise of the existing controversy at that time as that it ought to be accepted or rejected.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I make a suggestion to the Senator in charge of the bill. As the report has hung along for a long time, I suggest that debate be continued—I will not say under the five-minute rule, but under the ten-minute rule—for the remainder of the time that the bill is under consideration. I make that proposition and ask that unanimous consent be given.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine?

Mr. GEORGE. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection. The question is upon agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I feel some embarrassment in attempting to occupy the attention of the few members of the Senate who are paying any attention at all to the subject now under consideration. I feel a very deep conviction that the proposed amendment by the conference committee is unjust and unfair. I might go further and say that it is a simple outrage upon the rights of five autonomous tribes of Indians who are under our wardship. I feel, sir, as two of these tribes once occupied the fair land in which I now reside and also from principles of justice to the others, that I ought to do everything in my power to prevent the consummation of this outrage.

Certainly it is a very extraordinary spectacle that in the United States Senate, a part of the treaty-making power of the Government, a body which in times past gave its constitutional sanction to the various treaties which we have made with those tribes—I say it is an extraordinary spectacle that in a solemn debate, so far conducted with very great ability and fairness and justice, we find the great body of Senators paying not the slightest attention whatever to what is said or alleged upon either side. So I am disposed, in view of the fact that the Chair is obliged to listen to the arguments of Senators, to renew the point of order, which I think was incautiously withdrawn by the Senator from Maine.

The technical discussion of the point of order has been well conducted by my colleague [Mr. WALTHALL] and by the Senator who last addressed the Senate. There is but little more on that line which might be urged. I will urge a point or two.

The Dawes Commission, the continuation of which was the amendment inserted by the Senate to the bill (and which so far as this report is concerned was the thing in dispute between the two Houses), was the matter which the Senate and the House committed to their respective conferees to settle the difference between the two Houses. That Commission, I need not remind the Chair as well as any Senator who may see proper to give any attention to this debate, was purely an executive committee. It had nothing but executive power, and it had no other executive power than the power to negotiate; that is, to confer with the authorities of the tribes to make propositions of settlement upon matters which the United States desired to settle, to receive answers from the tribes as to those propositions, and discuss the propositions, and arrive at a conclusion, if a conclusion could be reached. That was the sole power of the Dawes Commission. It could not disturb a right. It could not touch by a hair's breadth any right, political or personal, or property which belonged either to the tribes as autonomous communities or which belonged to any single member of the tribes.

That was the law which created the Dawes Commission. They were officers under the United States as created by law. The President of the United States sent to this body the names of five persons, first and last, who were to fill these five offices of negotiators. What does that involve, Mr. President? A law was enacted. The President was required to nominate and appoint, by our consent, these five negotiators. It was his duty to select five men who were qualified and who could discharge properly for the interests of the United States the duty of negotiators. That was all. They were selected for that purpose. Their names were sent to the Senate and our advice was asked as to the appointment. We gave the advice for the appointment of these officers simply as negotiators, as being persons competent and fit to be intrusted with the duty of making a bargain, which bargain was afterwards to be subject to our ratification or rejection.

The appropriation bill simply continued this Commission by making an appropriation. The House disagreed to that, and we have as the result of that disagreement, I will say with due respect to the very eminent men who signed this report, the most extraordinary document, considering the purposes for which it was designed, that ever emanated from any committee of this body or any other.

The first thing they do, under the plea, under the specious pretext of enlarging the powers of the Dawes Commission, is to make a judicial tribunal out of an executive board. Now, let us see how that changes the situation. These five men were selected by the President as fit persons for negotiators. They were confirmed by the Senate because they were supposed to be fit persons for negotiators. Without any recommittal of the propriety of choosing these five men for other distinct, separate, and, under the Constitution of the United States, inconsistent duties, we are now asked to confer upon them, without any resubmission of their qualifications either to the President or to us, the extraordinary powers mentioned in this amendment.

I will not now insist, Mr. President, that it is constitutionally incompetent for the Congress to invest with judicial powers officers who were appointed and confirmed as executive officers, though if I were disposed to go into that it would be very difficult to resist the conclusion that such a thing can not be done. I will not put it on that ground. I put it upon the good sense of the Senate whether this body will thus do violence at least to the ordinary course of procedure, to what seem to be the obvious dictates of common sense and common justice, that when a board has been created simply for the purpose of negotiation, or making a bargain, we shall convert that board into a tribunal possessing, I am bound to say, powers which are not possessed by any other court in the United States, and which, I might add, are not possessed by the courts of any nation in Christendom; that is, the power to add to the citizenship of an autonomous and self-governing body. It has done that.

But, Mr. President, as extraordinary as the end sought to be attained by this amendment is, the provisions of the amendment are equally extraordinary, and I may add, as I will show, they are utterly insufficient for the end in view.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1341) to prohibit the further issuance of interest-bearing bonds without the consent of Congress.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid aside temporarily for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Mississippi to finish his remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid aside temporarily in order that the Senator from Mississippi may conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, without being discourteous in the least to the Senator from Mississippi, I am compelled to object, and I will take the floor on the unfinished business to continue my remarks.

Mr. HALE. Had not the Senator from North Carolina concluded?

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1341) to prohibit the further issuance of interest-bearing bonds without the consent of Congress.

Mr. CULLOM. I believe the Senator from North Carolina yields to me for the purpose of occupying the attention of the Senate a little while upon the pending bill.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand the Senator from Illinois will not speak long, so I yield the floor to him.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, while I do not question the motive which prompted the introduction of the bill to prohibit the issuance of interest-bearing bonds, yet I must confess that I am surprised that, under the circumstances, it should receive serious favorable consideration in this body. No one on this floor deplores more than I do the issue of interest-bearing obligations by this Government in time of peace and the piling up of debt at the rate of $100,000,000 per year. But does any Senator imagine that the causes which made the issue of bonds necessary, and which may require further issues, can be removed by simply passing a bill prohibiting it? The consequences of the passage of the bill, if it shall become a law, to my mind, are so far-reaching as to be simply appalling.

Mr. President, in my opinion, it would be the undoing of all that has been accomplished and built up since the passage of the resumption act in 1875. It would mean the repudiation of our obligations. Its tendency would be to place this country at once upon a silver basis, whatever that may mean. It would seriously endanger every business concern in the country which has weathered thus far the terrible financial storm that has prevailed during the last three years. It would throw out of employment hundreds of thousands of laboring men and women who have begun to hope that the dawn of brighter days is at hand. It is wholly wanting in common honesty, and would forever be a blot upon the page of American history.

Mr. President, I agree with what the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] said a few days ago. I do not suppose any Senator believes this bill will become a law. The Executive should never be deprived of the power given him by the act of January 14, 1875, which authorized his Secretary of the Treasury to "issue, sell, and dispose of, at not less than par in coin, either of the descriptions of bonds of the United States described in the act of July 14, 1870," unless upon the passage of another act giving the President and Secretary power to maintain the reserve and also to borrow money to meet any emergency on better terms.

We have, during the present Administration, been confronted with an emergency which, in the judgment of the Executive, required the exercise of the authority vested in him by the act above quoted. And whatever money the President and the Secretary of the Treasury may have raised by the sale of bonds (whether judiciously raised or not) is not seriously claimed to have been unlawfully obtained. I have my own views as to the wisdom of the Executive action, but there is no doubt whatever of the lawful power of the President of the United States, with the Secretary of the Treasury, to sell or to provide for the sale of such evidences of indebtedness as they may deem necessary to effectuate the lawful policy of the Government. Mr. President, I shall be the last man to join in any trifling crusade against the official and personal integrity of the President. No Government should fail to guard against national dishonor. The United States can not afford to permit such a condition of things as even to hazard or jeopardize its credit or its financial honor.

General Grant, the great soldier and statesman, said in his first message, March 4, 1869:

> To protect the national honor, every dollar of Government indebtedness should be paid in gold unless otherwise stipulated in the contract. That no repudiator of one farthing of our public debt will be trusted in public place.

Such has always been the spirit and determination of the people. It is now proposed by this bill to prohibit the President from borrowing a dollar, no matter what may happen or what calamity may come upon the country. It is not only wrong but it is a crime against the honor, security, and prosperity of the nation. While the nation was struggling in civil war and groaning under the vast burdens of debt no word was ever officially uttered which had even the semblance of repudiation, and never was an attempt made to take away from the President the lawful power to make loans to protect the nation's credit. When General Grant uttered the words quoted gold was at a premium of 38 per cent, as compared with paper money, and the interest on Government bonds was 6 per cent. The total interest-bearing debt was then $3,162,000,000, but the policy of the nation was sound money, a protective tariff, and sufficient revenue. Under that policy the people prospered. We were not so great a nation then as we are now. Our population was about 38,000,000, as against 72,000,000 to-day. Then the value of our personal and real property was about $30,000,000,000. In value this has increased until it now approximates $70,000,000,000. The injunction is still as imperative to be honest and maintain our integrity and credit as it has ever been.

But, Mr. President, it is not my purpose to discuss the bond bill at length, as it will not become a law. I desire to discuss briefly the financial or monetary question.

The financial exigencies of this country and the necessary relationship which exists between the monetary systems of the United States and of the other civilized nations of the world have of late years given rise to the hope of an international agreement in regard to coinage and coin values. The money metals all over the world are gold and silver, and nearly all the civilized nations are producers, in a greater or less degree, of these metals. The commerce of the world, under the stimulating influences of steam transportation, electric communication, and other modern facilities, has been so modified in its character, and the conditions affecting it have so radically changed in a few years, that any intelligent consideration of the commercial problem must include new factors and new influences.

Our own territorial growth, unexampled as it has been, ought to demonstrate to us that other nations have grown, too. Our prosperity should remind us that other countries may prosper, too. What we, with our growth, intelligence, enterprise, and push, may have had yesterday is to-day possessed by Australia, India, Argentina, and even South Africa. Our Kansas City, Omaha, St. Paul, Minneapolis, Denver, and Leadville have their counterparts in Melbourne, Bombay, Buenos Ayres, Johannesburg, and Kimberley. The discovery of precious metals in California and Colorado was but a precursor of similar discoveries in localities but recently emerged from barbaric control in the South Sea Islands and in Africa.

So to-day we find that these comparatively new colonies and countries are vigorous competitors of the United States not only in their agricultural productions, but in valuable mineral products as well. The competition which has already met our wheat growers, from the great new wheat fields of South America, as well as from Siberia and the Black Sea provinces of Russia, has made itself painfully felt. Our exports of domestic wheat (wheat and flour), which reached 225,000,000 bushels in 1892, have fallen off largely each year until in 1895 only 144,000,000 bushels were exported, thus showing a reduction of over 80,000,000 bushels in our annual wheat exports in a four-year period. The vast production of petroleum in southern Russia has operated very greatly to the disadvantage of American producers. The increased production and importation of foreign wool has caused a specific and unfavorable effect upon the wool producers of the United States.

I cite these examples merely to show the extensive and constantly changing relations between distant countries, and the consequent changes in their trade and in their staple and important products. Commerce in the leading productions of these countries instantly responds to these variations and fluctuations, and is injured or benefited as the case may be. The laws of coinage in Australia or in Russia, or the extension or limitation of gold or silver circulation in other remote countries, may have either a beneficial or an injurious effect upon the most important commercial interests of the United States.

I do not propose to take the time necessary to detail how certainly and how absolutely these distant and apparently distinct influences may rule or ruin the commerce of the United States. But I shall assume without question that the important interests of the world's trade and of international commerce are so affected by the operation of distant and distinct governmental policies that the necessity already exists for a harmonious international arrangement in monetary affairs. The world's production of precious metals and the world's coinage of the same have become important integers which can not be overlooked in any study or discussion of the economic conditions surrounding any country of the world. Even now we can not say that the stoppage or the increase of the metallic circulation in any one of the smaller nations may not, or will not, affect for good or bad the mercantile interests of the United States.

The phenomenal fact that the world's production of silver, which had remained about stationary at thirty or forty million dollars annually for nearly a century, has of late vastly increased—and last year reached the wondrous sum of two hundred and sixteen millions—must necessarily produce some signal effects upon the varied interests of the newer commercial world which it would be mere presumption now to predict. But it does seem to me that the only competent authority to consider the grave conditions newly created by reason of this phenomenal addition to the world's silver supply must be composed of representatives of the nations of the world. No one nation can determine the policy which shall be adopted by all, or for itself, without considering the policy of the others. There have been several monetary commissions created, and monetary conferences charged with the duty of arranging proper regulations to meet the exigencies existing at the various times in which they were called together.

But the present seems to be the most appropriate time to press to a conclusion and to an ultimate agreement between the great commercial and monetary nations the decision as to the wisest ratio between gold and silver to be made universal over the world. The reason for this urgency at the present time is the fact I have recited of the enormous production of silver which is forcing its way into the world's supply. Trade relations, as well as the conditions of domestic or internal trade, have been rudely interfered with by the injection into the supply of visible coinage material of two hundred and sixteen millions of silver per year. If this new average of supply shall become constant, or even continue for merely a few years, it must be provided for and looked after.

To illustrate the existing conditions, I will here present in tabular form some facts regarding the production of gold and silver in the world. First, a table showing the production of gold and silver in the world from 1873 to 1894, inclusive; second, a table showing the amount of gold and silver annually coined in the world during the same period; third, a table showing the product of gold and silver in the United States from 1845 to 1894; fourth, a table showing the coinage of the United States mints from 1841 to 1895; and fifth, a table showing the amount of money in the United States—gold, silver, notes, etc.—and the circulation per capita annually from 1872 to 1895, inclusive:

It may be claimed that there is apparently no immediate prospect of an international agreement. That may be true, but it is likewise true that the tremendous increase in silver production everywhere has only recently begun to be noticed and its new relation to be understood. Who would have supposed in 1865–66, when the world was moving along quietly and with apparent regularity, and had been for many years producing perhaps forty millions of silver per year, that the world should to-day be piling up five times that amount?

Mr. STEWART rose.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not wish to be interrupted.

Mr. STEWART. Of course the Senator does not want to be interrupted. It would have the effect of breaking him up.

Mr. CULLOM. I suggest to the Senator that he sit down here and listen to me.

Mr. STEWART. A man who makes suc ah statement will be broken up.

Mr. CULLOM. Who could have supposed that in six years, from 1888 to 1894, the world should have increased its already enormous production of one hundred and eighteen millions to two hundred and sixteen millions of silver in a single year? No economist ever imagined such a condition. It was wholly unprecedented; yet judging by the more recent yield, it is possibly only the steppingstone to the yield of coming years. When the fact is understoodthat we are possibly to have a constant and increasing addition to the world's silver, without any similarly increasing demand for it, either as money or as a commodity, it is apparent that its value has become and must continue subject to the inflexible laws of trade, like any other commodity. It must decline in market value under such increased supply. Its quotations must fluctuate with the fluctuations of supply and demand like coal, like iron, and other products. Upon no consistent basis can any fixed ratio be established by the United States alone between silver and gold under such circumstances.

The ratio in 1873 was 16 to 1; in 1893 it was 32 to 1. In 1873 it required 16 ounces of silver to purchase 1 of gold. In 1893 it required 32 ounces of silver to buy the same ounce of gold. These are not merely the prices and ratios of the United States but they are the world's ratios and the world's values. The United States did not establish them, and who will contend that the United States can change them, except in a slight degree? Suppose for a moment that free and unlimited coinage of silver in the United States had continued from 1873 down to the present. What now would be the situation? The United States have coined in the twenty-one years following 1873, and including that year, approximately, five hundred and twenty millions of silver. According to the contention of the silver producers, if the coinage had been free during this period we ought to have coined more than double this sum, or perhaps one thousand to twelve hundred millions of dollars. But with only the five hundred millions coined we find the value has declined so that a dollar is intrinsically worth about 50 cents. What would have been the depreciation if the coinage had been so doubled? No man can tell; but would it be unreasonable to suppose that the silver dollar would have been worth no more than 35 to 40 cents? Probably not. But, say our friends, the coinage of it into standard dollars would have fixed its value. The coinage of silver or gold or the stamping of paper may declare its nominal value, but that does not establish its intrinsic value if the world does not recognize it or if commerce will not have it so. Mexican dollars and the coins of many other countries have time out of mind been used in the traffic and transactions of other nations, but they have almost always been treated as a mere commodity, worth just so much as commerce had determined, and were shoveled or weighed or counted out at their commercial worth only.

The great and omnipotent commercial public of the world makes its own laws concerning money values and determines for itself what is a just standard or measure of value, regardless of the dictum of any political congress or parliament. In view of the immense addition to the silver output to which I have called attention, and of the disturbing influence which such addition necessarily causes, I feel sure that the great commercial nations will be compelled to devise means to adjust our monetary relations so as to be just alike to the producers of silver and to determine a proper ratio by which all shall abide.

But let no man flatter himself that a determination of the great economic problem will ever be arrived at under the teachings of the empirics who vie with each other in the effort by legislation to put the dollar stamp on a half dollar's worth of silver in any single country.

In our local and municipal conventions, in the political caucuses, and on the partisan platform we see men settling this great question by insisting that the United States shall adopt free coinage regardless of the course of other nations.

The supply of silver in the world and the commercial demand for silver being what determines its value practically, it is only just that all commercial nations shall participate in establishing an international ratio, giving silver an international value equivalent to and interchangeable for a certain amount of gold between all concurring nations. If we shall devote our surplus eloquence and overflowing patriotism to securing that result we shall do far better than in exploiting intangible theories.

Let us look a little into the history of the several international monetary conferences. The first one met at Paris June 17, 1867. It was called by the invitation of the French Government. The United States of America and 18 of the European countries participated. They were unanimous in expression against a single silver standard, and, with the exception of the Netherlands, were unanimous in favor of a single gold standard. I may say, in passing, that very many of the countries engaged in the conference have had the silver standard. None of the countries participating took action toward establishing the suggestions of the commission, and although the French Government was given the power to reassemble the conference, it never exercised that power.

The second international monetary conference was called by the President of the United States in accordance with an act of Congress of February 28, 1878, and met at Paris August 17, 1878. Twelve countries were represented, the United States representatives being Reuben E. Fenton, of New York; W. S. Groesbeck, of Ohio; Francis A. Walker, of Connecticut, and S. Dana Horton. The substance of the opinions of the members was: First, that the monetary function of silver as well as of gold should be preserved in the world, but that the choice of one or both should be governed by the special situation of each group of states; second, that the restriction of silver coinage should be discretionary with each state or group; third, that existing differences of opinion prevented the adoption of a common ratio between the two metals. The conference adjourned August 29.

The third international monetary conference was called in 1881 by the joint action of France and the United States to establish a system for the use of silver and gold as bimetallic money, with a relative settled value between the two metals. Thirteen countries were represented. The United States representatives were William M. Evarts, of New York; Allen G. Thurman, of Ohio, and Timothy O. Howe, of Wisconsin. This conference closed by adjourning to April 12, 1882, but it was never reconvened.

The fourth international monetary conference was called by the United States. and met at Brussels November 22, 1892. The delegates from this country were WILLIAM B. ALLISON, JOHN P. JONES, JAMES B. MCCREARY, Henry W. Cannon, E. Benjamin Andrews, and Edwin H. Terrell. The instructions which were given by President Harrison, through Secretary of State John W. Foster, were so concise and comprehensive that I deem them worthy of introduction here, as representing in apt language the true theory to be adopted by the United States upon the coinage question:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, November 10, 1892.

* * * The main purpose which this Government seeks to accomplish by this conference is to bring about a stable relation between gold and silver.

It is the opinion of the President, and, as he believes, of the people of the United States, with singular unanimity, that a full use of silver as a coined metal at a ratio to gold to be fixed by an agreement between the great commercial nations of the world would very highly promote the prosperity of all the people of all the countries of the world. For this reason your first and most important duty—

This is addressed to the delegates—will be to secure, if possible, an agreement between the chief commercial countries of the world looking to international bimetallism—that is, the unlimited coinage of gold and silver into money of full debt-paying power at a fixed ratio in coinage common to all the agreeing powers.

You should not lose sight of the fact that no arrangement will be acceptable to the people or satisfactory to the Government of the United States which would by any possibility place this country on a silver basis while European countries maintain the gold standard.

Failing to secure international bimetallism, the next important duty will be to secure, if possible, some action upon the part of European countries looking to a larger use of silver as currency, in order to put an end to the farther deprecition of that metal. * * *

JOHN W. FOSTER.

It seems to me that that letter, signed by the Secretary of State, at that time John W. Foster, but written, I imagine, by the President of the United States, states the truth as near as it can be stated by anybody; and it states what in my judgment is the only safe position which our country can occupy upon this question.

I desire to say here that I should hail and will hail any settlement of this question that will not take our Government out of the position it has occupied and make it purely a monometallic silver country, driving out the gold. And in my opinion the time is near at hand when this Government and other commercial nations with which we are dealing will be able to settle this question so that the silver interests of this country and silver as a money metal will be cared for and will be placed, probably, as I hope, on a par with gold. But I insist that by any other course than an international agreement between ourselves and other great commercial nations it would be a dangerous experiment for this Government to undertake the free coinage of silver.

The instructions which I have read present, as I have said, the true basis of bimetallism, and in my judgment indicate the only solution which can ever be reached satisfactory to most of the great nations of the world and in the interest of the people of the United States. For the United States alone to declare for free coinage would be ineffective, except to the great injury of our own people. This country, great and powerful as it is, populated by an intelligent and enterprising people, is not the controller nor the autocrat of the monetary world. Our wishes and desires may all be right and proper, but our present power does not justify us in establishing an exclusive monetary system which shall invite the antagonism of twenty or thirty other nations, nearly all of which are greater or lesser contributors to the trade we now enjoy.

Mr. President, what the nations need is an international conference and agreement as to the use of silver, fixing the ratio, and then opening the mints for free coinage upon the ratio to be agreed upon. Every year and month and day makes it clearer to me that such a conference is sure to come, and I believe very soon. What a relief to the situation in this and other nations if this vexed, troublesome, and vastly important question could be settled—settled in harmony with the interest of silver as a money and in harmony with the best interests of the people of this and all the nations.

I may say here that in talking with a certain silver Senator, if I may so designate him, he intimated to me that he would be willing to fix the ratio at 32 to 1. I do not know whether the silver men generally would agree to such a ratio. But whatever ratio the principal nations will agree to, whether it is 15½ to 1 or 16 to 1, or 20 to 1, will be entirely satisfactory to me, because if those nations make such an agreement, in my judgment it will probably bring the commercial value of silver up to par with gold. But without such an agreement it would be utterly futile, in my judgment, for us to undertake it with any expectation that it would increase the price of silver very materially for one single nation to do so.

The great political parties in their national conventions have expressed themselves strongly in favor of the determination of the relative values of gold and silver by international action.

The Republican party said at Minneapolis in 1892:

We commend the wise and patriotic steps already taken by our Government to secure an international conference to adopt such measures as will insure a parity of value between gold and silver for use as money throughout the world.

That resolution is sound. We there took the position four years ago in favor of an international conference for the purpose of fixing a ratio which would insure a parity of value between gold and silver.

The Democratic party said at Chicago in 1892:

We hold to the use of both gold and silver as the standard money of the country and to the coinage of both gold and silver without discrimination against either metal, or charge for mintage, but the dollar unit of coinage of both metals must be of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value or be adjusted through international agreement, or by such safeguards of legislation as shall insure the parity of the two metals.

I am not sure but that the Democratic platform on that question four years ago was a little better than the Republican platform, because in addition to their favoring an international agreement for the adjustment of the exchangeable values of these two metals, they used the words "but the dollar unit of coinage of both metals must be of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value." The word "intrinsic" is not a part of the Republican platform.

The Populist party, calling itself "the People's Party," said at Omaha in 1892:

We demand the free and unlimited coinage of silver and gold at the present legal ratio of 16 to 1.

The Populist party also said:

We demand that the amount of circulating medium be speedily increased to not less than $50 per capita.

This latter enunciation of the principles of the party, which has been somewhat in evidence for a few years, would seem to be its own most certain antidote.

I hear a good many men say that "sound money" is a mere phrase; that it does not mean anything; that anybody can use the expression and still be entirely in order. But there is a definition of it which it seems to me means something. The best and most appropriate definition of the term "sound money" as applied to metallic coinage is to be found in the words of one of the most distinguished international bimetallists of the world, Henry Cernuschi, as follows:

It is by the ordeal of fire that money can be tried. The coins which, being melted down, retain their entire value for which they were legal tender before they were melted down are good money. Those which do not retain it are not good money.

Expressing it in other words, he says:

Good money consists of coin which is worth as much after it is melted as it purports to be worth in coin.

Edward Atkinson says:

Bad money can only be circulated by force. Good money requires no force. Everybody is glad to get it. Money made of gold, or its representative, convertible or redeemable in gold, is the world's standard or unit of value.

There must be a final ultimate standard or unit or coin by which all other forms or types of money—silver, nickel, copper, or paper—must be rated. All such subsidiary types of what is sometimes called money, sometimes called currency, sometimes instruments of exchange, can only be kept in circulation at a parity with the unit or standard by positive, absolute redemption or payment therein. If the law gives an employer the power to force bad money upon workmen and does not give the workman an easy and ready means of converting that bad money instantly into good money, that workman will be cheated.

The pretext is that the coinage of silver dollars at 16 to 1 should be as free as the coinage of gold dollars, and that, by itself, can be agreed to. Coinage is nothing but the manufacture of round disks of metal stamped and certified. There is no danger in free coinage. The danger lies in the efforts of these supporters of free coinage at 16 to 1 to force cheap 50-cent dollars upon the community by an act of legal tender. The moment anyone offers to any of these people to agree to free coinage without an act of force or legal tender by which they may compel uninformed people to accept these dollars, they immediately give up their case; they will not accept free-silver-dollar coinage without the power to force them upon the people.

Mr. President, both the act of 1878 and the act of 1890—the one called the Bland-Allison Act, the other the Sherman Act—were passed by Congress in response to a demand for free and unlimited coinage of silver by a portion of the people and as a compromise between the friends of free coinage and those opposed to such action. When the Sherman Act of 1890 was passed it was alleged and believed by the friends of free coinage that the effect of the act would be to send the price of silver up to about par with gold. The price of silver did increase for a time, but soon began to decline again, and for some time the commercial value of a dollar of 412½ grains of silver has been only about 50 cents in gold. The effect upon silver by the passage of the acts of 1878 and 1890, especially the latter act, has been very disappointing to the so-called silver men and somewhat to all who supported it. I myself supported it. It did not have the effect upon the price of silver that was expected, and instead of satisfying the special champions and friends of silver it has only made them more aggressive in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, and at the same time embarrassed still more the financial situation.

The solution of the difficulties so apparent can only be reached by concerted international action—by the establishment of international bimetallism.

It is claimed by a recent writer that none of the recognized defenders of international bimetallism have ever declared in favor of free coinage by the United States alone. Gen. F. A. Walker, a most eminent exponent, has declared distinctly his opinion that free coinage by this country alone would delay, if it did not prevent, adoption of an international agreement establishing a par of exchange between the gold and silver using countries.

As to our former legislation he says:

Our coinage of two millions a month under the Bland-Allison Act of 1878 was directly against the interests of bimetallism, while our purchase of four millions five hundred thousand ounces of silver bullion a month under the Sherman Act of 1890 was an even worse strategic blunder.

Balfour says:

If it be possible by international arrangement to establish a joint standard throughout the world, it would not be open to the objection which a single standard is open to.

Barbour says:

No final or satisfactory settlement of the currency question is possible except by an international agreement.

Houldsworth says:

It is an international question. It is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to negotiate without delay with other nations.

Professor Foxwell says:

Bimetallism is new and involves international agreement, the question of valuation as well as the question of ratio. These matters can not be settled by isolated action. We shall never settle the monetary difficulty without international action.

The Bimetallic League:

The aim of the Bimetallic League is to secure by international agreement the opening of the mints of the leading commercial nations to the unrestricted coinage of gold and silver at such a fixed ratio as may be mutually agreed upon amongst those nations.

No settlement is, however, in our opinion, possible without international action. The remedy we suggest is essentially international in its character, and its details must be settled in concert with the other powers.

Mr. President, it seems to be apparent that after the failure of the effort on the part of the Government to hold silver at a parity with gold by the two acts referred to (under which 456,000,000 ounces of silver were purchased between the years 1877 and September 30, 1893) everybody should be convinced that it would be futile to venture upon free coinage on the basis of 16 to 1, and place it by the side of the gold dollar. The disparity between the two metals is too great. The consequences of such action by the Government would inevitably result in the disappearance of gold. The United States would at once approach a silver basis, uncertain and changing from day to day, with the fluctuations of silver.

The total estimated metallic stock in the United States on July 1, 1895, according to the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury, was gold $636,000,000, and silver $624,000,000, in round numbers. By this statement it will be seen that there is no great difference between the amount of gold and silver in use in the country. The United States, considering the great depression in silver, has dealt fairly with the white metal, showing great reluctance to give up either.

I am in favor of using all the silver as coin we can, and we may be able to use even more than we are now using, but the question of the standard should be settled. We should not depart from the gold standard until we can have the cooperation of other great commercial nations and an agreement as to the ratio for the free and unlimited coinage of silver for all the nations.

The Treasury Department shows that on April 1, 1896, there was in the Treasury of the United States six hundred and ninety-five millions of all kinds of money—gold, silver, paper, and minor coins. On the same day there was in circulation $1,528,000,000. Assuming that at that time the population of the United States numbered 71,909,000, we had in circulation $21.53 per capita. The statistics also show that in 1872 our per capita money circulation averaged $18.19; in 1873, $18.04; in 1874, $18.13; in 1878, $15.32; in 1890, $22.82, and in 1893, $24.44. So that the per capita circulation has not varied to any great extent for many years. The variation in the amount of our circulation has been largely produced by the fluctuation in the amount in the Treasury vaults.

Mr. President, since 1872 we have had good times and we have had hard times. Neither the one nor the other, it is plain to me, has been produced by the changes in our per capita circulation. This leads me to the real cause which brought about, first, good times, and next, hard times. Under Republican rule we had a protective tariff, and not so much disturbance in the financial system as of late. There was always money to spare in the Treasury; we had a revenue system that yielded it, and there was no fear ever manifested of a bankrupt Treasury. Under the change of Administration and policy there has been a continual state of anxiety in the minds of the people engaged in any kind of business. With a well-adjusted protective tariff system the depressed and embarrassed condition of the people of the Government would very soon be greatly relieved, but even with a proper tariff law the situation demands that our monetary system must be settled, so that the world may know that we mean to be honest with ourselves and with the rest of mankind. But, Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss the tariff question to-day, further than to say that without a wise protective tariff in this country we will have hard times whatever we may do in relation to our monetary system.

The creditors of the people of the country and of the Government itself have perhaps justly questioned even the good faith of the nation in meeting its obligations.

A recent editorial article in the Chicago Tribune describes the situation thus:

Those who "demand" the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, or 50 cents to the 100-cent dollar, assert that the fall in the commercial value of silver was due to "the crime of 1873," which forbid the coinage of silver dollars when none was being coined, nor had been for many years. They have nothing to say about the action taken by Germany prior to 1873, when that nation stopped silver coinage and adopted the gold standard. And they never mention the fact of France and the Latin Union following Germany's example two or three years later.

They are silent about these limitations in countries numbering 130,000,000 enterprising people, or more than twice the population of this country at the last census. They have not reviled Holland, Scandinavia, and Austria-Hungary for adopting the gold standard—enterprising countries containing nearly 60,000,000 people. They are not abusing Russia, with her 120,000,000 people, for putting her currency on a gold-standard basis. They seem to think that what 300,000,000 Europeans have done cuts no figure in the case of silver, and that the "future of silver" depends solely on the fiat of the American Congress for the 16 to 1 ratio or 50-cent dollar.

The chief cause of the immense cheapening of silver since 1875-76 is not legislation, either that of Europe or of America or both taken together. The principal effective cause is overproduction of silver in proportion to the demand for it. The mines have turned out more of that metal than the world needed or was able to use for coinage and other purposes, and as an inevitable consequence the price went down.

The commercial world has always determined the relative value of the precious metals to suit itself. It has never paid any attention to statutory ratios of any nation, but has exercised its own judgment as to values, just the same as it does about copper, iron, wheat, corn, and cotton. If the production of silver were to stop that metal would gradually become scarcer. The old stock would be consumed, so to speak, and the commercial world, without waiting for a law, would rate it at a higher value every year after a cessation of its extraction from the mines.

In an address delivered before the Transmississippi Commercial Congress at St. Louis, Mo., November 27, 1894, by the Hon. George E. Leighton, the following statement is made, showing by contrast the results which would follow the establishment, respectively, of the legal-tender free coinage of gold and the legal-tender free coinage of silver. Mr. Leighton says:

An act of Congress to make legal tender the gold coin of any country, or every country on the face of the earth, at rates established according to their actual weight and fineness as compared with the 25.8-grain standard dollar of the United States would not produce a ripple of disturbance in the commercial world. Not a sovereign, or franc, or mark, or florin, or peso, would come or go, except in the normal flow created in the settlement of international balances. There would be no movement, simply because the coin would have no more value in one place than another.

To pass an act to receive the silver coin of the world as legal tender at the rates established according to weight and fineness, according to our false 412½-grain dollar, would bankrupt the country, as it would mean taking the world's silver at double its present value. Does this not prove that the position is inconsistent and untenable?

In my opinion the substantial correctness of this position can not be controverted. One of these metals is the nearly universal standard, with a determinate intrinsic value, by which is measured the value of the productions of the world, while the other has but a transitory and uncertain value, dependent upon demand and supply, and contingent upon prosperity or adversity among the people. It matters not what silver was twenty years ago. It does not in any way bear upon the issue to say that before 1873 silver possessed certain attributes as a measure of values. It does not possess them now. A great change occurred. The fact exists, and governments deal only with existing facts. It can not take cognizance of obsolete and abandoned conditions. Lamentations over a change which occurred nearly a generation ago, resulting in what to-day is part of the settled coinage policy of nine-tenths of the civilized world, are wholly fruitless and unavailing.

Silver as a standard currency was retired in Germany in 1871, suspended in Belgium, France, Holland, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, and the United States in 1873, and in Italy and the Dutch Colonies in 1875, and in many other countries before and since 1873. With silver possessing the value it now bears the return of any single country to a legal-tender silver standard would imperil not only its commercial interests, but its very position among nations.

I desire to notice a few of the unfounded assertions which constantly pass current as part of the literature of the free-coinage, legal-tender advocates. It has been widely asserted that by the act of 1873 silver was secretly demonetized. An examination of the Congressional Globe of that session discloses the fact that the discussion upon the bill covers 140 columns of the Globe, and that the bill was printed more than a dozen times during its progress through Congress. In addition to the discussion of its general provisions, the matter of the omission of the silver dollar from the authorized coinage of the country was freely discussed in the House of Representatives by such members as the distinguished Republican, William D. Kelley, the distinguished Democrat, Clarkson N. Potter, with W. L. Stoughton and Samuel Hooper. Mr. Kelley said:

It is impossible to retain the double standard. * * * All experience has shown that you must have one standard coin.

Mr. Potter said:

This bill provides for substituting as legal tender coin of only one metal instead, as heretofore, of two. I think myself that this would be a wise provision, and that legal-tender coins, except subsidiary coins, should be gold alone.

Mr. Stoughton said:

Gold is practically the standard of value among all civilized nations, and the time has come in this country when the gold dollar should be distinctly declared to be the coin representative of the money unit.

Mr. Hooper said:

The committee, after careful consideration, concluded that 25.8 grains of standard gold, constituting the gold dollar, should be declared the money unit or metallic representative of the dollar of account.

It was also discussed and amended in the Senate. This law of 1873 was not rushed secretly through without consideration. It was enacted in the same manner in which all laws are enacted, and yet, although it is claimed to have injured silver, it is a fact that the average annual coinage of silver for twenty years following "the crime of 1873" was more than ten times the annual average for the forty years prior to that year. The Government has gone out of its way to favor silver and has as a special favor stored away in its vaults some $350,000,000, for which it gives circulation to a representative paper certificate which passes for money.

Mr. President, the argument, or rather the assertion, that the act of 1873 has brought about the reduction in the price of silver is gratuitous. The depreciation in silver is due largely to the increase in production, not only in the United States, but over the whole world. I do not believe that by any logical argument or true statement of conditions can it be shown that the law of 1873 reduced the commercial value of silver materially. On the contrary, if free and unlimited coinage had been given its full effect the amount rushed through the mints would probably have brought down the price of silver much sooner, and to a lower point than it has yet reached, because those nations at that time had nearly all demonetized silver, to use the ordinary expression, so that if we had continued the free and unlimited coinage of silver, without regulation as to the admission of foreign bullion, we would have been overwhelmed with silver.

Why not give to well-known natural and commercial causes the credit or the blame for the fluctuation in silver value instead of charging it to legislation of 1873? Why, at the time that law was enacted one would hardly see a silver dollar in circulation in a month's travel. Silver, except in the smaller coins, was practically out of use. In the next four years, 1874 to 1877, inclusive, there were no silver dollars coined. But what was coined? Did silver lose anything? Not a farthing. On the contrary, in those four years there was coined $21,500,000 in half dollars and $15,300,000 in quarter dollars, or a total of over $36,800,000 in silver. This was an average of over $9,200,000 a year in silver half and quarter dollars, being a greater quantity of silver than had ever been coined into similar silver pieces in any four years either before or since 1873.

And so, Mr. President, on applying the touchstone of simple fact to the wholesale creations of the imagination which have been woven about this subject they vanish like a breath.

Let us look at another claim. It is constantly asserted that our trade demands an increase of circulating medium. The political scientists who met in Omaha in 1892 and nominated Mr. Weaver for President seriously demanded that the circulating medium should be rapidly increased "to not less than $50 per capita."

In point of fact the amount of money in actual circulation in the United States has never been less than $22 per capita since 1881. It has fluctuated between $22 and $25 during that time. And at this present time, counting the money in the Treasury in the computation, we have per capita of money in the country about $24. No other country in the world exceeds this, or anywhere nearly equals it, except France, which has about $36 per capita. It is not necessary here to discuss the reason why France should slightly exceed the United States in amount of money per capita. It is sufficient to answer the insistence that we have too little money in circulation by saying that it is a mere assertion, incapable of substantiation. The average circulating medium in thirty countries of the world is less than $13 per capita. France excepted, the United States stands at the head and has more than twice as much money per capita as the average nation of the world.

This fact ought to settle the contention without further argument, as the figures are taken from the statistical reports of the officials of the United States.

Mr. President, in the remarks I have made I have sought to give my views dispassionately on the subject in the hope that we may, guided by history, observation, and reason, arrive at a proper final decision in the interest of the general welfare of the people of this country. The monetary question presses itself upon the attention of the country. Let us meet it with courage and do right. We can not permit the free and unlimited coinage of silver at 16 to 1 if we look to the interest of the people of the United States, except as the result of an international agreement for such coinage by the leading commercial nations. With such agreement we can. We can not depart from the gold standard with safety until such international agreement is made. I believe the time will soon come when a conference of the nations will be held and by which the silver question will be settled by fixing a ratio for its use as a money metal and for opening the mints for its free coinage. I hope for it, and look for it.

Mr. BUTLER. I had agreed to yield to the Senator from Utah [Mr. BROWN] after the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] had concluded, but, by permission of the Senator from Utah, I will now yield ten minutes to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART].

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I propose to call attention to the fact that the gold standard can not be maintained except by a perpetual increase of the national debt or repudiation. One or the other must be done to maintain the gold standard; and I think a moment's reflection will bring everyone to that conclusion.

Our gold obligations, while we are on a gold standard, are very large to Europe. We will not quibble about the amount, but I think from all the statements I have examined $400,000,000 a year of fixed charges would be a conservative estimate at the present time. Of course as we add to the principal these new loans, it will increase very rapidly, and is increasing very rapidly. The only means by which we can obtain gold for the purpose of paying our gold obligations to foreigners is by the sale of our commodities in foreign markets. We are compelled to sell those commodities in competition with Russia and all the Asiatics. They have about 100 per cent advantage of us in the difference of exchange in competing in those markets. I shall not elaborate upon that point; but they have such an advantage that they have been gaining in those markets and we have been losing very rapidly. During the current year we have not been able to sell enough to pay for more than we have bought. We have imported of commodities as much as we have exported in value. Consequently there has been added to our foreign debts, public and private, resulting from these fixed charges growing out of our foreign carrying trade, travelers abroad, interest and dividends on foreign investments, about $400,000,000 during this year.

So long as the Government of the United States will borrow gold and keep it on call for those who have greenbacks, and the greenbacks are out, of course we can maintain the gold standard without individuals paying a premium. But the Government is paying a premium.

The 4 per cent bonds had a very well-established market in February, 1895. They never have sold since they got fairly on the market for less than 1 per cent premium for each year they had to run. In 1888–89, having only about eighteen years to run, they sold for as high as 27 per cent premium, but that was exceptional. The market settled down finally to about 1 per cent a year for the time the bonds had to run. At the time the $62,500,000 of bonds were put upon the market in February, 1895, they were selling for about 11 or 12 per cent premium, they having then between eleven and twelve years to run. The President of the United States informed Congress at the time that he could obtain $16,000,000 more for the $62,500,000 of bonds provided Congress would authorize gold bonds. In other words, he had to pay $16,000,000 on the $62,500,000 in order to get gold.

At the last sale of bonds the premium was not so high, being only 11 or 12 per cent, and while the sale was manipulated sufficiently, it was not so absolutely a private deal as were the prior bond sales. The loss to the Government on what it had to pay on that loan to get gold was about ten to twelve million dollars, the Government paying a premium. The Government never can get a dollar of gold without paying premium. Just so soon as the Government ceases to pay a premium for gold and ceases to supply gold to those who must have it, somebody else must pay the premium for the gold. If the gold standard is maintained, payment must be made in gold; but just so soon as individuals can not come to the Treasury and get gold they must themselves pay that premium; and as soon as individuals pay the premium, your gold standard is gone. Just as soon as the Government of the United States ceases to pay a premium the individuals must pay the premium, and they can not get it otherwise if you maintain the gold standard. There is one other way, however, in which it can be done, and that is not pay at all; but if they pay at all, they must get gold at a premium. Consequently the gold standard can not be maintained longer than the credit of the Government will last to pay a premium, because when individuals pay the premium the fact is seen and recognized, but when the Government sells its bonds the country does not see that selling United States bonds at an enormous discount is paying a premium.

Gold is at a premium now, and the Government paid $16,000,000 in 1895 on sixty-two and one-half millions, and paid at least $12,000,000 premium on $100,000,000 in the last loan. The Government must pay a premium all the time, and individuals would have to pay a higher premium. The only way to prevent the payment of the premium would be for individuals to say that they would not pay at all. The gold standard can only exist while somebody will load the Government with debt to buy gold to furnish the gold to exporters. The Government has no use for gold, for it has not promised to deliver gold. If individuals have so promised, why should all the people be taxed to pay a premium to get gold to pay gold contracts which individuals have made?

The end is near, and if you do not stop selling bonds voluntarily you will be forced to stop by the loss of credit. Turkey tried it and it can not sell any more, Austria tried it and can not sell any more, Italy can sell no more, Spain can sell no more. The wrecking process will cure itself, and the time will come when the Government will be unable to pay a premium and when the people can not endure the taxation to which they are subjected to pay this premium. We are getting behind at a geometrical ratio every year, and whenever the Government ceases to pay a premium on gold, those who have gold obligations must pay gold if you maintain the gold standard. So the gold standard means an unending increase of the public debt or repudiation by individuals.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him what remedy he proposes for the condition of things which he describes?

Mr. STEWART. I can not answer that question without trenching on the time of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. BROWN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. STEWART. In answer to the question of the Senator, I will say that I propose to reenact the coinage laws of Jefferson and Jackson; I propose to have more money by the use of both metals; I propose to wipe out that clandestine legislation which took away the basis of the fabric, and which put a premium on gold; I propose to return to the money of the Constitution; and then there will be no premium on gold, because we can have some other material besides gold out of which to manufacture money, but when you have to pay in that material only, there is not enough to pay, and you have to pay a premium upon it, as there always must be high prices on any article cornered in the market; and gold is cornered by means of this clandestine legislation; gold is cornered by means of the operations of the Administration, which refuses to obey the law and pay in silver; gold is pooled; and consequently I propose to break the pool. It is pooled just as stock is pooled that is put in a safe, and I propose to use both gold and silver, and break the corner that these people have made through the cooperation of the Administration.

Mr. PALMER. May I ask the Senator whether he means by all that the free and unlimited coinage of legal-tender silver at the ratio of 16 to 1?

Mr. STEWART. I certainly do mean that; and that is the only remedy. So long as you can make money out of only one metal, and that metal is pooled and cornered, the men who have it hold the world by the throat, and they have throttled enterprise and brought misery everywhere through their criminal practices.

Mr. VILAS. I should like to ask the Senator what he thinks would be the effect upon our getting plenty of gold if we made silver a legal tender in sums of $50 in amount only, removing the power to receive silver certificates for customs dues?

Mr. STEWART. I would not bind the limbs of silver and have it start on a race with gold. They had a race for four thousand years, and they stood abreast; and now the Senator from Wisconsin proposes to hamstring one of them and start it out in the race.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to ask the Senator, if he will allow me, whether or not it would be his purpose as part of his scheme of free coinage at 16 to 1 to issue certificates upon the bullion before it is coined into money; that is, would the Senator propose to issue certificates providing for so many dollars from bullion yet to be coined and resting in the mints?

Mr. STEWART. I would issue certificates to-morrow on what bullion we have, and I would coin it forthwith. There has been a good deal said about the inability to coin silver, and that only $40,000,000 could be annually coined. I will undertake to coin all the silver brought to the mints for the seigniorage the Government gets. If they will let me have it for the space of ten years, I will undertake to coin $500,000,000 a year for the Government charges for the refining the bullion in the mints and other mint charges; that is, for just what the mint takes out of the bullion of the depositors for expenses. There is no trouble about increasing our coinage $10,000,000 a day.

Mr. ALLISON. I only wanted to know the fact. Then, of course, the Senator's idea would be either to have some provision whereby the coinage would be immensely projected, or else require the coinage of the bullion.

Mr. STEWART. I would have a sufficient amount coined. There is no excuse for not coining all the silver and all the gold that comes to the mints. There is no excuse for not doing it, because the Government charges enough for preparing the bullion for coinage and other charges to pay the whole expense. I will say to my friend from Iowa, there is one thing of which I want to notify him, and that is that there would be no trouble if mints were open except to get enough silver to coin. There is no danger of getting too much silver. I see more money and good times in the near future. There is an undercurrent coming; the common people have dropped on the gold game. They begin to understand that the public press is not telling the truth, and they have discarded its advice. They begin to understand that the public men have been misleading them. They begin to understand this Administration. The truth of what Mr. Lincoln said, that you can not fool all the people all the time, is going to be verified in the near future.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suppose the Senator excepts in his denunciation of the public press a mendacious publication in this city called the Silver Knight.

Mr. STEWART. Always excepting that. It takes an exception to prove the rule. The people are going the way of the Silver Knight more than they are going the way of the goldites just now. They have struck the exception, and if my friend from New Hampshire would read the Silver Knight attentively he might get his eyes opened.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am glad to advertise the Senator's publication. I have subscribed for it, and I also have one copy sent to me gratuitously through the favor of the Senator, and I read a great deal of truth in it. It goes to an excess sometimes, as the Senator does in his speeches.

Mr. STEWART. I hope that the Senator does not allude to the excess of circulating medium that is now among the people; that they are getting too much of it. I do not think he has reference to that. Excess! Is it possible to find language to describe a transaction which enabled a few gamblers in money to pool the circulating medium of the world, the standard money of the world, and to ask the price they had a mind to, and transform 70,000,000 of the most prosperous people on earth into 70,000,000 of dependents upon the caprice of an English syndicate? When you talk about the press, the great mass of the press has been the mouthpiece of an alien syndicate for years; and they have iterated and reiterated their nonsense and absurdities until the people have found them out.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I should like to change the subject a little bit. I wish to discuss the bill before the Senate to prohibit the further issuance of bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury, and incidentally the resolution which I offered this morning declaring bonds hereafter to be issued by the Secrptary of the Treasury illegal.

My reason for saying that they are illegal is the Constitution of the United States. The Congress of the United States alone, and not the Executive, is authorized, to quote the language of the Constitution, "to borrow money on the credit of the United States." I think the further issue of bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury or by the Executive is contrary to that clause of the Constitution. The authority claimed for the issue of these bonds is the act of 1875. It must be remembered by the students of the history of this country that that act was passed at a peculiar time, under peculiar circumstances, when extraordinary measures had been necessary to preserve the life of the Government and extraordinary measures were necessary to preserve the credit and honesty of the Government. Perhaps they might be called heroic measures that we had indulged in, and that it was necessary to indulge in in the year 1875. It had been the wish, the long-felt longing of the people of the United States—I might perhaps say of all parties, of certainly the dominant party—that we should at once, or as soon as possible, resume specie payments, that we should come back to the stable basis of coin, both silver and gold.

In the light of these circumstances, while one part of the country demanded it and said the way to resume was to resume—that is, at once to undertake the task—this measure was passed as a compromise one, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds to meet the legal tenders then outstanding. The legal tenders then outstanding were limited to somewhere near $350,000,000. It was to redeem those. It was supposed that when we redeemed those we would return to a specie basis. In one sense it might be said in criticising that act that there was no limit as to the time when bonds should be issued, the method, or the manner of their issue. The Secretary need not issue any. He might issue or not at his discretion. He was limited, however, if we will remember the circumstances—

First, by the purpose which was expressed in the act, "to prepare and provide for the redemption." I quote the words. It was not to use money to supply deficits; it was not to pay running expenses; it was not to pile up the surplus in the Treasury, but "to prepare and provide for the redemption." Not even to maintain it. No authority was given to maintain the redemption, because it was not supposed that when once accomplished it needed any maintenance. It was simply to prepare and provide for it that the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to issue bonds.

Second, he was limited by the amount; that is, he was limited by the quantity of legal tenders then in circulation. This grant of power to the Secretary of the Treasury was only for the legal tenders then in circulation, and not for any others.

Third, the Secretary was limited as to the time when he was to issue bonds. Not, perhaps, in so many express words; but these grants of authority are to be strictly construed, as the law books say and common sense teaches also; and the time within which the redemption was to be made complete and to be an accomplished fact or a dismal failure was four years.

So we had, as the act was passed and at the time it was passed, these limitations upon the power of the Secretary of the Treasury. It was given to whomsoever should be Secretary. It might be well that Congress would feel authorized and were authorized to extend this extraordinary power to the Secretary of the Treasury for a limited time, knowing who would be the Secretary, knowing to what party he would be committed, and yet that Congress would not and did not indefinitely extend the authority for all time to all Secretaries to issue as many bonds as they saw fit for any purpose that they might use them for.

I have the act before me here, and I will read it in this connection with my remarks. It is as follows, cutting out those parts of it which relate to the payment of money and only quoting the passages which relate to the issue of bonds:

> And to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and provide for the redemption in this act authorized or required, he is authorized to issue, sell, and dispose of, at not less than par, in coin, either of the descriptions of bonds of the United States described in the act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," with like qualities, privileges, and exemptions, to the extent necessary to carry this act into full effect, and to use the proceeds thereof for the purposes aforesaid. (Volume 1, Supplemental Revised Statutes of United States, chapter 15, pages 58, 59.)

To carry this act into full effect was to redeem the legal tenders of the United States on or before the 1st day of January, 1879. That was the effect of the act. When we returned to specie payment the purpose and end of that act had been accomplished and ended.

A grave question is intimated, and it again might arise as to the constitutionality of the act at the time it was passed. It seems to have been considered then an act of doubtful constitutionality. To a certain extent it was a delegation of legislative authority, a thing which this Congress can never do. Congress can not delegate its authority to any Secretary or to any Executive whatsoever. Such delegation is wholly illegal and forbidden; and yet with this limitation, and under the circumstances, and for the purpose for which the act was passed, it has been so far considered and treated as a constitutional act, and under the circumstances I do not propose to criticise it.

The use, however, that has been made of that act since could not have been foreseen at the time of its passage. It is now used for an entirely different purpose. The original statute simply gave authority to prepare and provide for the redemption. It is now said that it is to be used to maintain permanently the legal-tender notes in circulation and their perpetual reissue. Originally it was a fixed, definite amount, of about $350,000,000 or a little more; now it is $500,000,000, and that $500,000,000 it is proposed to maintain in a constant change, a constant reissue, so that the authority which originally was limited to the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds in the sum of about $350,000,000 is now construed to mean issue of bonds to the extent of $500,000,000 and five hundred million as many times as they see fit to pass the legal tenders over the counter of the Treasury. That may be infinite. It is an unending amount, so that the authority claimed now and that is claimed to be exercised by the Executive and the Secretary of the Treasury is to issue bonds not only to the extent of $500,000,000, but $500,000,000 multiplied by infinity itself just as often as the pleasure of the Secretary of the Treasury sees fit to issue them.

If the exercise of this power be strictly followed and the bonds issued for no other purpose, it would not probably be necessary now to forbid or prohibit the Secretary of the Treasury or the President from the further exercise of the issue of bonds. It could not be foreseen at the time of the passage of the act that the time would come twenty years after the passage of the act, sixteen years after the resumption which the act was passed to accomplish had been perfected and a fixed fact, that the Executive of the United States would search out and bring forward this old statute and claim authority under it to issue, at his own will to any extent that he saw fit, the bonds of the United States, and would thus exercise the constitutional authority of Congress to borrow for any and all purposes all the money that he desired.

Yet that is the state of affairs we now have. The Executive borrows, not to prepare for redemption, not to provide for redemption, not even to maintain the redemption accomplished sixteen years ago, but to pay the ordinary expenses of the Government of any and all kinds; and in addition to paying the ordinary expenses of the Government, which have been unusually large since this system of issuing bonds under the act was in vogue, to accumulate a fund on hand far in excess of the needs of the Government, so that he is able at any time to set aside the wish of the Legislature and dispense with the aid of Congress in raising money. He raises it without the act of Congress.

It will be observed that as now practiced the issuing of bonds is without limit. The original limitation has substantially been equaled if not passed. There was issued prior to 1879, the date of the passage of the act of 1879, as I understand it, bonds the face of which called for ninety-five and one-half million dollars in addition to whatever bonus may nave been received therefrom. There has since been issued bonds the face of which called for $262,000,000, making the face value of all the bonds three hundred and fifty-seven and one-half million dollars issued assumedly under this act. That, with the bonus and all, is about equal now to the amount of legal tender that existed at the time of the passage of the act. We are now asked to say that the Executive shall not issue more; that is, that he shall not exceed the limit which was originally fixed by the act of 1875.

It seems to me that the exercise by the present Executive of the act of Congress of 1875 is unconstitutional and to issue these bonds the Executive is without authority or warrant of law. It is our duty to protect the Treasury against further issue, and it is our duty to protect those who deal with the United States, who buy bonds, who deal with the Treasury, against receiving anything except bona fide bonds of the United States that can be enforced. Bonds of doubtful validity we have no right to sell. It is a deception to the buyer of them as well as a robbery of the country that we represent.

It follows that these bonds will be absolutely valueless in the hands of the holders. The question may be raised; and it is our duty now to warn the buyer, to pass such a resolution at this session of the Senate as to show to every would-be buyer that he is buying something which can not be enforced in the United States, and it is our duty to say to the public that these bonds are without authority, so that the cry of repudiation can not be successfully raised with regard to them. It is not repudiation to say that it is not our debt, it is not the debt of the country; but beforehand, before any person buys a single bond, I would have them warned by the Senate if they believe it to be true; I would have the Senate say to these would-be buyers of the bonds that we believe them to be illegal.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from Utah yield for a suggestion at this point? In January, 1894, before a bond had been issued under the present Administration, a resolution was introduced in the Senate declaring that the Administration had no power under the act of 1875, the resumption act, to issue bonds. That resolution was fully discussed here, and the purchasers of Government bonds from that time to this have been put upon their notice that they receive these bonds with a questionable title. Therefore there is no necessity for warning them again that there is lack of power on the part of the Government to issue bonds.

Mr. BROWN. May I answer the distinguished Senator, and ask him the further question: Did that resolution pass the Senate?

Mr. ALLEN. Oh, no, sir; it was antagonized by the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. BROWN. If the resolution passed the Senate I would sit down and have nothing further to say.

Mr. ALLEN. The honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], the leader of his party on the other side, said there was no question about the power to issue bonds; that the redemption of the notes would exist as long as water ran and grass grew. I quote his language. I simply call the attention of the Senator from Utah to the fact that he and the leader of his party are not agreed upon this question, but that the invalidity of the bonds, which I believe are invalid, was discovered and promulgated to the world long before a bond was issued. It is nothing new here, then, to warn the bondholders that they have no title.

Mr. BROWN. Our party, Mr. President, does not have leaders. Every Republican is his own leader; every Republican is a thinker. My friend from Nebraska has time and again talked about the Populist party and has made promises for the Populist party. He has leaned over and asked the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] to make promises as leaders of the Republican party. I assure him that while the Populist party may have leaders who can speak for it, the Republican party is democratic in that respect; every man stands on the same footing.

Mr. ALLEN. That is, every man is a thinker?

Mr. BROWN. And let me say further in reply, for I have not got quite through answering the former conundrum of the distinguished lawyer from Nebraska, that merely discussing a question is not the opinion of the Senate. When the Senator from Nebraska gave it as his opinion and offered his resolution in 1894 it went out to the world for what it was worth, for what the world thought of the distinguished gentleman's opinion. So I would not now claim any more for the resolution which I submitted this morning, and which I will read in a moment. The mere discussion of it would be nothing. That is merely an expression of a Senator's views as a lawyer or as a citizen. It carries no special weight beyond the doors of this Chamber; but when the Senate of the United States passes a resolution such as I shall ask them to pass, I think that is another matter; that becomes the opinion of the Senate. I think that will be heard wherever a man is going to buy a bond or whenever he thinks of buying one.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator will of course indulge me a moment?

Mr. BROWN. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator is a lawyer. The filing of a lis pendens is notice to the purchaser. You do not have to have a judgment declaring a thing to be illegal.

Mr. BROWN. It depends on who files it.

Mr. ALLEN. Whenever you file a notice of a lis pendens to contest the legality of a title, that notice stands good, and a person who purchases after that notice has been filed purchases caveat emptor. The Senator from Utah knows that. I simply call his attention to the fact by the filing of a lis pendens (if you may call it such, for that is what it is in legal parlance) it stands as a notice to all who purchase the bonds of the United States that those bonds are illegal. Now, as to the Senator's suggestion that every Republican is a leader and that every——

Mr. BROWN. I did not say that every Republican is a leader, but just the reverse.

Mr. ALLEN. And that every Republican is a thinker. I do not care to be pushed upon that question for an answer.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I have not any desire to push the Senator from Nebraska upon that subject, because I think he knows the fact without any discussion.

As to the essay that has been read and the comment that has been made upon the law of lis pendens, I am glad to hear the opinion of the jurist representing Nebraska here. I do not so understand the notice or the law of lis pendens. I understand that every notice of every kind to put a person upon his guard must come from the person who intends to act. It is the plaintiff in the lawsuit who files the lis pendens—not some stranger. It is not second-hand cousins. I propose to file notice lis pendens by the resolutions here to-day, by the Senate of the United States. My friend, the distinguished jurist from Nebraska, in offering his resolution a year or two ago, did not happen to be the Congress of the United States or even the Senate. That was the difficulty with that notice lis pendens. However, I am very glad he filed it as a friend of the court.

Mr. ALLEN. I am in sympathy with the Senator from Utah, and I propose to vote for his measure.

Mr. BROWN. I suppose so.

The Secretary of the Treasury is the mere agent or machine through which Congress makes loans. This agent, the Secretary of the Treasury, being one designated by law, can not be delegated with any of the legislative authority of the principal. He can only do the ministerial acts—carry out the will of the Congress. The determination of those things which belong to the legislative power must exist in Congress, and can not be exercised in any event by any Secretary at any time. To make a loan and to make any further loan under this law the following elements must be determined, and they must be determined just as much under this law as if no law existed:

First, the necessity and the occasion for the loan. If we were to authorize a new loan the first thing we would have to act upon is the necessity, the occasion, for the loan. Under the law of 1875 somebody must exercise the power of judgment, of determination, of discrimination, and say that there is a necessity for the loan. As construed, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorizing it. As required by the Constitution, it is the Congress of the United States.

Second, the amount of the loan. The first question going to the parliament, going to the representatives of the people, is how much the loan shall be. It must be determined by the representatives of the people in Congress assembled. As exercised the amount, as I have already discussed, is infinite. There is no limit. Just as fast as you can bring the $500,000,000 around, as he pleases and when he pleases, he is to exercise this power. He talks about keeping good $100,000,000 in gold in the Treasury. Yet he waited until it was $49,000,000 the last time. That was not the test. He does what he pleases. He exercises discretion as to the amount and the occasion; whether he will call for $500,000 or $100,000,000 at a time. He is exercising it, not Congress, as should be.

Third, the length and time of their maturity. There is another thing as to which, in borrowing money, the principal alone must exercise the discretion. If we are to borrow money of the world, we are the parties to say how long the bonds are to run. The Secretary of the Treasury exercises it under this law to run from five years to thirty years, just as he pleases, selecting any one of the classes of bonds which are named in the former act at his discretion. All these elements are matters which require the discretion, the judgment, the wisdom, and the power of Congress itself. Manifestly the Secretary never can legally exercise them except as they have been theretofore determined and settled by Congress. To make a further issue of bonds for the purpose of redeeming the now outstanding legal tenders the determination of all of these three elements is necessary, as this power has not been and can not be delegated to the Secretary of the Treasury, any attempt by him to exercise it would be without legal authority and actually void.

Therefore, I propose the resolution which I have offered as an effective method of preventing bonds. It has been boasted here by the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and others that we are powerless; that the House and the President will never concur, even if the Senate declares void the bonds. If we pass this resolution the buyers will see to it that they themselves and the country are alike protected. I have with me a copy of the resolution now on the table of the Secretary, offered this morning, and I will read it:

Be it resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate of the United States the Secretary of the Treasury has no authority under the act of January 14, 1875, to issue any further or other bonds in addition to those already issued, and that any such bonds that may hereafter be issued by him will be without authority of law.

I believe if we serve that as a lis pendens, using the expression of the Senator from Nebraska, it will be effective to stop the further issue of bonds, and the boast of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] will fall as dead as he hopes the proposed act of Congress will be.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator from Utah allow me?

Mr. BROWN. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. I wish to ask the Senator if he thinks the bonds already issued are authorized by existing law?

Mr. BROWN. I say frankly to the Senator that I do not think they are. I have not argued it in anything that I have said or am prepared to say, because for the purposes of this discussion, either in passing the resolution or in passing the proposed law, I do not regard it as necessary. It is a case we have not before this court to-day. Whenever it should arise it is possible that a further examination may change my opinion. I have not gone into that branch of the case; yet I think that so far as concerns those bonds which have been issued by this Administration—and I suppose that is what the Senator from Illinois refers to—they are without authority of law; that they are illegal, and could be avoided by the country.

As to those which were issued prior to the resumption act, they rest upon an entirely different basis. I think they are legal, or at least they were issued under authority. All these other bonds were issued without the authority of the act of 1875. The act of 1875 never could have imagined or foreseen Mr. Cleveland's Administration; it never could have foreseen this process of changing greenbacks for gold around through the endless chain which we have had described, and then turning it over to the general fund, until we have the accumulated surplus which we have here, a false surplus, a surplus of which and its evil result I shall have occasion to speak more hereafter.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] in a very able argument, as it struck me (I do not see the Senator from Georgia present, and I am sorry he is not in his seat), by the way, has taken in a measure the same view that I have and in a measure not, that the act of 1878 enlarges the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds, and it was against the evil effect of the act of 1878 that he was speaking. The act of 1878 has been quoted as if it were an extension of power to the Treasurer to issue more and more bonds. Authority given to an Executive or the Secretary of the Treasury must be strictly construed. It must be in the letter, not in the spirit. Unless the grant is given here so that every man can read it, it can not give the power by implying a necessity. You must say, "He shall have the power; he may do this, that, or the other." Grants of power are so strictly construed. There must be express words to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds. There can be no authority given to an officer except it is clearly and distinctly stated. The act of 1878, instead of being an extension of authority, may possibly be considered a repeal of the resumption act so far as it relates to the issue of bonds. It certainly places it out of the power of the Secretary to ever issue enough bonds to preserve the resumption. There is nothing in the act certainly which simply permits the reissue of these legal tenders that would authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to "borrow money on the credit of the United States."

The act simply says that the legal tenders then outstanding, $347,000,000, shall be reissued, and there is no grant of power given—is there?—to issue bonds; no hint that they want the Secretary of the Treasury to go and borrow money in untold quantities, and yet it is that power, that act, which is really, not professedly, assumed to be the basis and warrant for the action of the Executive at this time. It is because he has to keep those legal tenders good, keep redeeming them, that he says he exercises the power. I say that act is a repeal. It took away the power. It was repugnant to the original object. Let us see. A statute is repealed by the passage of another repugnant to and inconsistent with the first. The statute of 1878 forbids the redemption of legal tenders. The purpose of the statute of 1875—the object of it—was to redeem legal tenders, "to prepare and provide for redemption."

What is redemption? Payment. A new statute says it never can be redeemed, never can be paid. First, remember what the evil was to be met in 1875, the object of it, the gist of the statute. It was to retire these greenbacks, to pay the legal tenders, as every other honest debtor pays his debts. It was the policy then, and I hope it is the policy of the Republican party now, to pay our debts in full, to wipe them out of existence, and not to keep them forever returning, coming back to annoy us. We were to redeem the greenbacks, and the authority was given for that; but along comes the act of 1878 and says there is danger of contraction, and instead of passing an act in 1878, as they should have done, recognizing free silver and the free coinage of silver, and paying these debts so that there would be no contraction, they passed the act of 1878 which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to reissue forever and ever the same legal-tender notes. That was in exact contradiction of the purpose and object of the act of 1875, the one being to pay, the other to say never to pay in the wide world.

Mr. ALLISON. Will it disturb the Senator from Utah if I make a remark?

Mr. BROWN. No, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. I call the attention of the Senator to another provision in the resumption act of 1875. I was perfectly familiar with the passage of that act through all its phases, as was the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]. The very point that the Senator now states as a conclusive one at the time was really the tender point, the difficulty. If he will take another portion of the act he will see that the greenback notes were to be reduced to $300,000,000, and no further reduction, in the minds of most of those who voted for that bill, was to be made, and the United States pro tanto was to be a bank, redeeming and paying out.

After that law was passed a question of argumentation rose among people who supposed they knew a great deal about the act, which was that this redemption fund would retire all those greenbacks, and that it could be done under the law. That was the view taken by Mr. Edward Atkinson and other gentlemen who wished then to get rid of the greenbacks. The act of 1878 was supplemental and in support of the original act, except in one single instance, and that was that the original provision which authorized the greenbacks to be reduced to $300,000,000 was cut off specifically at $346,000,000, and the further provision that the notes should be paid out again was sacredly regarded by most of those who voted for it as a part of the original law of 1875. It was never intended by the men who passed that law that the greenbacks which had formed such an important portion of our currency should be withdrawn, canceled, and destroyed, and form no part of the circulation.

I make the statement as a part of the contemporaneous history, with which I was certainly familiar.

Mr. BROWN. I know the Senator is familiar with it. I gave myself the pleasure the other day of reading the debate. I could see how active the Senator from Iowa was in that matter. I noticed, too, that the question of $300,000,000 rose in that debate, and the question was discussed whether it should be put in or whether it would be unnecessary to put it into the law, if I remember rightly. I have not the language before me.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will bear with me one moment more, I will say, as to the passage of that bill through the Senate of the United States, that the Senator from Ohio—he can speak better for himself than I can for him—had charge of the bill for the Finance Committee, and it was understood that there would be no explanation of the bill. There was none. The Senator is familiar with it. The then Senator from Missouri, Mr. Carl Schurz, undertook to catechise the Senator from Ohio, and he parried his blows and thrusts as very few Senators in the Senate could do. So there was no Senatorial debate which in any way tended to elucidate or to fix what was in the Senatorial mind upon that subject. That was fixed elsewhere.

Mr. TELLER. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator from Iowa, but I know we never will have the truth of it until the Senator tells us what occurred in the caucus.

Mr. ALLISON. That was a long time ago, and I do not know but that the statute of limitations has run against the caucus. It is more than twenty years. But I do know what I heard, not only in the Republican caucus, but elsewhere, that with two or three exceptions it was in the minds of the men who voted for the resumption act of 1875 that the greenbacks were not to be retired, canceled, and destroyed except down to $300,000,000. Beyond that the greenback notes were to be circulated and redeemed and paid out by the Treasury and kept in circulation. The act of 1878 was but a legislative declaration of what was originally contained in the act of 1875.

Mr. BROWN. I repeat what I have intimated to my friend two or three times, that it is a poor kind of interpretation of a statutory law for a man who was present and voted for it to say, "I thought so and so about it at that time. Therefore that is the construction."

Mr. ALLISON. I agree to that.

Mr. BROWN. "It was understood so and so. Therefore you must construe it so and so." Statutes are construed by what they say and nothing else. It must be located right there, and no one knows better than the distinguished and brilliant lawyer from Iowa and the great financier from Ohio how to make clear their meaning in statutes. They did it then, as they always do; and what that statute says, that must be its meaning.

I will say to the Senator from Iowa, when he says that the Senator from Ohio can better express what was thought at the time, that he himself has expressed it. He can not add to that now, either. The debate that was had on that occasion is the conclusion of what they had to say in support of the measure at that time. It was ably and thoroughly argued by the distinguished Senator from Ohio, and it was passed as he wanted it, without objection or amendment.

I wish to say a word or two as to the policy of the act of 1878, and I am reminded by the Senator from Ohio that he was not a member of the Senate at that time. I am aware he was Secretary of the Treasury. At the time of the passage of the act of 1878 silver had been demonetized, but the effect had not been extensively felt nor was the question thoroughly understood. It had not been debated in every schoolhouse in the land. We had little coin in circulation, and had not arrived at the period of absolute redemption. It was feared that if the legal tender should be retired, redeemed, and canceled when paid, there would be contraction. It was to prevent the contraction which followed and was the necessary effect of the demonetization of silver that the legal tenders were issued.

Whether intended or not, it was a cover by which the people were deceived as to the effect of demonetization. Some have been so ungenerous as to charge that demonetization was a malicious act purposely done, and it may be that the act of 1878 might be said to have been intentionally passed with a view of preventing the people from early appreciating the effect of the demonetization. But it may have been passed in entire good faith. It is not necessary to impute bad motives to it. But the effect was just the same. It was to create a false currency, a false plenty of currency, when, in truth, the money was being driven out of the country. Had silver been coined instead of the reissue of legal tenders, and that silver placed in circulation to the extent of the legal tenders at that time, silver never could have fallen as it has. We would have had a much larger circulation than we now have, a greater currency per capita, and now we would have had no legal tenders to redeem or to drive away the gold out of the country. The danger which now appalls us could not have existed. The opportunity for the issue of bonds which is now claimed was created not by the act of 1875, but by the act of 1878.

When a statute is passed for a particular object, and that object has been accomplished, the force of the statute has been spent. It amounts to a virtual repeal, not a repeal to have any retrospective effect, to invalidate that which has been done, but a repeal of its power in the future, because all its conditions have been complied with. The act of 1875 authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds to prepare and provide for redemption was temporary in its nature by the statement of the object which was to be accomplished at the end of four years. The four years came, the resumption of specie payment was complete; the bonds were issued under it, were issued under that authority, and the whole statute was fulfilled, accomplished, ended, and it was as impossible under that statute, after the resumption had thus been made operative, for the Secretary to issue bonds as if the statute had been actually repealed by act of Congress. The condition of it had been performed and its force had lapsed.

It can not be said that this issue of bonds is merely to meet the deficiency in the revenue, because the deficiency in the revenue is vastly less than the issue of bonds. Forty-two millions deficiency of revenue in the last fiscal year and probably thirty-five millions this year; I forget how much for the year ending 1894, but a small amount, not in all $100,000,000—the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] says to me more than $100,000,000 in three years. Perhaps so. I have not the figures. The Senator will not differ certainly with the result. It has been vastly smaller than the amount of the issue of bonds. I think it is less than $100,000,000. And yet to meet this deficiency an issue of bonds already of two hundred and sixty-two millions, and the probability of another one hundred million to be added shortly.

The Congress of the United States has no power and no right thus to delegate its function to borrow money on the credit of the United States. It can not resign to President Cleveland the determination of when it is necessary to borrow money for the public good. It can not resign the question of how much money should be borrowed to meet the deficiency, or for any other purpose. It can not resign to the Executive the duty of maintaining the resumption and redemption of its own legal tender and bills of credit.

I was prepared to say before I heard my friend from Iowa, and I say it yet, so far as any public debate is concerned, and so far as any act of Congress is concerned, that it was never dreamed when the act of 1875 was passed that it would be necessary to extend the power any further than four years before redemption was expected to take place. Whatever may have been thought by any member of the Senate, nowhere in the debate is to be found a hint that the power of issuing bonds under that law was to be exercised after the four years had expired. The limit was fixed when redemption was to be accomplished, and it was for that particular occasion that they were to prepare, and there was no hint that afterwards there was to be any further issue. It was not to be an indefinite grant for all future time, and as to being a contract, it was impossible for Congress to contract. The Senator from Ohio said that it is a contract binding upon us morally, if not legally, and perhaps legally, that it is our duty to fulfill. What moral obligation can exist to violate the Constitution of the United States?

If this act as now exercised by the Executive is in violation of the Constitution of the United States, is there any moral obligation? Is the Constitution of the United States the subject of barter and sale by the Forty-third Congress? Can we contract away its provisions—moral obligation to set aside the liberties of the people which we are sworn here to defend and which the Forty-third Congress were sworn to defend? They were and we are here to uphold the Constitution and to protect it, under which law we are authorized to meet here.

Yet it is said it is a contract existing with the holder of every bill, every legal-tender note, that the Secretary shall have the power to issue these bonds. These bills may never be paid if the intention is to issue and reissue them forever. If this contract scheme is to continue, the Forty-third Congress, that passed that act, would have the power to contract away the Constitution of the United States. Can any contract be said to be moral that barters away the liberties and rights of the citizens of the United States? What right had the Forty-third Congress to thus barter away Constitutional rights? The very definition of a free government is one controlled and managed entirely by the representatives of the people in Congress assembled, and the duty is upon Congress here in this instance to perform these functions and to prevent their further usurpation by the Executive. The usurpation in this instance is on the part of the Executive. This has never been attempted by any other Executive. It will be remembered that none of his predecessors since resumption have exercised or pretended to exercise this power. It has first occurred to this Executive that he can bring that law back which in reality had ceased to exist (because it has accomplished the object for which it had been passed) and, by reason of finding this old law, prevent the control over the Treasury of the United States which justly and properly belongs only to the Congress of the United States.

Mr. PALMER. I want to ask the Senator whether it is or is not true that the predecessor of Mr. Carlisle gave the same construction to this law that Mr. Carlisle has given, and even went to the extent of ordering the preparation of bonds to be issued under that act? I ask the question because the Senator may be better informed on this historical point than I am.

Mr. BROWN. I am not better informed, and do not assume to be informed at all. I will say that I neither know nor do I care. I know this, however, that he never committed the act. Many a man has thought and contemplated whether he would not commit a crime, yet he paused without doing it. It would not be competent and proper, in trying a man who had committed a crime, to say, "Well, there was another fellow who was thinking about committing the same act and wondering if he had not better do it, though he did not do it." That is about all there is in the Senator's question. I do not know, I was not familiar with the matter, I never saw the gentleman, I never heard him say anything about it, and there is nothing in the records of Congress to show about it, and I am sure if the Senator has any such information he is welcome to it; I have none.

The controversy we have here to-day is the same old one that has been going on between the executive and legislative departments. It differs only in name of acts and name of executive and name of legislative department from the controversy between the Parliament of England and Charles the First. The parallel is complete between the situation at that time and the situation now. The executive then, as now, did not approve of the legislation which the Parliament desired to enact. He had a theory of government of his own, just as Grover Cleveland has, and because Parliament desired to annex conditions to their legislation of grants of money he sought to raise money by the executive power alone. So because the Congress of the United States has its own theories, has its own scheme of legislation, with which the Executive does not sympathize, he desires to raise money by his authority only. The effect of this power, thus exercised, of borrowing money in excess of the deficiency, and using the bonds for ordinary expenses, has been in the last two years to make the Executive independent of the legislative power of Congress.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. BROWN. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. I should like to express my satisfaction at the announcement that this Congress has some scheme for raising money to discharge public obligations.

Mr. BROWN. I confess the sarcasm of the Senator. I perhaps might have said, if I had gone a little further, that there might have been some scheme if it had not been for this terrible surplus on hand. We have got money enough. Perhaps I ought to have said, instead of this Congress demanding legislation, the people have demanded legislation, and legislation of a character which the Senator knows right well.

The people were heard from in 1894 from one end of this country to the other, when they told the Senator what kind of legislation was dearest to their hearts. We can not pass it to-day, and why not? Because the Executive does not need money. That is the legislation that is being prevented. If it were not for this surplus of $270,000,000 tied up in the Treasury, the unruly members would get together, and we could agree on some measure of revenue. The necessity would then be upon us, but we have no necessity now. We have got the money; we do not need any more money. We have too much money in the Treasury, some say. The President himself says in effect—I do not quote his language, as I have it not before me—that there is no question about the revenue; there is revenue enough; yet all the money that he has piled up in the Treasury is that which he has procured by a violation of the Constitution of the United States in selling bonds and preventing the legislation which would be necessary if he did not do that.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator permit me at this point?

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. I wanted to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the $100,000,000 of gold reserve, as it is called, and which has been the source of all our evils so far as the issuance of bonds is concerned, was established by the honorable senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], then Secretary of the Treasury, and without a syllable of law authorizing its establishment; and therefore the Republican party is purely responsible for the present condition of affairs.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator is historically mistaken now, as he is at other times.

Mr. ALLEN. I shall be glad to be corrected by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. The $100,000,000 reserve was first established by Mr. Manning, the first Secretary of the Treasury under Mr. Cleveland.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will permit me, I still insist upon the fact that the gold reserve was established by the senior Senator from Ohio, in or about 1878.

Mr. ALDRICH. A gold reserve was established by the sale of $95,000,000 of bonds in accordance with law in 1878 and 1879, but the gold reserve of $100,000,000 was established in accordance with the provisions of the act of 1882, in the first instance by Daniel Manning, when Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ALLEN. The honorable Senator from Ohio sold $90,000,000 of bonds.

Mr. ALDRICH. Ninety-five millions dollars.

Mr. ALLEN. He sold $90,000,000 of bonds under the resumption act of 1875, and he converted $5,000,000 of the Geneva award into bonds, making $95,000,000, with which he purchased coin, and with which he established a reserve fund or a redemption fund when he was Secretary of the Treasury. There was not then, and there is not now, a statute upon our books authorizing the existence of that reserve fund or redemption fund. According to the first section of the act of 1882, there is a proviso which has been construed since that time into authorizing the existence of this fund; but I wanted to call the attention of the Senator from Utah to the fact that the honorable Senator from Ohio is the author of all our evils and financial ills in that respect.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I never had heard before that the Senator from Ohio was the author of Populism. I have heard almost everything else laid at his door, except that one thing of all our evils, which is surely one of the greatest. I do not understand that the Senator from Ohio ever advocated irredeemable paper, nor do I understand that he has ever been a very earnest advocate for paper at all. I think sometimes that he was a little inconsistent in the extent to which he did go in that regard, but I do not understand that he has gone to the extent of irredeemable paper, though perhaps I am mistaken.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. BROWN. Before the Senator from Nebraska interrupts me, I wish to make just one other remark.

The Senator uses the Populistic logic here in his question to me, and says the Republican party is responsible for the issue of these bonds, because they were issued by a President whom the Republican party labored so hard at the polls to defeat. That is the usual logic of the Populistic party, because a Republican President never issued one of these illegal bonds, no bonds whatever, since 1878, and the Democratic party did; therefore, the Republican party are to blame for the Democratic party doing it. That is the condition we are in.

When interrupted I was about to say, or, rather, I will interrupt myself in the line of argument I was pursuing to call attention to an ingenious argument which was made here the other day by the distinguished Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], who is a friend of mine. I am sorry he is not here to-day, because I want to reply to something he said. It was upon the subject of these bonds, and his remedy apparently is to change the Government. His remedy is if Congress and the people will not trust the Executive of this Government, then the Government will come to an end. That seems to be the argument of some other Senators, if I understand it. What government will come to an end? The government by Grover Cleveland; the government by the Executive? The Government by the Constitution, which has confided to the representatives of the people alone the power to borrow money and to raise money by bonds, will come into new life when we enforce these provisions and do not yield to Executive usurpation. The Senator from West Virginia went on to say:

No matter if we had a Populist as President to-morrow, and no matter if we had unlimited paper money, or silver money, or gold money, I would favor the proposition that the President should have power to sell bonds under proper restrictions.

That is, he favors a different Constitution to that which we have. That, as I understand, is the argument of the distinguished Senator from Ohio. It is not that the Secretary of the Treasury now has authority, but that he ought to have it. It is consistent with his theory of government, but not with the Constitution of the United States which our forefathers provided for us. The Senator from Ohio said:

By the terms of that contract it was the agreement of Congress that the Secretary of the Treasury, an officer always at his post, an officer who is charged with these financial duties and not Congress, should pay the notes when presented, and in order to enable him to do so it authorized him to sell certain classes of bonds to pay them, and he was authorized to say which of those classes of bonds should be sold in order to provide the money.

The Secretary of the Treasury is "always at his post," said the Senator, as if that was a reason for the issuing of bonds, that a man is handy and can do it often; as if that was a thing we were looking for, somebody to keep up the machine and keep grinding out the bonds; that we want them to-day; we want them all the time; that they are something that we must have. I say it is contrary to the spirit of free government everywhere and contrary to that Constitution which we are sworn to defend. It was Congress that was to meet and see the occasion and not the Executive. It strikes me that the position taken by the distinguished Senator from Ohio on another bill was more consonant with his history of liberty-loving and with his life than the expression which I have just read, and I am proud to read and indorse the expression he made to the honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] on the subject of issuing certificates of indebtedness. At that time the Senator from Ohio said:

I would tear up every appropriation bill pending in this Senate and refuse to appropriate the money rather than issue $100,000,000 of certificates of indebtedness in a single year.

That was because he did not believe in running this country in debt. He would tear up every appropriation bill. That has the true ring of liberty and of sound finance—of appropriating nothing except what we are prepared to pay for. But let me say if we should not issue a single bond by act of Congress, which has the power, why should we issue bonds by the Executive, who has not the power? What consistency can there be in this position of the Senator from Ohio on that subject?

The President has no need to suggest any measure of immediate relief from the present condition of affairs. He sends us no message suggesting how a revenue may be raised. He has plenty of revenue, and his friends and supporters which he has in this body and in this Congress are unwilling to support any measure of obtaining revenue. The Executive is imperial; he is independent of the Congress because he has constantly before him this method of raising money whenever the gold in the Treasury becomes depleted or below the standard at which he thinks it ought to be maintained. At will he and the Secretary of the Treasury sell them, with or without notice, and thus obtain money without the need of any Congress whatever. The effect must be demoralizing both upon the Executive and upon the people themselves. I think we have seen its demoralizing effects here in this Congress and in this body.

I have already mentioned wherein I think the Executive has failed to answer to the public in recommending revenue legislation in consonance with that for which the people have expressed their wish. The effect has been equally injurious to another question; and it is with regard to this other question that the members of this Senate have been debating day after day this bond bill, because they know this question is affected by the power of issuing bonds.

There is another question which has awakened interest in the public mind all over the United States. The majority of this body, a large portion of the people—all the people, if we may believe the expression of the platforms of the two great parties made in 1892—are in favor of such legislation as will keep silver on a parity with gold, so that 371¼ grains of fine silver shall be equal to one dollar in gold. To-day the President uses this authority to raise money so as to prevent any legislation on the part of Congress which will compel him to put these two metals upon a parity with each other, the parity as defined by him being simply the privilege of using silver as a promise to pay gold. As such silver has no use whatsoever. It destroys its value as a money metal in every sense.

It has been said if it were not for this power exercised by the Executive of issuing bonds from time to time the Government would be without means of sustaining itself. That Congress would not agree upon any measure—could not agree upon any measure—to supply the deficiency, and that the wheels of the Government must stop for the lack of money and means with which to run it. This is an unnecessary and unjust aspersion upon any and every Congress. If it is true that the representatives of the people can not be trusted to furnish the means with which to carry it on, then the defect is in the organization of the Government itself, its foundation, its Constitution. The same fear, the same sensitiveness, has always existed. Those who laid the foundation of our Government were not afraid to trust the representatives of the people. The Constitution is made upon the theory that the Representatives will be always ready and willing to vote the necessary revenue to supply the needs of the Government, and leave with Congress the responsibility, the duty.

The Constitution is made upon the theory that the representatives will always be ready and willing to vote the necessary revenue to supply the needs of Government, and it leaves with the Congress the responsibility and duty. If Congress fails to furnish the revenue, invoke the proper means; then the Government fails by reason of Congress, and the blame must rest with the representatives of the people. Such criticism could always be brought against any and every free government, and yet a loan on the authority of the people only to raise money is the most stable of all. The Executive has no right, no duty to say to the Congress: "I know that you are incapable of running the Government in the constitutional manner, and therefore I will usurp it and run it in an unconstitutional manner." He has no right to assume that Congress will not fully comply with its duty when the necessity is upon it. It is a usurpation of the power of government when he assumes to take from Congress that which duty compels them to perform. The passage of this bill is not repudiation or infamy, but repudiation of the infamy of usurpation. But it is not true that there is any danger that Congress will not perform its duty.

Another evil effect of this constant loaning of money in time of peace is that it furnishes a place for those who have money to invest, so that they will not invest it in legitimate enterprises. We have a right to assume in the ordinary current of business that the money of the country will be invested in legitimate speculation—in manufacture, in farming, in buying and selling lands, in buying and selling produce, in buying and selling manufactured articles. We have a right to have the money of the country invested in business, but here we first cut off the business by the single gold standard and deprive the people of business; then we say, "We will furnish a place for the rich men of this country to receive an income from the Government by loaning their money to us, and taking it out of the channels of business, and we will pay 4 per cent interest upon it." That is one of the evils which comes from this policy, which I think is reason enough why this proposed legislation should pass.

I confess the fact of this constantly having an immense surplus in the Treasury is demoralizing to the members of Congress; it has been demoralizing in this Congress and in this Senate. Two hundred and seventy millions of surplus piled up, mainly, almost exclusively, by the sale of bonds, by constantly running in debt, has produced its usual result.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], whom I saw in his seat only a few minutes ago, has clamored almost every day for spending that money. He says he is in favor of the largest appropriations, whether they are needed or not needed, because he wants to disburse the $270,000,000 among the people. If this money must be raised from the people again by taxation he would not be so ready to pass the appropriations.

It has been urged here on the floor of this body that we have a surplus that we must distribute, that we must dispose of. It is true we have a surplus, but it is a disgraceful surplus, a surplus that we have gained by pledging the credit of our children and mortgaging the earnings of our grandchildren, or rather, not by our mortgaging them, but by the Secretary of the Treasury mortgaging away the future of our children and grandchildren. It is a surplus that we have no right to have. If it were not for that surplus no appropriation bill could be passed here in this body or in the other without it being seen where the money was coming from with which to pay the appropriation. It is the theory of government that the appropriation of money and the raising of it go hand in hand.

There would be no difficulty had it not been for this corruption fund that has been created by this surplus of $270,000,000. There would be no difficulty in harmonizing the different elements in this body and passing some kind of a revenue bill had not this two hundred and seventy million been in the way.

If, with every appropriation bill, we should add a provision providing by taxation to raise the necessary revenue to meet it, which we should all have to agree to before the appropriations could pass, we should have then no river and harbor bill with $70,000,000 in it to make deep-sea harbors for British ships; we should have no million and a half of French spoliation claims or a half million Bowman Act claims. Senators would pause before they voted to spend the money if they had to find some means of raising it.

This vast accumulation has prevented any harmony or harmonious action. If it had been seen that the Government must stop except we should pass a revenue bill, it is not to be supposed that the great party to which the Executive belongs would have persistently sat in this Senate and refused to consider a bill that came from the House for the purpose of raising revenue in any form whatever, and yet we are met with the astounding situation that the party of the Administration refuse to support the Administration or try to pass any kind of a revenue measure, every member of it, if I mistake not, voting against taking up the substitute for the Dingley bill, as it is called—not voting against it, but voting not to consider it; not to take it up, and not to consider any measure of revenue.

I know it is fashionable to find fault with that particular measure and make that an excuse why this Congress has not considered, discussed, and amended that bill, and why they refused to take it up for consideration at all. The particular defects that may be reasons for refusing to pass it never can be reasons for refusing to consider a measure. To pass a measure is one thing and to take it up for consideration is another. The particular friends and supporters of the Adminis ration were in duty bound to take some measure to relieve the necessities of the public Treasury. The distinguished Senator from Maryland has said here that the country would hold the Republicans responsible for their failure to legislate on the subject of raising revenue; but the country will look and see what party is in power; the country will look and see who has taken the reins of the executive government; the country will say, "Why did not the friends of President Cleveland," and among whom the Senator from Maryland will be reckoned as one; "why did not you and the others vote for some measure?" It is not to be expected that the House of Representatives will pass a measure exactly suitable to the Senate.

It is not to be expected that the House of Representatives will pass perfect measures; they are not required to do that, but they are to make a measure as perfect as they can, and they are permitted to apply their judgment to a revenue bill; but when it comes here, it is our duty, the duty of every Senator, and the duty of this whole body, to take up that measure, good or bad, wise or foolish, and consider it. That is what we are sworn to do, because if the Dingley bill was not satisfactory to the Democratic party it was still their business to take it up and then to amend it and revise it. But there was another peculiarity about it, and another peculiarity about the refusal to consider that measure. When it left the House of Representatives and came to us it was a measure for raising revenue purely and nothing else, a measure for raising revenue by a partial act of protection. When sent to our Committee on Finance it was changed, every word of it after the enacting clause being stricken out and a line drawn through it, and it came back here a bill for the free coinage of silver and nothing else but a bill for the free coinage of silver. There was nothing else in it but word for word a bill which had been theretofore approved by the Senate as a free-coinage bill.

Such a bill as that presented to a free-coinage Senate by its own Committee on Finance ought surely to have been considered in the body where the majority of its members believe and agreed to every term in it, and yet, when it is proposed to take up this substitute to the Dingley bill, not the Dingley bill itself at all, not one word of protection in it, not one word with regard to anything but the free coinage of silver, we are met with the astonishing sight of every one of the Democratic party who have been talking free silver and free coinage of silver, even the eloquent Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], the patriotic Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], in deliberate and long argument refusing to vote even to consider it for a moment or to allow it to come before the Senate for consideration.

Even they join hands in voting against this substitute, a free-coinage bill upon its face. With what face and by what right can those Democratic Senators who believe in the free coinage of silver go before the country and say that the Democratic party is for the free coinage of silver? And yet the venerable Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] and the venerable Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] have said that free coinage can only be expected by the aid of the Democratic party. Free coinage from the Democratic party, when they vote down free coinage at the first opportunity that they have! It but illustrated the bad faith with which that party have dealt with every subject of finance and every subject of national importance.

The Democratic platform of 1892 was construed to be a platform for the greater use of silver and the advancement of its value. It was construed to give such authority and permission as would, during four years, bring around equality with gold at the old ratio. But no sooner did the Democratic party get in power on the basis of this half-way promise to restore silver to its old position than we find the most vicious antisilver Administration that has ever taken possession of governmental affairs; all the silver legislation, all the props that have maintained the price of it, rapidly taken away; and so it is now we find the Democratic members of the Congress of the United States standing here opposing a bill for the free coinage of silver. It can not be said that this bill was anything else when it came to this House. The motion of the chairman of the Committee on Finance to take it up did not change its nature from a free-coinage bill back to a revenue bill again. It was here the reported substitute was to be considered, and when the venerable chairman moved to take it up he moved to take up the silver bill, and nothing else.

Nor can it be said that we have already passed one free-coinage bill and it was unnecessary to pass another. We had passed one of them, and at the time the first vote was taken a motion was made for taking up the bill. Action had not been taken upon it in the House; but when the motion was made the second time, on the 25th of February, action had been taken and it had been rejected, so that no free-coinage silver was before the people at that time. There could seem to me to be no excuse for a Democratic Senator, who is posing here claiming that that party represents the free-coinage sentiment, to refuse to take up this free-coinage bill. When they go before the people this fall shouting that they are for free coinage, we can point to them their action in this body when a free-coinage bill was before it. Every one of them, without exception, voted against it, even voting against considering it when it was their duty under the Constitution to consider the bill which had come from the House as a revenue measure.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] intimated the other day in a few remarks that he made and in effect said that the free-coinage substitute to the Dingley bill was "a trap, transparent and unfair," and therefore the free-coinage men were not to be caught by such a trap and voted against the free-coinage measure. I read at length:

> We represent constituencies which are in favor of the free coinage of silver, and yet in order to vote for the Dingley bill you would have compelled us first to vote down the substitute for it, which provided for the unlimited coinage of silver. It was a trap, transparent and unfair.

Who set the trap? Who was it that made the substitute to the Dingley bill a free-coinage measure? Did any one of the Senators on this side who voted to take up that measure vote in the Committee on Finance to make the change? Who made this bait of the free-coinage bill? Was this minority responsible for it? Did they ask it? Did they urge it upon the floor of the Senate? Who set the trap? The free-coinage members of the Committee on Finance. The majority of that committee were in favor of free coinage. They set the trap. They made the change. Lo and behold, when they had made the change they did not vote for the free coinage that they themselves recommended to the Senate. If I remember aright (I have not the vote before me, but I think I can not be mistaken) every one of them in the Chamber voted against it. I would ask the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS], if he were here—I am sorry he is away—what members of the Finance Committee set the trap? What trap could it be?

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Utah allow me a moment?

Mr. BROWN. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. It is not that it is my desire or intention to defend the action of the free-silver Democrats to whom the Senator has alluded, but simply that the truth of history may be preserved. I understand the criticism of the Senator from Utah is that the free-silver Democrats ought to have voted to take up the Dingley bill with the substitute for free silver attached to it. Is that the point of the Senator's criticism?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, to take up the substitute. It was the substitute only that was offered, as I understand.

Mr. HILL. I, of course, need not now discuss the question that a bill does not become a substitute until it has been acted upon by the Senate. It was the Dingley bill all the time. But I desire to inform the Senator that, I think, prior to his coming here, the Senate had taken up a bill which provided for the free coinage of silver and had passed it, for which every free-silver Democrat voted, and it was sent to the House. It was known as the Jones bill. I therefore simply make the suggestion what was the necessity for passing it over again? I say this in justice to my associates upon this side of the Chamber who differ with me upon the financial question.

Mr. BROWN. I am glad that the free-silver Senators on the other side have so able a defender. I think they need it.

Mr. HILL. I do not think they need any defense, and in that respect I do not make it; but I simply desire to state the truth, which is, as I think, that they have already voted at this very same session for a free-silver bill; and if their votes were cast for it and it was sent to the other House, there was, therefore, no necessity for passing it again.

Mr. BROWN. The bill came from the House here, as I have already said, a tariff measure, a quasi tariff bill.

Mr. HILL. That was the Dingley bill.

Mr. BROWN. The Dingley bill.

Mr. HILL. The other was the bond bill, a certificate bill, that I referred to, which was stricken out and made a free-coinage bill and sent back to the House.

Mr. BROWN. It was referred to the Committee on Finance. They struck that bill out, as they had the power to do, and offered a substitute, as they had the power to do. That substitute was a free-coinage measure, pure and simple, Taking it up, which was on motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], did not make it the Dingley bill. It did not remove the substitute. That could only be done by the action of the Senate. To be sure, it did not pass it. Taking it up for consideration of course does not pass it. But when it had been taken up, what had we before the Senate but a simple free-coinage bill and nothing else?

Mr. HILL. What was the point in passing another one?

Mr. BROWN. That is another question.

Mr. HILL. That is the question. If they are subject to any criticism about it the Senator might make the criticism plain. What was the point in passing another free-silver bill?

Mr. BROWN. The Senator asks me two questions, and when I get through answering one he repeats the second one over and over again. I will state the reason why it was necessary to pass it again. The first coinage bill, when we voted upon it the second time, had been rejected by the House. If we wanted it to be a law it had to be passed again. To be sure it was the Finance Committee that insisted that we should have it again. They said, "Well, we are not satisfied with it once, but we will put it to you again." They were the persons. It was just as much our duty to take it up and dispose of it and discuss it and consider it whether it was brought to our attention by the Finance Committee or the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HILL. Then the Senator thinks they should pass another free-coinage bill, and then possibly if the House did not agree to it pass a third one, a fourth one, and a fifth one. Is that his criticism?

Mr. BROWN. That seemed to be the position of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HILL. I am not speaking of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BROWN. I am not responsible for their action.

Mr. HILL. I am speaking now of the silver Democrats on this side of the Chamber whom you are criticising.

Mr. BROWN. Certainly, if they want a free-coinage bill they should pass it, or if they want a revenue bill they should take it up for consideration, or vote it down if they do not want it.

Mr. HILL. That is your criticism? They should have passed it the second time, then they should have passed it the third time, and the fourth time, every time it is put on a bill here. Is that the Senator's point? Let us understand what is the precise criticism you make of it.

Mr. BROWN. The Finance Committee say that is what we must do. Again and again they present it whenever we have a revenue bill presented. They say this free-coinage bill must be brought up as often as the Finance Committee see fit to present it. It is their duty if they want to have the bill to pass it.

When I was interrupted I was discussing what kind of a trap it was that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] referred to. Suppose this rascally minority that were in favor of the tariff had actually voted for a free-coinage bill with the Senator. Would the cause of free coinage be forever ruined for that reason? Is the free-coinage cause one that is to be injured by the vote, or is it because the free-coinage bill might carry that the Senator from Idaho is so worried? Suppose the trap had been successful and the free-coinage bill had passed this body and had passed the lower House and had gone to the President for his signature. What injury could have happened to the free-coinage bill? It would seem from the Senator's fear about the free-coinage substitute that he regards it a necessary part of a free-coinage measure that it should not pass; that it should be in a minority, that there might be some occasion to complain of some other part of the country not doing justice to the free-coinage measure.

But the Senator explains, "You would have compelled us first to vote down the substitute for it, which provided for the unlimited coinage of silver." Who would have compelled the Senator from Idaho? Is there any great danger of the antisilver minority in this body rising up and seizing hold of the majority? Was there any danger of the minority that voted in favor of taking up the measure, even if it had been taken up, ever obtaining control of it? Could not the majority that voted it down still continue to control? They were in the majority and amended the bill. What compulsion was there? What reason or excuse can ever be given for not taking up this measure, which contained at once the opportunity for free coinage, an opportunity for revenue, and an opportunity for protection? The Senator from Idaho is in favor of protection. He is in favor of free coinage. Here was a bill in which both would be represented, in which both would have joined. We had the free-coinage bill. We were voting upon that. We could have voted to add the revenue measure to it.

I hope that the next Republican Administration will set the trap again, and that it will be successful in catching the Senator and all other Senators, and that free coinage will become the law. I trust the Senator from Idaho will be caught in the trap and will be found once at least voting for free coinage of silver, and never again against it.

The outcry against the Dingley bill and its free-coinage substitute by the Democratic party, and the demand by that party for a platform of a single standard, is but an attempt to divert the attention of the public and to prevent at the coming election the issue turning upon the great question on which the majority of the people have set their hearts, and upon which the Republican party are sure of victory. The issue of the tariff has been made during the years before. The Republican party upon that issue has been formed and are united. In 1892 the platform of that party demanded a high protective tariff. The Democratic party won at the polls, but failed in the performance of their promise of free trade. The people demand now that we go back and pass such measure as was pledged to them in 1892. This is the issue of the Republican party, and it is pledged to free the people from the blighting effects of the Wilson-Gorman legislation.

The attempt to talk about the financial question in New York is but an attempt of Democrats to lead away Republicans from this great question. The metropolitan press are teeming with discussion in favor of the single standard, and demand that this country shall follow in the lead of Great Britain and make our finances conform to those of that country. They have a gold standard now; what more do they want? The Democratic party stood for free trade. Do they dare shrink from it now? Do they dare avoid the question? It is evident that the Democratic party do not dare to face the issue upon which they have fought for fifty years. If they believed in it they would again demand that that should be the foremost question, but this outcry that is going abroad is only to injure and break down the Republican party.

Protection or free trade is a legitimate issue this year. The Republican party owes it to the country to restore the protective tariff which the Democracy has destroyed, and in destroying it has destroyed the prosperity of the country. Let us not be diverted into passing a platform to please the gold-standard Democrats. If they can divide us on that issue, it is possible there may be some little Democratic hope. United on the great question, the Republican party is sure of victory. Victory not only for to-day, not only for this year, but for the years to come. Break up the Republican party once, as it is sought to be done by those who go through the country and seek in the name of the financial question to have us join other issues, and then the great mainstay of the country will be taken away. Destroy protection and you destroy the country itself. I ask the Republicans on this side, I ask those who believe in a single standard, if they are willing for that standard to give up their tariff convictions of a lifetime? Are they willing to see the issue of protecting the manufacturer and the farmer sacrificed at the hands of this gold craze that has suddenly taken possession of the country?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The Senator from Utah will suspend, that the Senate may receive a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CHAPELL, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 3161) amending and extending the provisions of an act of Congress entitled "An act approving with amendments the funding act of Arizona," approved June 25, 1890, and the act amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, approved August 3, 1894.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7664) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes; further insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 8, 13, 15, 16, 17, 32, 61, 96, 97, 109, 122, 123, 124, 140, 146, 147, and 161 to the bill; asked a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CANNON, Mr. HAINER of Nebraska, and Mr. SAYERS managers at the conference on the part of the House.

VETO MESSAGE—HELEN M. JACOB.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

I herewith return without approval Senate bill No. 140, entitled "An act granting a pension to Helen M. Jacob."

The purpose of this bill is to grant a pension of $12 per month to Helen M. Jacob, of Rochester, Ind., widow of Benjamin Oden West.

It appears from the records of the War Department that Benjamin O. West served in the Mexican war from January to November, in the year 1847. The beneficiary named in this bill was married to him in 1850, and he died in 1856. She was pensioned as his widow and received such pension from the date of her husband's death until April 17, 1861. On that day she was married to William W. Jacob, whereupon the pension ceased, but two minor children were awarded pensions and continued in the receipt of the same until January, 1873, when the youngest child became 16 years of age.

The entire absence of any fixed or reasonable principle or rule regulating private pension legislation at this time suggests the danger of its near approach in many cases to caprice and favoritism.

Though I have in a number of instances deferred to the judgment of Congress, and refrained from interposing objections to bills of this character which seemed to me to be of doubtful merit, I am unwilling to follow such a wide departure from a palpably just pension theory, and assent to the establishment of such an unfortunate precedent as this bill involves.

There is no duty or obligation due from the Government to a soldier's widow except it be worked out through the deceased soldier. She is pensioned only because he served his country and because through his death she as his wife has lost his support. In other words, she becomes a beneficiary of the Government because she is a soldier's widow. When she marries again and thus displaces the memory of her soldier husband and surrenders all that belongs to soldier widowhood she certainly ought not on the death of her second husband to be allowed to claim that she is again the soldier's widow.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, June 1, 1896.

Mr. TURPIE. I move that the message and accompanying bill be referred to the Committee on Pensions and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PERKINS submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8109) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 4, 9, and 10.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3, 6, 18, 19, and 20, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1 and 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the amended paragraph insert the following:

"Gun and mortar batteries: For construction of fortifications, $2,500,000; of which sum not exceeding $100,000 may be expended for the construction of necessary buildings connected therewith: Provided, That contracts may be entered into, under the direction of the Secretary of War, for materials and work for construction of fortifications, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, to an additional sum in the aggregate not to exceed $2,500,000."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,205,003"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 7 and 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the amended paragraph insert the following:

"In all, $3,770,076: Provided, That the following sums, to meet payments as they become due for the afore-mentioned objects under armament of fortifications, are hereby appropriated, namely."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$650,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$750,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 13, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$900,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 14, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$200,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 15, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$2,075,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 16, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$650,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 17, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "guns," in line 1 of said amendment, insert the following: "of American manufacture"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 21, and agree so the same with an amendment as follows: In line 1 of the matter inserted by said amendment, after the word "fortifications," insert the words "in its discretion"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 22, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "That in the act making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, approved February 18, 1893, the paragraph beginning with the words 'Of the $110,000' and providing for terms of payment for the 12-inch elevating gun carriage to be contracted for with A. H. Emery under the provisions of said act be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"Of the $110,000 to be paid for the carriage and its foundations, 85 per cent shall be paid in partial payments as the work progresses, in accordance with the proposals submitted by A. H. Emery to the Board in his letter of January 21, 1893. And no bond shall be required for the return of this money if the carriage is not accepted, nor shall the said Emery be required to return the money paid, and the carriage shall belong to the United States when the tests are completed. The balance of the $110,000 shall be paid as soon as said carriage shall have been completed in all respects according to contract, and shall also have undergone and endured a test satisfactory to the Board of Ordnance and Fortification. Of the $20,000 to be paid for testing of the carriage, three-eighths shall be paid the contractor when the preliminary tests are completed, and the other five-eighths shall be paid to him proportionally as the 50 rounds for proof are furnished. And the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to enter into a supplemental contract with the contractor for this carriage for the supply by him of a loading apparatus to go with and belong to the carriage and to be furnished therewith as a part thereof, and the carriage shall be so constructed that a part of the work of recoil can be used for the horizontal traverse of the carriage and the working of the loading apparatus, and the payment for the work so furnished under this supplementary contract shall be $10,000, which sum shall be due and payable when said loading apparatus is completed in all respects according to contract, and shall also have undergone and endured said test hereinbefore mentioned, to make which payment the sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated."

And the Senate agree to the same.

"To enable the Board of Ordnance and Fortification to procure and test one 8-inch caliber high-power gun, cast in one piece, on the plan of R. J. Gatling; and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to contract with said Gatling for said gun, without advertisement, which gun shall be constructed according to the plans and specifications prepared by said Gatling and under his supervision, and to be subjected to the same test now applied to the built-up gun of the same caliber, and the sum of $40,000 is hereby appropriated to pay for said gun, of which sum 85 per cent shall be paid in partial payments as the work progresses, in accordance with the contract to be entered into between the Secretary of War and the said Gatling, and the remainder upon the completion and test of said gun: Provided, That before said contract is entered into the plans and specifications for said gun shall be deposited with the Secretary of War, which plans and specifications may be modified, in the discretion of said Gatling, from time to time as the work progresses: And provided further, That the said gun shall conform in general form and dimensions to modern ordnance, and shall not, therefore, differ materially in form and dimensions from service guns, in order that it may admit of being mounted on a service carriage and in a service emplacement or fortification."

And the Senate agree to the same.

GEORGE C. PERKINS,
W. B. ALLISON,
A. P. GORMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

E. J. HAINER,
WILLIAM W. GROUT,
FRANKLIN BARTLETT,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

SOUTHERN STATES EXPOSITION AT CHICAGO.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Utah [Mr. BROWN] permit me for a moment?

Mr. BROWN. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. Senate concurrent resolution No. 42, relating to the Southern States exposition at Chicago, was submitted by myself and referred to the Select Committee on International Expositions. I ask that the committee may be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution in order that I may ask the Senate to permit its withdrawal. I desire to state that I ask for the withdrawal of the resolution at the request of the parties at whose instance it was originally presented. Let the committee be discharged from its consideration and the resolution withdrawn without my calling the attention of the Senate further to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be made.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the sundry civil bill may be laid before the Senate with the action of the House thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives agreeing to the report of the committee of conference of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7664) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes.

He also laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives further insisting upon its disagreement to certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7664) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, and requesting a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the report may be now considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7664) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 24, 25, 111, 112, 125, 126, 127, 128, and 129.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 10, 28, 91, 93, and 94, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert "mandamizing"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 22, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$24,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference have been unable to agree on the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 8, 13, 15, 16, 17, 32, 61, 96, 97, 109, 122, 123, 124, 140, 141, 146, 147, and 161.

W. B. ALLISON,
EUGENE HALE,
A. P. GORMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. G. CANNON,
E. J. HAINER,
JOSEPH D. SAYERS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. PLATT. I ask the Senator from Iowa to state what is still left open.

Mr. ALLISON. The important amendments left open are those relating to public buildings, which have not been agreed to by the House; amendment No. 97, which relates to arid lands; the amendment relating to the survey of public lands; also the amendment which was inserted by the Senate relative to the Brussels Exposition; also the items respecting the charities in the District of Columbia. There may be one or two other small items which I have not named.

Mr. PLATT. Does the Senator remember the numbers of the amendments relating to charities?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not.

Mr. CULLOM. They are not agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. There is no agreement about them. The House, it will be remembered, placed them under contract, and the Senate amended the provision by inserting Providence and Garfield hospitals. Those are still open.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate further insist upon its remaining amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference; and Mr. ALLISON, Mr. HALE, and Mr. GORMAN were appointed.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the indulgence of the Senator from Utah for a moment that I may present the report of the committee of conference on the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. BROWN. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6614) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, having met after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 3.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 5, 6, 7, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$10,400,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"For pay of letter carriers, $12,240,200;
"For marine free-delivery service, $3,500;
"For horse-hire allowance, $344,000;
"For car fare and bicycle allowance, $170,000;
"For street letter boxes, posts, and pedestals, $15,400;
"For package boxes, $10,250;
"Twelve mechanics in the six largest cities, exclusively employed in repairing boxes and locks, and erecting boxes, planting posts and pedestals, at $900 per annum, $10,800;
"Incidental expenses, including repairs, painting, freight, straps, time cards, maps, directories, furniture, etc., $24,000;
"In all, $12,818,250: Provided, That 10 per cent of the foregoing amounts for free-delivery service may be available interchangeably for expenditure on the objects named, but no one item of appropriation shall thereby be increased more than 10 per cent: Provided further, That $10,000 of this amount may be used to defray the expense of experiments in rural free delivery under the direction of the Postmaster-General, and that the amount heretofore appropriated for this purpose and still unexpended be available for said experiments."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$28,000,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

On the amendment of the Senate numbered 1 the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

W. B. ALLISON,
R. F. PETTIGREW,
CHARLES J. FAULKNER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

E. F. LOUD,
GEORGE W. SMITH,
J. C. KYLE,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. PLATT. I do not think that we ought to agree to these conference reports where we have had a serious difference with the other House without some explanation. I listened to the reading of the report as well as I could with the confusion in the Chamber, but I was utterly unable to learn what the conferees have done with reference to the action of the Senate for the continuance of the experimental free-delivery system. I should like to have some explanation as to that item, to say the least.

Mr. ALLISON. Amendment numbered 1, inserted by the Senate, relates to the consolidation of post-offices. It consists of two parts, the first relating to county seats and the other confining consolidation to corporate limits. The conferees were unable to agree to that provision. As to item No. 2, the House appropriated for compensation to clerks in post-offices $10,350,000. The Senate, by an amendment, increased it to $10,500,000. The House conceded $50,000 in addition to the amount already appropriated, leaving the sum agreed upon $10,400,000.

The next amendment is No. 4, wherein the House specified in detail the uses to which the appropriation for the free-delivery service should be applied, and giving the appropriations in detail. The Senate struck out that provision entirely and inserted what has hitherto been found in the Post-Office appropriation bill, a gross amount for the free-delivery service. The House insisted upon its detailed appropriations. The Senate conferees agreed to recommend to the Senate that the detailed appropriations should be made, with a provision that 10 per cent of each detailed amount may be transferred from one item to another, thus leaving a flexible sum in the discretion of the Postmaster-General.

It was provided that $50,000 of the amount should be used to defray the expense of experiments in rural delivery, under the direction of the Postmaster-General. The sum of $50,000 was stricken out and $10,000 inserted in lieu thereof, and in addition to that the amount heretofore appropriated for this purpose and still unexpended is made available in the future.

Mr. PLATT. I notice that a little more is done than to strike out $50,000 from the Senate amendment and insert $10,000. The Senate amendment read:

Provided further, That $50,000 of this amount be used to defray the expense of experiments in rural free delivery under the direction of the Postmaster-General, and that the amount heretofore appropriated for this purpose and still unexpended be available for said experiments.

I see that the word "may" has been inserted. It is a small word, but I am very much afraid it may come to be a very important word. It now reads:

Provided further, That $10,000 of this amount may be used to defray the expense of experiments in rural free delivery.

As we understand that the Postmaster-General is not very favorable to these experiments, the little word "may" may result in there being no experimental free delivery after the 1st of July, 1896.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Connecticut will also observe that the amount heretofore appropriated for this purpose and still unexpended is made available. The word "may" is not inserted there. I have no doubt that the Postmaster-General will so use the money.

Mr. PLATT. While I am on my feet I wish to ask a question. Have the conferees any information upon the subject as to whether even in towns where the delivery has been paying its way it will be continued after the recommendation of the Postmaster-General, as I remember, that the whole matter should be discontinued?

Mr. ALLISON. I understand from the House conferees that that will be done. They had a consultation with the Postmaster-General. I have no doubt it will be done. I think in appropriations where the words "may in his discretion" or "in the discretion of the Postmaster-General" are not inserted it is generally regarded as equivalent to "shall."

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not wonder that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] interrogates carefully the chairman of the committee of conference. In view of the precedent attempted to be established in the Senate it will be necessary to spend a great deal of time over these conference reports. I now take occasion to ask the Senator from Iowa whether there is any provision in the conference report changing the rates of postage either on letters or on second, third, or fourth class matter?

Mr. ALLISON. I will state to the Senator from New Hampshire that there is nothing in the conference report relating to those subjects.

Mr. CHANDLER. The amount that is asked in certain bills before the Senate for establishing a postal telegraph system and taking charge and control of all the telegraph lines is about $28,000,000. I notice an appropriation of $28,000,000 here in the conference report. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa whether it is for taking the telegraph lines and establishing a postal telegraph system?

Mr. ALLISON. No. I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that that item was not in conference. It is one of the original appropriations made by the House of Representatives which was assented to by the Senate. It is for the purpose of conveying the mails from one place to another, known as transportation, and I think under no construction could it be used for purchasing or leasing telegraph lines.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then it is not entirely a new item inserted in the conference report by the committee of conference?

Mr. ALLISON. It is not.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suppose I may infer, then, that there is nothing in this report for steamship subsidies. I can cover the point I desire to assure myself about by asking the Senator whether there is anything in this report that was not the subject of difference between the two Houses?

Mr. ALLISON. There is nothing in this report that was not a subject of dispute between the two Houses.

Mr. CHANDLER. I beg pardon of the Senator for putting these questions to him, but evidently it will be necessary hereafter to catechise the chairmen of committees of conference on every imaginable subject that by any possibility can connect itself with the subject-matter of an appropriation bill if the precedent is to be approved by the Senate which has been set by the Senate on the Indian appropriation bill, which is now being defended by Senators upon this floor.

Mr. ALLISON. There was a provision inserted by the Senate relating to the Australian Steamship Company, which has been assented to by the House conferees.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator is sure that the committee of conference has added no other steamship line——

Mr. ALLISON. They have added no other steamship line.

Mr. CHANDLER. There ought to be, I will say, a renewal of the Brazilian steamship subsidy, and I very much regret, if this system is to go on, that the conference committee, knowing that fact just as well as I do, did not put the Brazilian subsidy upon the Australian subsidy.

Mr. ALLISON. That question was not considered by the committee.

Mr. PLATT. If the Senator from New Hampshire has got through illustrating that story of Henry Ward Beecher about the dog Noble, I will venture to ask the Senator from Iowa how much is the amount reduced in Senate amendment numbered 2? It is now $10,400,000, the Senator stated.

Mr. ALLISON. It is reduced from the amount named in the Senate amendment $100,000.

Mr. PLATT. It makes an increase of $50,000.

Mr. ALLISON. Fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. PLATT. The $150,000 which the Senate put in there, so far as I remember, was to enable the Postmaster-General to classify the post-office clerks; at least it was stated that if we would put in $150,000 additional to the amount appropriated by the House, the Postmaster-General would be able to make a reclassification of the post-office clerks in the country, for which they have been struggling, and in which they are very much interested. This reduction, I suppose, will make it impossible for that to be done.

Mr. ALLISON. It is probable that under the report as agreed to there will be a deficiency next winter. Of course if the Postmaster-General sees proper to do what the Senator thinks he ought to do, it can be done as well under this appropriation as under a larger one, but the deficiency would be larger in that instance than it will be under the appropriation made. That is all.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator has not stated another matter of disagreement.

Mr. ALLISON. I have stated that there is only one matter in disagreement, and that is amendment numbered 1, an amendment originally placed upon the bill upon the motion of the Senator from Maryland, and added to on the motion of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. LODGE. It was on that I desired to say a word.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator to first allow this report to be agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. All right; but in regard to the item of disagreement to which the Senator has now referred I desire to be heard for a moment.

Mr. ALLISON. That will be in order as soon as the report is concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the report of the conference committee.

The report was concurred in.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I have the consent of the Senator from Utah [Mr. BROWN]——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has been recognized.

Mr. LODGE. I only want to say in regard to that portion of the disagreed item which was added on the motion of the Senator from Florida at the close of a long discussion in the Senate by a somewhat narrow majority, that I trust the Senate will recede from that portion of the amendment. As it now stands it is going to inflict very great hardship on a very large population. I have not looked the question up for all the cities, but I have looked it up with some care for the city of Boston.

There are no less than 157,786 persons now served from the Boston city post-office who are not within the municipal limits, who under this amendment will be thrown out of that service and forced back on fourth-class post-offices and the service greatly deteriorated thereby. I have received petitions, which I have filed here, and I have received representations from different city governments, and the strongest protests against this plan of taking from them a postal service which they have had for years.

The cities included in the Boston metropolitan circuit, but which are not within the municipal limits of Boston, are, with their populations, as follows:

Brookline	12,103
Cambridge	70,028
Chelsea	27,109
Revere	5,668
Winthrop	2,726
Somerville	40,152
Total	157,786

All these people are now served from the central metropolitan office. This amendment, which declares that no station or substation shall hereafter be established or maintained outside of the municipal limits of a city, will throw all those towns and cities outside. I trust that such a sweeping measure as that will not be inflicted upon these persons and these communities; and I shall therefore move that the Senate recede from that portion of the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to consent that this matter be now allowed to go over until to-morrow morning, when we have a fuller Senate. I shall then be glad to have the attention of the Senate to this amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Very well.

Mr. ALLISON. In view of the fact that so many matters are pressing upon us now, and that we have an order for to-morrow which includes an agreement to vote upon the bond bill, so called, before adjournment, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa, that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HARRIS. Is the conference report disposed of?

Mr. ALLISON. The conference report has been concurred in, but the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] goes over until to-morrow.

Mr. HAWLEY. I desire to present some morning business.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to ask the Senator from Utah if it will be agreeable to him to yield to a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business? It is now twenty minutes to 6 o'clock.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I have already said to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] that I would yield for a very important matter which he wishes to present. So I shall not go on further to-night.

Mr. HARRIS. I had intended to move an executive session, but I do not like to come in conflict with my friend from Connecticut if there is any especial matter in which he is interested.

Mr. HAWLEY. I rose to a matter which would occupy two or three minutes, but it is important——

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. HAWLEY. I had rather speak to a fuller Senate than is now present, and do not claim the floor.

CATHERINE LEARY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 819) granting a pension to Catherine Leary, which was, in line 6, before the word "dollars," to strike out "eight" and insert "twelve."

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment made by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, June 2, 1896, at 11 o'clock a. m.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate June 1, 1896.

COLLECTOR OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

William H. Fowle, of Virginia, to be collector of internal revenue for the Sixth district of Virginia.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 1, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will cause the Journal of the preceding session to be read.

Mr. KEM. I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER (after counting the House). A quorum appearing, the Clerk will proceed with the reading of the Journal. The Chair hopes that members will be present promptly and save these annoyances.

The Journal was read.

Mr. GIBSON. On page 5914 of the RECORD I am recorded as not voting, which is a fact. But when my name was called I answered "present," and I desire the RECORD to show that I so answered.

The SPEAKER. There is no record made in the Journal of those present upon a roll call and not voting except on particular occasions where members present and not voting are necessary to be counted in order to make a quorum. The gentleman's explanation will appear in the RECORD.

ELECTION CONTEST—JOHNSTON VS. STOKES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like the attention of the House for a moment. The matter which now comes before the House in regular order is the election case of Johnston against Stokes. As the House will recollect, the previous question was ordered upon the resolutions reported by the Committee on Elections and upon a substitute submitted on behalf of the minority of the committee. A vote was taken on the substitute, and it was disagreed to. The question recurring on the resolutions of the committee, a division of the question was asked for; the first resolution was voted upon and adopted. A motion to reconsider was then made, and a motion to lay that motion on the table is now pending.

As the Chair understands, some members of the House, perhaps all members, desire to vote not merely upon the two propositions—that Mr. Stokes was elected and Mr. Johnston was not, or that Mr. Johnston was elected and Mr. Stokes was not. They desire to vote in addition upon the question whether either of these gentlemen was elected; and the present situation does not give an opportunity to do that. Hence the Speaker thinks it proper for him to say that if the House should reconsider the vote by which the first of the resolutions reported by the committee was adopted, it would then be open to the House to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was negatived and also to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered; and if that were done, a motion could be made (which would be in the nature of a substitute for the amendment) that the seat is vacant. The question now before the House is on the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the motion to lay on the table.

The SPEAKER. Then the question recurs on the motion to reconsider.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote whereby the House refused to substitute the resolutions of the minority.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not exactly understand the parliamentary status, and I would be glad, before the question is submitted, to have it clearly understood by the House.

The SPEAKER. A motion is now made by the gentleman from Massachusetts to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the minority of the committee was rejected.

Mr. HENDERSON. But what is the amendment? That is the question I want the House clearly to understand.

The SPEAKER. It is the minority resolutions, namely, that Mr. Stokes was not elected, and is not entitled to the seat; and that Mr. Johnston was elected, and is entitled to a seat. If the House shall agree to reconsider the vote by which the minority resolutions were rejected, then the matter will stand precisely as it did when the previous question was ordered.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. JENKINS. I withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I now move as an amendment to the substitute resolutions proposed by the minority of the committee the resolution which I send to the desk, and on that demand the previous question.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "Resolved," in the resolutions submitted by the minority, and insert:

"That there was no valid election for Representative in the House of Representatives of the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Seventh Congressional district of South Carolina on the 6th day of November, 1894, and that neither Thomas B. Johnston nor J. William Stokes is entitled to a seat therein."

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. HOPKINS. Before the question is submitted on the resolution, Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry. If this is voted down, then the proposition will be as to whether Mr. Johnston is elected or not?

The SPEAKER. Or Mr. Stokes.

Mr. McMILLIN. If the proposition is voted down, it leaves the question in exactly the situation, as I understand it, that it was in when the previous question was demanded by the gentleman from Wisconsin on Friday last?

The SPEAKER. Precisely.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. If the proposition is adopted by the House, is the sitting member deprived of his seat and the seat declared vacant?

The SPEAKER. If the resolution is adopted, it vacates the seat.

Mr. HEPBURN. May the resolution be again reported?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be again read.

The resolution was again reported.

Mr. OVERSTREET. If I understand the situation correctly, in the event the resolution fails, then a vote may be had on the original substitute?

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, there is one parliamentary inquiry I would like to make involving a somewhat more difficult position. Suppose the resolution is voted down and each of the other two resolutions submitted by the minority are defeated, what then will be the parliamentary situation? [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. In other words, where are we at?

The SPEAKER. The Chair absolutely declines to say. [Laughter.]

The question being taken on the amendment proposed by Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts, the House divided; and there were—yeas 104, nays 103.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken, there were—yeas 130, nays 125, not voting 100; as follows:

For this day:

Mr. MEIKLEJOHN with Mr. CROWLEY.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important vote. I think we had better have a recapitulation of it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so too. The Clerk will recapitulate.

The Clerk recapitulated the names of those voting.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The amendment to the substitute is agreed to. The question is now upon the substitute as amended.

The substitute as amended was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the resolution; that is, the resolution presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL].

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is agreed to, and the seat is declared vacant.

On motion of Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 3071) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Monongahela River from the borough of Braddock to the township of Mifflin, Pa.; and

A bill (S. 2653) for the relief of M. S. Hellman.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 3282) to repeal section 61 of an act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, which became a law August 28, 1894; and

A bill (S. 3245) granting a pension to Elvira Bachelder.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 804) granting a pension to Mrs. Eleanor Carroll Poe.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the conference committee on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 225) to provide for the transfer of the Fort Omaha Military Reservation to the State of Nebraska.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 7578) granting the Flagstaff and Canyon Railroad Company right of way for railroad purposes through the Grand Canyon Forest Reserve in northern Arizona.

The message also announced that the Vice-President had appointed Mr. FAULKNER one of the conferees on the bill (H. R. 6614) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, in place of Mr. BLACKBURN.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following Senate bills were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows:

A bill (S. 2653) for the relief of M. S. Hellman—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 3245) granting a pension to Elvira Bachelder—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (S. 3071) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Monongahela River, from the borough of Braddock to the township of Mifflin, Pa.—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

CERTAIN BONDS OF NEW MEXICO TERRITORY.

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 9275) which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9275) approving certain acts of the legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, authorizing the issue of certain bonds of said Territory, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the coupon bonds and indebtedness of the Territory of New Mexico, amounting to $75,000, authorized by section 7 of an act of the Thirty-first legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, entitled "An act authorizing the rebuilding of the Territorial capitol at Santa Fe, which was destroyed by fire May 12, 1892, and to provide the necessary means therefor and a board with authority to rebuild the same," approved February 5, 1895, and designated as capitol rebuilding bonds of the Territory of New Mexico;

Also, the bonds and indebtedness, amounting to $15,000, authorized by section 1 of an act of the said legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, entitled "An act to provide for the maintenance of the military institute at Roswell, N. Mex.," approved February 13, 1895;

Also, the bonds and indebtedness, amounting to the sum of $30,000, authorized by section 1 of an act of the said legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, entitled "An act to provide an addition to the insane asylum of New Mexico for the accommodation of all the insane persons of the Territory, and for other purposes," approved May 13, 1895; and

Also, the bonds and indebtedness, amounting to the sum of $35,000, authorized by section 1 of an act of the said legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, entitled "An act to provide for the completion of the buildings for the normal schools of New Mexico at Las Vegas and Silver City, and to provide for the necessary furnishings therefor; and for additions to the New Mexico College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts, at Las Cruces," approved February 27, 1895, be, and the same are hereby, approved, confirmed, and made valid; also, the certain bonds and indebtedness, $172,500 in amount, together with the interest coupons thereto attached, of the county of Santa Fe, Territory of New Mexico, dated March 1, 1892, issued under the provisions of an act of the Territorial general assembly known as the refunding act. Such bonds having been issued in refunding and in lieu of $150,000 of bonds, and the overdue interest thereon, of said county of Santa Fe, theretofore issued and outstanding, are hereby validated, approved, and confirmed.

Also the certain bonds and indebtedness, together with interest coupons thereto attached, of the county of Santa Fe, Territory of New Mexico, dated September 29, 1891, issued under the provisions of an act of the Territorial general assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, entitled "An act for the financial relief of counties and municipalities," approved February 26, 1891.

Such bonds having been issued in refunding and in lieu of $150,000 of bonds, overdue interest, and a judgment rendered thereon, of said county of Santa Fe, theretofore, in the year 1880, issued and outstanding, are hereby validated, approved, and confirmed. Also the certain bonds and indebtedness, $56,000 in amount, together with the interest coupons thereto attached of the county of Grant, Territory of New Mexico, dated July 1, 1883, being the unretired part of an issue of $60,000 in bonds issued by said county of Grant under the provisions of an act of the Territorial general assembly, dated February 1, 1872, are hereby validated, approved, and confirmed. Also the certain bonds and indebtedness, $50,000 in amount, together with the interest coupons thereto attached, of the city of Silver City, county of Grant, Territory of New Mexico, dated March 1, 1893, issued under the provisions of an act of the Territorial general assembly of the Territory of New Mexico entitled "An act enabling the authorities having charge of the finances of any town or city of the Territory of New Mexico to refund any bonds or other obligations of said town or city by the issuance of similar obligations, bearing a less rate of interest," approved February 11, 1891. Such bonds having been issued in refunding and in lieu of bonds and indebtedness to the amount of $50,000 of said city of Silver City, county of Grant, theretofore issued and outstanding, are hereby validated, approved, and confirmed.

It is intended hereby to validate, approve, and confirm any and all laws, ordinances, and proceedings, and bonds relating to the matter necessary to the validation of the said Santa Fe County, Grant County, and town of Silver City bonds, but no further and for no other purpose.

The said county of Santa Fe is hereby authorized and empowered to again refund all or any portion of the indebtedness thereof by this act validated within one year from the passage of this act, in accordance with the terms and provisions of an act of the legislature of the Territory of New Mexico, being chapter 79, entitled "An act for the financial relief of counties and municipalities" (house bill No. 192), approved February 26, 1891, except that such refunded bonds shall bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, payable semiannually, and shall become due twenty-five years from the date of the issue of such refunded bonds, and shall be issued for the amount of unpaid principal of the bonds of said county by this act validated, with interest thereon from the date thereof, to wit, September, 1891, and March, 1892, respectively, at the rate of 4 per cent per annum until the date when the sum shall be refunded as herein provided, less the amount of interest heretofore paid on such bonds; and when said bonds shall be so refunded they shall be subject in all other respects to all the provisions, liabilities, rights, obligations, benefits, and advantages of said act of the legislature herein referred to. In case said bonds shall not be refunded by said county of Santa Fe upon the terms and conditions in this section set forth, then the bonds validated by this act shall remain as the legal obligation of said Santa Fe County.

If said bonds shall be refunded as herein provided, the holders of the bonds herein validated shall, upon actual notice given by said county, deliver to said county the bonds herein validated, and shall receive in lieu thereof the refunded bonds provided for in this section: Provided, That any of said bonds which shall not be delivered for refunding to said county of Santa Fe within six months after said notice shall be given, as herein required, shall not bear a rate of interest greater than 4 per cent per annum from date of issue: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to make the Government of the United States liable or responsible for the payment of any of said bonds by this act approved, confirmed, and made valid.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I demand a second.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, can we have the report on this bill read?

Mr. LACEY. I ask that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire and Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia objected.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. OWENS and Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 90, noes 14.

The SPEAKER. A second is ordered. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. OWENS] is entitled to twenty minutes——

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. It is very apparent that there is a quorum present.

Mr. HENDERSON. Is the point of no quorum insisted on, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. DOCKERY. It has been overruled by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. OWENS] is entitled to twenty minutes in the affirmative, and the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER] to twenty minutes in the negative.

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, as most of the members of the House will recall, the bill now up for consideration is one passed some months ago by the House of Representatives to validate certain municipal bonds issued by different towns in the Territory of New Mexico. That bill went to the Senate, and was there amended so as to validate certain other bonds issued by the county of Santa Fe, N. Mex., and also by the city of Santa Fe—bonds that had been issued some ten or fifteen years ago for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad within the Territory of New Mexico. When that came back to the House it was referred to the Committee on Territories; which committee added a still further provision or amendment validating certain bonds issued by the county of Grant and also by Silver City for a like purpose.

A short history of the bonds issued, included in the Santa Fe and Grant County and Silver City bonds, will present the issue before the House.

There is no controversy, I believe, but that these bonds all stand upon a like basis, and were issued in perfect good faith by the people of New Mexico. They desired the construction of a railroad, which was largely beneficial to the people of Santa Fe County and also of Grant County, as well as the adjacent counties. After contracting with a company for the purpose of securing the construction of these roads, they agreed, in consideration of their construction, to issue the bonds named in the bill just reported. The constructing companies, operating in like good faith, went ahead and constructed the road, in compliance with the contract made with the people.

There is no contention indulged in by anybody here or elsewhere but that the bonds issued to the construction company had been issued in perfect good faith, and that the bonds were used in the construction of this railroad, and that the company did construct the road. The fact is before me now that Grant County gave $100,000 in bonds for the construction of that road, and the railroad has paid back to that city and county $110,000 in taxes, more than enough to pay the original bonds with the accrued interest thereon. The county of Santa Fe was in the same position. The bonds were issued by all the parties in perfect good faith. It was supposed by everybody that they had a perfect right to issue them; and when these bonds were issued they went ahead paying the interest for a number of years on the idea that they were completely within the terms of the law. But a few years ago, in the case of some bonds that were issued in a certain county in Arizona, the Federal court, passing upon their validity, determined that those bonds, similar to the Santa Fe bonds, were not issued within the terms of the law. In other words, these bonds were issued under an act which authorized the Territories to issue bonds to aid in internal improvements, and these bonds having been issued in order to build a railroad, they did not fall within the term "internal improvements," and therefore were invalid.

Now, that is the sole objection to them, a technical one, which seems strained and farfetched. Many of the best lawyers of the country had not supposed up to that time that that objection could lie against these bonds. Prior to the time when this decision was rendered the people acquiesced in the regularity of the bonds and paid the interest upon them. Their regularity had been tested in the Territorial courts of New Mexico, and that court had decided that the bonds were valid and regular. They were issued at a high rate of interest; and, desiring to fund them at a lower rate, they had the benefit of an enabling act, and put their bonds upon the market under that act, and with the moneys thus secured from that loan they had paid off the old bonds issued by the construction company and issued new bonds to the present holders. Thus you see if there had been any trouble, if there had been any irregularity in the original issue of the bonds, that question ought not and can not be valid in this controversy.

There is no question but those who hold the new bonds parted with their money in perfect good faith, parted with it on the faith of the decision of the Territorial courts of New Mexico, on the faith of the representations made by the attorney of the Territory of New Mexico and concurred in by the United States district attorney of the Territory. There was then, I say, no possible claim that these bonds were in any sense invalid or irregular. The men who own the bonds had taken the money out of their pockets and placed it in the hands of the people in New Mexico solely for the purpose of taking up their bonds, for which they were paying a higher rate of interest, and giving to them the benefit of a low rate; and it can scarcely be denied that these people have acted in good faith in furnishing the money to enable the Territory to take up the old bonds and furnish the money at a comparatively low rate. It can not be contended, I think, that they should escape the payment of these bonds, and this thought of irregularity was not entertained by anybody until after the decision I have referred to.

Mr. BLACK of Georgia. If the gentleman will allow me to ask him a question, was the money obtained from the sale of these bonds used in the construction of the railroad?

Mr. OWENS. The money was used for the construction of the railroad, and it was paid to the construction company in consideration of their engagement to build this railroad. The construction company did build the road, and it is now being operated. In one of those counties that railroad has paid into the treasury in taxes $110,000, while the county only paid $100,000 in bonds in aid of the construction of the road.

Mr. TERRY. Is this the same bill that was opposed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. COOPER]?

Mr. OWENS. Yes, sir.

Mr. TERRY. Is not he a member of the committee?

Mr. OWENS. Yes, sir.

Mr. TERRY. Did not he contend on this floor that there had been really no consideration given for these bonds?

Mr. OWENS. Not at all, sir. Nobody has ever contended that. Every member of the committee except the gentleman from Texas referred to was in favor of the passage of the bill with the amendments. Not even the representative from New Mexico protested against the passage of the bill, or even contended that no valid consideration was given by the construction company which had been given these bonds; but when the Federal courts had determined that they fell outside of the terms of the law the contention was, for that reason the counties ought not to be compelled to pay them.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the gentleman state whether the representative of New Mexico favors the payment of these bonds?

Mr. OWENS. The representative of New Mexico does, and I have here a letter from him asking the passage of this bill. In fact, this bill comes here as the result of an agreement between the parties interested directly in the bonds and the Territorial representative from New Mexico, the agreements having been based on the proposition that the bonds shall pay a still lower rate of interest than is provided in the Senate amendment, and the bonds to be issued are to be twenty-five-year bonds, at 4 per cent interest instead of 10 per cent, at which they were originally issued.

Mr. DOCKERY. I understood the gentleman to say that he had a letter from the representative of the Territory of New Mexico favoring the passage of this bill as amended.

Mr. OWENS. Yes, sir; asking for the passage of this bill with the Senate and House amendments.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that that letter be read.

Mr. OWENS. I am going to have it read.

The letter was read, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., May 30, 1890.

DEAR SIR: Having accepted an invitation to make an address before the Alumni Association of the University of Missouri, which has been fixed for June 2, I am compelled to be absent during the coming week to fulfill that engagement.

It is very important that H. R. No. 4052, in regard to the validation of certain bonds of New Mexico, be acted upon by the House before the close of the session. The original bill provided for the validation of bonds to aid in the construction of buildings of certain educational institutions, the asylum for the insane and the Territorial capitol, the history and necessity for the same being set out in the report made by me on behalf of the Territorial Committee when that bill was presented, and to which I refer. After the bill passed the House it was amended in the Senate so as to validate certain other bonds issued as refunded bonds by the county of Santa Fe. It was returned to the House, and on reference to the Committee on Territories it was there again amended by validating certain other refunded bonds of the county of Santa Fe and certain bonds of the county of Grant and city of Silver City. The bonds of Santa Fe County, when refunded, had the interest thereon decreased from 7 to 5 per cent. The amendment of the House committee now authorizes the further refunding of said bonds and a reduction of the interest to 4 per cent.

When this bill was called up by Representative Low, after the Territorial Committee had reported it with the amendment, I opposed its passage at that time in order that information might be furnished, if any existed, as to the validity of those bonds, which, it had been said, would be furnished from Santa Fe. No information has been furnished to me, however. I have made inquiry in regard to them, and am personally acquainted with their status of my own individual knowledge. As a matter of law, I do not believe the Santa Fe County bonds are invalid, and I know that no fraud was perpetrated when they were issued; that is, when the original bonds were issued, which were afterwards refunded. The indebtedness was voted or authorized in each instance by a majority of the taxpayers of the county. It was believed by everyone at the time that such bonds would be valid, and that the county had authority to issue them on the consent of the taxpayers. The legal profession in the county all agreed that such bonds would be legal. They were voted in aid of the construction of railroads into the county. The roads were constructed as stipulated and are now in operation. I have made inquiry of many of the taxpayers of the county since these amendments came up for action and they say that they favor the passage of the bill with these amendments. I furnish you with this two telegrams from taxpayers and prominent citizens of Santa Fe County, which will show you the feeling of the people of the county in regard to this bill.

There has been a general demand on me throughout the Territory, since the passage of the bill was delayed at my request, in order to get further information, to have the bill passed, as it will be for the general interest of the Territory. The institutions for which the bonds are intended to furnish aid already have contracts made for the completion of the buildings. They can not realize on the bonds unless they be validated. Those institutions will remain paralyzed without it. I therefore ask you to have the bill passed, if within your power to do so, before the close of the present session. Should it be brought up during my absence you can use this letter as expressing my views, as well as the telegrams I have furnished you. I have many other letters and telegrams from various parts of the Territory urging the passage of this bill on the ground of its great interest to the whole people, and I do not furnish them to you, because it will encumber the RECORD to have them read.

Hoping that you will give this matter attention and secure the passage of the bill, I am,

Very respectfully,

T. B. CATRON,
Delegate from New Mexico.

Hon. WILLIAM C. OWENS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. OWENS. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I wish, in the first instance, to call attention to the fact that this matter has already been before the House at this session. It was called up on the 6th day of April, and there was quite an extended discussion of it at that time, after which the House proceeded to vote, and the vote then taken on the very question which is before the House now was against the validation of these bonds—ayes 42, noes 73. It will be seen, therefore, that this is the second attempt which has been made at this session to pass this bill, which, I trust, I shall be able to show is in part, at least, without justification. If gentlemen will, at their leisure, turn to pages 3641 et seq. of the RECORD of this session they will see the reasons then assigned why these bonds should not be validated.

This is not a new question, Mr. Speaker. In a form almost identical with that in which it is presented to this House the question has been before the Supreme Court of the United States. I refer to the case of Lewis vs. Pima County (155 U. S., 54), on appeal from the supreme court of the Territory of Arizona, where bonds issued in like manner with these were before the court. I will not detain the House by reading the opinion of the court in full, but will read sentences from it here and there. The court says:

Now, unless a debt thus incurred in aid of the construction of a railroad can be said to be an obligation necessary to the administration of the internal affairs of Pima County, it must necessarily follow, irrespective of every other consideration, that the legislature exceeded its powers in authorizing and requiring the county to issue these bonds in exchange for those of the railroad company in question, and that the bonds are void.

The question in that case was, as I have said, almost identical with the one now before the House. Then, in closing, the court said:

We are compelled to hold that the bonds in question create no obligation against the county which a court of law can enforce.

I hold in my hand an issue of the Santa Fe Daily New Mexican of date Thursday, April 1. This is a paper printed in the very city where these bonds were issued, and, if legalized, will be a tax upon the people. It contains an article of which the headings are as follows:

A BLACK SHOWING—FULL EXPOSURE OF SCHEME TO VALIDATE FRAUDULENT BRICE AND COLER BONDS—HOW BRICE AND COLER HAVE LOADED IT WITH AMENDMENTS AIMED TO ROB PEOPLE OF SANTA FE AND GRANT COUNTIES—RECORD OF PERFIDY AND FRAUD—SUBSTANTIAL REASONS WHY PEOPLE OF THIS COUNTY FEEL THEY ARE NEITHER LEGALLY NOR MORALLY BOUND TO PAY THESE BONDS—REASONS THAT OUGHT TO WEIGH WITH CONGRESS.

This article says:

In 1872 the legislature of New Mexico passed an act authorizing the counties to issue bonds in aid of railroad construction, but expressly provided that not more than 5 per cent of the assessed valuation of the property in any county should be issued to aid in the construction of any one railroad, and contained the following proviso, to wit: "Provided, That no bonds or other evidence of debt created in this act shall be sold for less than par value, nor such bonds or other evidence of debt shall be paid or delivered to any railroad or person or persons for the use of such company, nor shall they be permitted to leave the hands of such commissioners except on the certificate of the governor that the railroad to which said aid has been conceded has been completed in the county where such aid was voted." (See section 2712, Compiled Laws of New Mexico.) The same law also provides that railroad stock shall be issued to the county in consideration of such bonds.

Afterwards, in 1878, for the purpose of limiting the power of the counties and municipal corporations in issuing bonds, Congress passed a law expressly providing that no county or municipal corporation shall issue bonds for any purpose "except where absolutely for the management of its internal affairs."

Is there any member of this House who believes that the building of a railroad is necessary to the management of the internal affairs of a municipal corporation? If not, then these bonds, every one of them, are absolutely against not only the statutes of the Territory of New Mexico but also in violation of an act of Congress.

This article goes on to say:

In the face of this absolutely prohibitory provision of Congress the county of Santa Fe, in 1880, voted to issue at one election to the New Mexico and Southern Pacific Railroad $75,000 in bonds for the construction of the Santa Fe-Lamy branch and $75,000 for the construction of the main line, the assessed valuation of the property of Santa Fe being $2,300,000. These bonds were voted to one company at one election, and were really intended to be used to build the branch, as the New Mexico and Southern Pacific built its entire line throughout the Territory without asking aid from any county, except exemption from taxation and other exemptions provided by law; and no other county except Santa Fe voted any aid to the main line of railroad.

These bonds were void for two reasons: First, they were absolutely prohibited by an act of Congress in 1878, and it was a fraudulent evasion of the Territorial law by pretending that they were issued for the purpose of aiding in the construction of two roads when they were intended to apply to the construction of only one road.

The railroad received the bonds and held them until $42,350 of interest had accrued—the citizens from the very first refusing to pay them, and the law being so weak that the holders dare not undertake to force collection.

At this time the railroad company sold the bonds to Messrs. Coler & Co., of New York, at a little less than 50 cents on the dollar, including the accrued interest, as will appear from the following telegram of the broker who sold them.

Now, the very statute under which they were issued said they should not be sold for less than par.

Mr. OWENS. What were they sold for?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. For less than 50 cents on the dollar.

Mr. OWENS. Is it not a fact that when the original owners parted with them they parted with them at par under the contract to give the construction company so many dollars in bonds at par for the construction of this railroad?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The gentleman can make any explanation of this dispatch that he desires to make in his own time.

Mr. OWENS. By whom were they sold?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I am not worrying about that.

Mr. OWENS. They were sold by the man who got possession of them under that contract, not by the county.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Here is the dispatch:

SILVER CITY, N. MEX., March 23.

W. T. THORNTON, National Hotel, Washington, D. C.:

Fifty thousand dollars bonds and $42,350 past due coupons, Santa Fe County issue, sold at 64 flat.

GEORGE H. UTTER.

The article proceeds:

It will thus be seen that the bonds were taken as a speculation, not a dollar's worth of stock being issued by the New Mexico and Southern Pacific Railroad to Santa Fe County as a consideration, and the county therefore absolutely received no benefit, except the construction of the branch road, 18 miles in length.

The statute absolutely required that an equal amount of stock should be issued with the bonds, but not a dollar's worth of stock has been issued and turned over to the county.

Mr. OWENS. How do you know that?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I know it by the statement of this paper, printed in Santa Fe, N. Mex., and I trust that if the gentleman wishes to assault the paper he will do it in his own time.

Mr. OWENS. I do not want to assault the paper, but I assault that dispatch.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I wish to state to the gentleman from Kentucky that he has reserved the remainder of his time and can answer me in it. I can not give up mine, limited as it is, for his argument. The article proceeds to say:

After Messrs. Coler & Co. had obtained these bonds they brought suit to recover the defaulting interest, and obtained judgment for seventy-odd thousand dollars, Messrs. Catron, Knaebel & Clancy appearing for the plaintiffs. The decision of the supreme court of the Territory affirming this judgment will be found in the 27 Pacific Reporter.

An attempt was made upon the part of the citizens to appeal this case to the Supreme Court of the United States—the citizens offering to pay the entire expense of the appeal, making transcript and all costs in connection therewith, which was refused by the county commissioners, the commissioners being entirely under the influence of the bondholders.

That is the statement of the Santa Fe paper. If anyone has anything to controvert it I am perfectly willing that he shall produce it in his own time; but I do not presume that a paper issued at the very capital of the Territory, where every citizen knows the facts, would make such statements if there was not at least a preponderance of proof in their favor.

The bondholders afterwards, through the influence of their attorney, Mr. J. H. Knaebel, secured the passage through the Territorial legislature of a refunding act, and the $250,000 of Santa Fe County bonds included in the Coler amendment are the funded bonds issued under this act to take up the original $150,000 issued, with accrued interest. How completely the bondholders dominated this legislature will be proved by an examination of the law (chapter 79, page 146, Laws of New Mexico of 1891) which provides not only for the refunding of the bonds but makes it a penitentiary offense to refuse to levy the tax or for the collector to refuse to collect the taxes to pay overdue interest on these bonds.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman state where those bonds are held now?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I do not know, but I suppose they are held in New York City. I do not know where they are held. I do not know a person who owns them.

Mr. DOCKERY. It might be interesting to identify their ownership at this time.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. But it does not matter what the ownership is if the bonds were fraudulent in their inception.

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly not.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. These bonds were sold originally at a small figure, leaving a margin large enough so that parties interested could come and bedevil legislatures and Congresses in connection with them.

Mr. LOW. Why does the gentleman from New Hampshire suppose that those bonds are held in New York?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Because in this country bonds of this kind are generally held in New York. That is the only reason.

Mr. LOW. In fact, they are scattered all over the country.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I do not care where they are held.

Mr. LOW. You simply suppose they are held in New York without any knowledge.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I do suppose so without any personal knowledge, for reasons sufficient for myself.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. What is the amount of these bonds?

Mr. TERRY rose.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY].

Mr. TERRY. The statement of a member of the committee on that subject, made in the previous debate, is to this effect:

In one instance, bonds that had been purchased by some agent or broker named Coler, and known as the "Coler bonds," which originally amounted to $150,000, but in the refunding act you find that after having been refunded they amount to $250,000.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. That was my understanding, that they were originally $150,000, and that about $50,000 was accumulated in interest. Where the rest of the amount comes from I must confess myself ignorant, for I do not know.

Then this railroad was sold. As appears by Record Book O, page 19, it was conveyed by George S. Preston and wife to CALVIN S. BRICE and wife, of New York.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask whether he has received any petition from citizens of Boston in connection with this bill?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I have a letter from a gentleman in Boston calling my attention to the preceding action of this House; stating that he was familiar with the matter; that these bonds were fraudulent, and that he hoped I would do anything I could to prevent the passage of this bill.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Yes, sir.

Mr. LACEY. Is it not true that this Boston man has some bonds which he thinks will be strengthened if these bonds can be repudiated? Is not that all there is in it?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I am reading from a paper published in Santa Fe, N. Mex., showing that the people in Santa Fe are opposed to the validation of these bonds; and I do not suppose there is a person on this floor who is in favor of validating them that has not some friend who owns some of these bonds.

Mr. OWENS. What was that statement?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I say that every person who is in favor of validating these bonds, if he has looked into the question, must have some friend who owns some of them.

Mr. OWENS. Well, sir, I can say for myself I do not know an individual on earth that owns one of them. I am in favor of validating these bonds, because I am against repudiation in every form and wherever it comes from.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I am in favor of repudiation of every bond which was absolutely void at the time of its issne.

Mr. LOW. Is it not a fact in regard to these refunded bonds that when they were refunded an act was passed by the legislature of New Mexico validating them?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. That is true; but the assertion is openly made in Santa Fe and elsewhere that the legislature which did it was corrupted; and the Supreme Court of the United States has held in a similar matter that bonds so validated are absolutely void.

Mr. LOW. One more question, and I will take my seat. Why is it, then, that to-day the largest taxpayers in New Mexico want these bonds validated?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I do not believe they do.

Mr. LACEY. And why is it that Boston men are fighting these bonds? Explain that, if you please.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The account from which I have been reading goes on to say:

The road was completed from Espanola to Santa Fe, and was operated by the Santa Fe Southern system until a short time ago, when it went into the hands of a receiver and was sold. For the purpose of giving validity to its bonds the assessments of Santa Fe County were padded. Large quantities of property exempt from taxation were placed upon the assessment rolls, as will fully appear by the accompanying certificate prepared from the records of Santa Fe County by George W. Knaebel, secretary of the Santa Fe Board of Trade:

SANTA FE, N. MEX., March 20, 1896.

Very truly, yours,

GEO. W. KNAEBEL,
Secretary Santa Fe Board of Trade.

GOV. W. T. THORNTON,
National Hotel, Washington, D. C.

When these bonds were issued there was a Congressional statute absolutely forbidding the issue of the bonds; the Supreme Court of the United States has held identically similar bonds to be void ab initio; and it appears that there is grave suspicion in regard to the enactment of the Territory of New Mexico which undertook to validate them; and that that action of the Territorial legislature was in contravention of an existing statute of Congress—the act of 1878—no one denies.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him how the matter he mentions can cut any figure morally, so far as innocent holders of these bonds are concerned, ratified, as the bonds have been, by the action of the legislature?

Mr. HEPBURN. How can there be "innocent holders" in this case?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I do not suppose that there is any man who buys a bond in the United States of America anywhere who buys it without knowing something of it; and if he knows anything of these bonds he is not an innocent holder.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. But is not the record of these bonds straight as far as the acts of the legislature are concerned? In other words, did not the legislature, in passing the acts ratifying the issue of these bonds, settle that question?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. No; because the act of a Territorial legislature in contravention of an act of Congress is void, and because it was contrary to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. That ought to be enough to put a banker on his guard in dealing with such securities as these bonds.

The bonds issued to the New Mexico and Southern Pacific Railroad were speculative, received by the railroad as a bonus which they accepted with a view of realizing what they could out of them, and sold them for 50 cents on the dollar, when the law provided they should only be sold at par.

The county received no consideration. Not a dollar's worth of stock was issued, when the law required that it should be issued. Double the amount permitted by the Territorial law was issued by the fraudulent pretense that they were to be used in the construction of the two roads.

The bonds issued to the Texas, Santa Fe and Northern road were issued to a corporation that was fraudulent from its very inception, being fraudulently organized, having instigated fraudulent assessments to evade the Congressional act prohibiting such action, and were issued in fraud in that they were issued to a company that did not own the road under construction, and the stock which the county was to receive would have been in a corporation bankrupted, and therefore absolutely valueless. For these reasons the citizens contend that they are neither legally nor morally bound to pay this obligation, and there is certainly no precedent for going to Congress and asking Congressional aid in validating bonds which have been issued in direct violation of the acts of Congress.

It would certainly lead to serious consequences for Congress by its actions in this instance to set a precedent wherein it would declare that municipal corporations in the Territories might create indebtedness in violation of an act of Congress, issue bonds therefor, sell them to speculators, who, failing to collect in the courts, finally come and ask Congressional aid, to make legal such illegal issues. There is no telling where this may end.

Representatives of these bondholders pretend that they have found a precedent for this action in the Yankton County (Dak.) Case, found in 101 United States Reports, but, with all due respect, it is submitted that they are in no way or respect similar. In that case, the governor of the Territory of Dakota had called the legislature together in an extra session, in the year 1871, which was without authority of law. This legislature, among other things, passed an act authorizing the organization of a railroad company, and providing for the vote of bonds in aid thereof. Under this law Yankton County subscribed stock in a railroad and voted bonds in aid thereof. In 1872 Congress passed an act declaring all proceedings of such legislature void, except the one with reference to the issuing of bonds by Yankton County; that act it affirmed, adding certain provisions for the protection of the county for the bonds issued, but these bonds were not issued until after this Congressional act ratifying the action of the Territorial legislature, and placing safeguards upon the county subscription, so that the bonds at the time of their delivery were delivered in pursuance of an existing law made by Congress. Here, the bonds in question were issued, delivered, and sold in direct violation of the law, and nearly sixteen years afterwards, and after the Supreme Court had held that the issuance of such bonds was void, the owners come to Congress and ask for the passage of an act making valid void bonds issued in such direct violation of a law. There certainly can be no excuse for the issuance of the bonds of the Texas, Santa Fe and Northern Railroad in 1887, some months after the approval of the act of Congress, on July 30, 1880, which expressly provided that "no Territory, or any political or municipal corporation, or subdivision thereof, shall in any manner loan its credit to, or use it to the benefit of any company or association, or borrow any amount of money for the use of said company or association."

No language could be plainer than this, and yet, in violation of it, bonds were issued to the Texas, Santa Fe and Northern Railroad Company nearly six months after its adoption upon an election held only two days before said action by Congress.

Mr. HARRISON. Where does the gentleman from New Hampshire get the information he is now giving the House?

Mr. LOW. Will the gentleman please repeat his question so that the House can hear it?

Mr. HARRISON. I ask where the gentleman gets the information he is giving the House? These facts were not in evidence before the committee.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I get the information from the document I hold in my hand.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Is that the only authority the gentleman from New Hampshire has that these bonds were sold at 50 cents on the dollar in place of at par?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. No, sir; it is not the only authority. I have read the telegram to which I have referred, which states the fact.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Will the gentleman be kind enough to state the authority for the information he has given the House that they were sold at 50 cents on the dollar?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. If the gentleman had listened to what I said he would not have had occasion to ask the question.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I did not care about wasting my time.

Mr. LACEY. You do not suppose a newspaper would lie, do you? [Laughter.]

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Especially when it is an interested party.

Mr. POWERS. What was the original issue of the bonds and what is the amount sought to be validated? I understand the gentleman to claim that the amount has been increased in some improper manner.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The original amount authorized was $150,000, but through some kind of a hocus-pocus proceeding they have reached $250,000.

Mr. KNOX. If the gentleman from New Hampshire will permit me, that was made up of the accrued interest and the costs of the suit brought for the purpose of collecting the coupons. It was made up on the judgment of the court, and increased the amount to this extent.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The accrued interest is only about $50,000.

Mr. LACEY. There was a judgment in the first instance of $78,000 for accrued interest on $150,000, which amounted to $228,000, and the costs run it up to $250,000.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I hope I may be permitted to proceed without interruption; I should like to occupy the floor a little while.

Neither the gentleman from Iowa, the gentleman from Massachusetts, nor the gentleman from New York, nor anyone else has been able to show in any way how bonds which were void in the beginning can be found right subsequently.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PAYNE). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OWENS. I yield now five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, we have here presented the remarkable spectacle of the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER] making a determined fight in opposition to the validity of certain New Mexican bonds or obligations as against the Delegate from New Mexico, who wants them validated.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. LACEY. I will yield to the gentleman for one question.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Are there not some people in your immediate neighborhood who are interested in this matter, who own some of these bonds, and who are represented by you?

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, these bonds are held part in Iowa, part in Chicago, part in New York, and elsewhere. They are held by various people all over the country. They were issued for the purpose of refunding other bonds outstanding in that Territory. When they were originally issued under the law they were believed to be valid. The question of validity arose subsequently; the interest on the bonds was in default, and suit was brought upon them. That question went to the supreme court of the Territory of New Mexico, which court declared the bonds to be valid, and the legislature of that Territory passed a law authorizing the refunding of the bonds. And the gentlemen living around throughout the country, to whom my friend from New Hampshire refers as owning the bonds, furnished the money to pay for them; furnished and put good, honest money into these bonds.

The Delegate from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] asks that the bonds be validated and left unquestioned by an act of Congress. It is true that in the Lewis Case from Arizona a decision was rendered some years afterwards, which practically would affect the validity of these bonds. Whether it would do so as to bonds that had been once merged in judgment and that subsequently were reissued in the form of refunding bonds is a question that is not entirely clear; but the Territory of New Mexico prefers, through its Delegate in Congress—and he sends a written communication to that effect—that no question be raised against them, and that the fair faith of the Territory of New Mexico be upheld. Now, the newspaper that has been read, issued in Santa Fe last April, contains some very rash statements, and I am surprised to see my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER] relying so implicitly on what he finds in a newspaper. I am not inclined to accept a mere newspaper statement as against the solemn declaration of the gentleman who represents the Territory. If he is perpetrating a fraud upon his constituents in asking us to validate these bonds, his constituents will notify him of that fact next November. He takes his political life in his hand when he asks us to validate these bonds.

Mr. DOCKERY. Suppose they do? How will that leave us?

Mr. LACEY. How is it going to leave these men who have furnished this money if these bonds are not validated? I want to suggest that to my friend from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], because it is not likely that the gentleman, who lives there upon the spot and knows the situation, would make any representation that was not correct when he advocates this measure here in his official capacity upon the floor of this House. The gentleman who inspired this newspaper article was at one time governor of New Mexico, and he came here in person to fight these bonds. The Delegate said upon the floor of this House when the bill was before us some time ago that he thought some further time ought to be given, and asked that the House would not pass the bill at that time in order to enable him to communicate with his people. The House refused to pass the bill by a two-thirds vote at that time, but since then he has had ample time to communicate with his people, and he says in his letter that the people are satisfied. Let me call the attention of the House to the statement signed by Governor Prince and others when these bonds were first issued. The statement was in these words:

> We, the undersigned, members of the Santa Fe Board of Trade and taxpayers of Santa Fe County, respectfully represent that the issue of $150,000 in Santa Fe County bonds, issued in 1880 to aid in the construction of the Santa Fe, New Mexico and Southern Railroad, affords a safe and reliable investment. * * *

That is signed by L. Bradford Prince, the very gentleman who inspired this article in the newspapers and who contests these bonds.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. He was the governor of the Territory.

Mr. KNOX. Allow me to suggest that these bonds were certified to be good by the United States district attorney for the Territory.

Mr. LACEY. They were certified by many of the leading citizens of the Territory, by the Board of Trade of Santa Fe, and others. They voted these bonds four times before they could get anybody to take them.

Mr. KNOX. Five times.

Mr. LACEY. Five times. And the fifth time the bonds were issued the money was furnished and the railroad was built. After the Territorial supreme court had declared the bonds valid, they issued new bonds to take up and pay off the old bonds. Now, my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER] wants the bonds repudiated, in order that some gentlemen in the city of Boston, who have some bonds, may have the opportunity to get in on the ground floor with their own bonds, by having the Territory repudiate its honest debts to somebody else.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. OWENS. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. One minute.

Mr. OWENS. I yield that time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WATSON].

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I want to make just one statement in connection with this matter. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER] a moment ago said he did not think that any gentleman upon the floor of this House would vote to validate these bonds unless he had some personal friend who owned some of them. That is a very serious reflection upon gentlemen who constitute this House. I never heard of this transaction in my life until the gentleman rose to make his speech. I do not know anyone who has any money interest in these bonds, but I intend to vote to validate these obligations, because I believe them to be just.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that in his opinion two-thirds had voted in favor of the motion.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire and Mr. TERRY demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 65, noes 23.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire and Mr. TERRY made the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore proceeded to count the House.

Mr. HEPBURN (during the count). I make the point of order, on the counting of a quorum, that those members who enter the House after the announcement of the vote can not be counted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. On this question I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced a sufficient number in support of the demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LACEY demanded the other side.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 150, nays 48, not voting 161; as follows:

Mr. HULL with Mr. PATTERSON.

Mr. LEWIS with Mr. WASHINGTON.

Mr. MORSE with Mr. STALLINGS.

Mr. BARTHOLDT with Mr. LIVINGSTON.

Mr. BAKER of Maryland with Mr. FITZGERALD.

Mr. LEISENRING with Mr. SPENCER.

The SPEAKER. On this question the yeas are 150, the nays 43; two-thirds having voted in the affirmative, the rules are suspended, and the bill is passed.

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, I want to see if the record is right. I understand the record is that the bill was passed, while it was really to concur in the Senate amendment. The bill passed the House some time ago.

The SPEAKER. This is a House bill with a Senate amendment which the House has passed.

Mr. OWENS. It is just this way: It was a House bill with a Senate amendment, which the House committee passed with another amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill that the gentleman sent up is a House bill with a Senate amendment.

Mr. OWENS. The only question was whether the record read right. I know that it was the right bill.

The SPEAKER. It seems that the House has passed the same bill which the Senate passed, and the regular way in which to have passed it would have been to concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. OWENS. With an amendment.

The SPEAKER. With an amendment. And if there be no objection that will be considered as the action of the House.

Mr. KEM. I object.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is a House bill that has passed with a Senate amendment. That seems to meet the case.

The SPEAKER. The trouble is that the House has passed the bill with a Senate amendment and an amendment thereto.

Mr. OWENS. I move that the record be made to conform to the action of the House.

Mr. HENDERSON. The bill has passed with a Senate amendment and an amendment to that.

The SPEAKER. Will the Reporters have the kindness to give the Chair the statement made by the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. LACEY. The motion was to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the bill will have to be regarded as a House bill with a Senate amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON. We have just passed the House bill with a Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. With the Senate amendment amended.

Mr. OWENS. That is all I wanted.

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair that that was not the transaction of the House.

Mr. LACEY. That is the transaction as the House understood it.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, would it have been competent under this order of business to have taken up this bill and adopted the amendment of the Senate without unanimous consent?

Mr. OWENS. I moved to suspend the rules.

Mr. HENDERSON. For the purpose of passing the bill.

The SPEAKER. It would have been competent to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment under suspension of the rules.

Mr. LACEY. That is the effect.

The SPEAKER. It would have been competent to do that.

Mr. HENDERSON. It goes to the Senate as a House bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the action of the House ought to prevail, but of course can not control an individual member who may think otherwise.

Mr. OWENS. Would a motion to correct the record to that effect be in order?

The SPEAKER. The trouble is that the record has got to be corrected with reference to the facts. It can not be corrected to make the facts conform, but the gentleman can be recognized to make the proper motion.

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the House has passed the bill.

The SPEAKER. That can not be done; but the gentleman can now be recognized to make the proper motion.

Mr. OWENS. Then I move to suspend the rules and concur in the Senate amendment with the amendment proposed by the House committee.

The bill and amendments were read.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I object.

Mr. OWENS. I withdraw the motion to suspend the rules, Mr. Speaker.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

On May 28, 1896:

An act (H. R. 9030) declaring a certain bridge across the Tallahatchie River, in Tallahatchie County, State of Mississippi, a lawful structure, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. 8590) granting to the Denver, Cripple Creek and Southwestern Railroad Company a right of way for a railroad through the South Platte and Plum Creek forest reserves in the State of Colorado;

An act (H. R. 7324) to authorize and empower the State of South Dakota to select the Fort Sully Military Reservation in said State as a part of the lands granted to the State under the provisions of an act to provide for the admission of South Dakota into the Union, approved February 22, 1889, and for indemnity school lands, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. 3013) to amend section 4131 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to improve the merchant marine engineer service and thereby also to increase the efficiency of the Naval Reserve, and for other purposes;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 193) authorizing the Secretary of War to lend to the mayors of the cities of East St. Louis, Ill., and St. Louis, Mo., and vicinity, a number of tents; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 174) granting permission to the circuit and county courts in Rockingham County, Va., to occupy the Federal court room in Harrisonburg, Va.

On May 29, 1896:

An act (H. R. 4452) to amend section 416 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia.

On May 30, 1896:

An act (H. R. 515) granting a pension to William Grose;

An act (H. R. 2326) granting a pension to Thomas Holaday;

An act (H. R. 2844) granting a pension to Martha McNeil;

An act (H. R. 4712) granting a pension to Margaret A. Luthy;

An act (H. R. 5814) granting a pension to Cassie A. Davis, widow of James P. Davis and mother of Mary T. Davis, an invalid daughter;

An act (H. R. 5854) granting a pension to John Caster;

An act (H. R. 1181) for the relief of Maria E. Wilson;

An act (H. R. 483) for the relief of Mary Jane Lynn, the daughter of John R. Lynn, a Revolutionary soldier;

An act (H. R. 5140) for the relief of Michael H. J. Crouch, late of Company M, Sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Cavalry;

An act (H. R. 3426) granting a pension to Eugenia R. Sweeny, widow of Brig. Gen. Thomas W. Sweeny, deceased;

An act (H. R. 5226) to give increased pension to Gen. James C. Parrott;

An act (H. R. 485) for the relief of Kate Eberle, an Indian woman;

An act (H. R. 1001) to amend the military record of John S. Evans;

An act (H. R. 7816) for the relief of John S. Burwell, administrator of the estate of A. L. Burwell, deceased;

An act (H. R. 248) empowering and directing the Secretary of the Navy to furnish four pieces of condemned cannon to the city of Hastings, Mich.; and

An act (H. R. 6838) defining the standard shape and size for dry measures in use in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

On June 1, 1896:

An act (H. R. 4785) to incorporate the National University.

WILLIAM H. MAHONEY.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a message from the President of the United States, which the Clerk will read.

The message was read, as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I herewith return without approval House bill numbered 900, entitled "An act to provide for the payment of the claim of William H. Mahoney."

This bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to receive and pay to W. H. Mahoney, without the indorsement of N. A. Rogers, a certain bond issued by the United States in 1861 for the sum of $500, such payment to be made upon the giving by said Mahoney of a bond to hold harmless the United States against repayment of said bond.

The bond mentioned is one of a large issue which was authorized under an act passed March 2, 1861, and known as Oregon war-debt bonds. They were made payable in 1881.

In 1864 an act was passed directing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue or cause to be issued to E. F. and Samuel A. Ward duplicates of 19 of these bonds, particularly described by their numbers and otherwise. Among others are mentioned "Nos. 1352 to 1359, inclusive." This of course includes the bond numbered 1358, which is directed to be paid in the bill under consideration. Nothing can now be discovered to indicate the occasion for the issuance of these duplicates, but from the fact that a bond of indemnity was required it is inferred that they were issued because of the loss or destruction of the original bonds.

Pursuant to this act, a duplicate of the bond in question, among others, was issued and made payable to the order of Thomas Pritchard, attorney, who was the payee in the original bond.

In 1881 this duplicate was paid by the Treasury Department and is now in possession of the Government. The indorsement of the payee, "Thomas Pritchard, attorney," appears thereon, and all other proper indorsements to show title in the party to whom the payment was made.

The Government has therefore once paid the amount of this bond to the party apparently entitled to it. If the beneficiary named in this bill has a better right to the money, the Government, not being in default, should be protected against double payment. I suppose to sustain a claim upon the indemnity bond given when the duplicate was issued in 1864 we should be prepared to show that the second payment on the original bond was made upon such a state of facts as compelled or at least justified it. The passage of an act simply directing such payment would alone not be sufficient. The bond directed to be given by this bill would afford the Government no protection, since it only provides against repayment of the bond in the future, whereas the payment we should suffer from has already been made.

I suggest that an act be passed directing the Secretary of the Treasury to investigate the entire subject with a view of determining to whom this money should be paid, in a manner to bind, if possible, by the results of the examination the party to whom it has already been paid and who should refund if another has a better right.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 29, 1896.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, that is a bill that was introduced by my colleague, Mr. BARHAM. He is not present, but from conversation with him I know that he would wish to have it referred to the committee which considered the bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the message and accompanying bill will be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. KEM. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KEM].

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I move that the message and bill be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to; and the reference was made accordingly.

AMANDA WOODCOCK.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the President of the United States; which was read, as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 6087, entitled "An act granting a pension to Mrs. Amanda Woodcock."

The bill provides for the granting of a pension to the beneficiary therein named, describing her as the "widow of Robert Woodcock, deceased, late a private in the Fourth United States Volunteer Infantry in the Mexican war.

My action in this case is based upon the following statement concerning the bill from the Pension Bureau:

"The bill, if approved, would be inoperative, inasmuch as there was no such organization in the Mexican war as named in the bill (Fourth United States Volunteer Infantry), and the service alleged by the soldier having been in the Fourth Kentucky Volunteer Infantry.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 30, 1896.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the message and accompanying bill be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to, and the reference was made.

JONATHAN SCOTT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a message from the President of the United States; which was read, as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I herewith return without approval House bill No. 4536, entitled "An act granting a pension to Jonathan Scott."

This bill directs that the Secretary of the Interior place upon the pension roll, at the rate of $72 per month, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jonathan Scott, late of Company M, Sixth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Cavalry.

The beneficiary was dropped from the pension roll in October, 1895, after a very thorough examination for fraud, it appearing to the satisfaction of the Pension Bureau that the disability for which he was pensioned was not due to his army service. There certainly ought to be a strong presumption that the case was fairly and justly determined by the Bureau, and the evidence strongly tends to support the conclusion reached. If restored to the rolls, such restoration would still be "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws," and he would not be exempt from further investigation if circumstances or newly developed facts justified such a course.

Whatever may be the merits of the case, however, I am advised by the Pension Bureau that the bill, if it became a law in its present form, would be inoperative, for the reason that the beneficiary is therein described as having been a member of the Sixth Regiment of Iowa Volunteer Cavalry, whereas he actually served in the Fifth Regiment of the Volunteer Cavalry of that State.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 30, 1896.

Mr. ANDREWS. I move the reference of this message, with the accompanying bill, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CANNON. I rise to present a privileged report—the report of the committee of conference on the sundry civil appropriation bill. I ask that the statement of the House conferees may be read and that the reading of the conference report be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the statement will be read without the reading of the report.

Mr. KEM. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KEM] objecting, the conference report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7604) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 24, 25, 111, 112, 125, 126, 127, 128, and 129.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 10, 28, 91, 93, and 94; and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 23: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert "macadamizing"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 92: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 92, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$24,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference have been unable to agree on the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 8, 13, 15, 16, 17, 52, 61, 96, 97, 109, 122, 123, 124, 140, 141, 146, 147, and 161.

J. G. CANNON,
E. J. HAINER,
JOSEPH D. SAYERS,
Managers on the part of the House.

W. B. ALLISON,
EUGENE HALE,
A. P. GORMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The following statement of the House conferees was read:

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7664) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year 1897 submit the following written statement, in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report on each of said amendments, namely:

On No. 10: Appropriates $300 for bathroom and lavatory in the public building at Sioux Falls, S. Dak., as proposed by the Senate.

On Nos. 23, 24, and 25: Appropriates $8,950, as proposed by the House, instead of $7,450, as proposed by the Senate, for certain improvements of the marine hospital at Chicago.

On No. 28: Appropriates $20,000, as proposed by the Senate, for range-light stations in Sandusky Bay, Ohio.

On Nos. 91, 92, and 93: Appropriates $24,000, instead of $13,000, as proposed by the House, and $26,000 as proposed by the Senate, for lighting the Capitol and Capitol Grounds, and $45,000, as proposed by the Senate, for extension of electric-light plants in the Capitol and to the grounds about the Capitol.

On No. 94: Appropriates $55,000, as proposed by the Senate, for ventilation of the Senate wing of the Capitol.

On Nos. 111 and 112: Strikes out the appropriation of $5,000 proposed by the Senate for editing documents relating to the war of the Revolution.

On Nos. 125, 126, 127, 128, and 129: Appropriates for electric lights on the grounds south of the Executive Mansion, and in Lafayette, Franklin, Judiciary, and Lincoln parks, at the prices per lamp as proposed by the House.

The committee of conference have been unable to agree on the following amendments, namely:

On Nos. 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 8, 13, 15, 16, and 17, relating to public buildings, as follows:

Boise City, Idaho, increasing limit of cost from $150,000 to $200,000, and appropriating $50,000;

Camden, N. J., increasing limit and appropriating $25,000;

Cheyenne, Wyo., increasing limit from $150,000 to $250,000, and appropriating $50,000;

Fortress Monroe, Va., for post-office building, $15,000;

Helena, Mont., increasing limit from $150,000 to $300,000, and appropriating $50,000;

Kansas City, Mo., increasing limit from $1,200,000 to $1,316,000;

Omaha, Nebr., appropriating $100,000, instead of $70,000, as proposed by the House;

St. Paul, appropriating $125,000, instead of $60,000, as proposed by the House;

Savannah, Ga., increasing limit $100,000, and appropriating $25,000; and

Salt Lake City, Utah, appropriating $75,000 for site and commencement of building.

On amendment numbered 52, appropriating $15,000 for a light-house on Swan Island, in the Caribbean Sea.

On amendment numbered 61, appropriating $250,000 for an additional fireproof building for the use of the National Museum.

On amendment numbered 96, increasing the appropriation for surveys and resurveys of public lands from $350,000 to $400,000.

On amendment numbered 97, relating to the reclamation of arid lands.

On amendment numbered 109, appropriating $35,000 to enable the Government to take part in the International Exposition at Brussels, Belgium.

On amendments numbered 122, 123, and 124, relating to the price to be paid for gas lamps in the public grounds.

On amendments numbered 140 and 141, relating to the improvement of the Columbia River.

On amendments numbered 146 and 147, relating to the support and medical treatment of destitute patients and to the Providence and Garfield hospitals.

On amendment numbered 161, relating to the disbursement of appropriations for the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

J. G. CANNON,
JOSEPH D. SAYERS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The question being taken, the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. CANNON. I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendments still in controversy, and ask a further conference with the Senate.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I ask a separate vote on Senate amendment numbered 3, on which I desire to move concurrence.

The SPEAKER. The question will be put on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], excepting amendment numbered 3.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read amendment numbered 3.

The Clerk read as follows:

For public building at Camden, N. J.: For construction of building, $25,000; and the limit of cost of said building is increased $125,000.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I move that the House recede from its disagreement and concur in the amendment.

The motion was not agreed to; there being—ayes 33, noes 64.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment numbered 3, and ask a conference with the House thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House further insisted on its disagreement to Senate amendments and asked a conference with the Senate thereon was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint the former conferees.

LABOR COMMISSION.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I move a suspension of the rules for the consideration and passage of House bill No. 9188.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9188) authorizing the appointment of a nonpartisan commission to collate information and to consider and recommend legislation to meet the problems presented by labor, agriculture, and capital.

Whereas many of those engaged in the various fields of labor and also many of those engaged in agricultural pursuits are organized and, together with those engaged in commerce, are presenting grievances to Congress and to the various State governments, seeking and demanding legislation in their behalf: Now, therefore, in order to give a hearing and to meet the requirements of this large number of citizens,

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to appoint a commission, to be called the "industrial commission," composed as follows: Three men representative of labor, three men representative of agriculture, three men representative of manufacturing, and three men representative of business. A majority of this commission shall not belong to any one of the political parties which took part in the last Presidential election. The President shall have the power to remove any member of said commission for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance, or for any other reason duly set forth.

SEC. 2. That each division of three shall have the right to employ one legal adviser, whose compensation shall be the same as hereinafter provided for a member of the commission, and one secretary, at a salary of $200 per month; the commission shall convene in the city of Washington, D. C., within sixty days after its appointment, and shall organize by the selection of one of its members as president, who shall designate from time to time one of the secretaries provided for in this section to act as secretary of the commission. The president and officers shall be chosen by a majority vote of the commission, and may be removed from office at any time by a vote of two-thirds of the commission; the president shall serve for such term as the commission may determine; a majority of the commission shall determine the composition of its standing committees and their duties, and shall appoint any subcommissions that may be required as provided for in section 5, and committees and subcommissions shall report to the commission. The commission shall have power to make such rules as it may deem necessary for carrying out the purposes of this act.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of this commission to investigate questions pertaining to immigration, to labor, to agriculture, to manufacturing, and to business and to recommend to Congress such legislation as it may deem best upon these subjects.

SEC. 4. That it shall furnish such information and suggest such laws as may be made a basis for uniform legislation by the various States of the Union, in order to harmonize conflicting interests and to be equitable to the laborer, the employer, the producer, and the consumer.

SEC. 5. That the commission shall receive petitions and other papers on subjects pertaining to its duties and give reasonable time for hearings, if deemed necessary, and if necessary it may appoint a subcommission or commissions of its members to make investigation in any part of the United States, and it shall be allowed actual necessary expenses for the same. It shall have the authority to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths or affirmations. All necessary expenses, including reading clerk, shorthand reporters, messengers, rent for place of meeting, furniture and fixtures, and printing and stationery shall be allowed; however, not to exceed $50,000 per annum for expenditures under this section.

SEC. 6. That it may report from time to time to the President of the United States, and shall at the conclusion of its labors submit a final report.

SEC. 7. That the term of the commission shall be two years. The salary of each member of this commission shall be $5,000 per annum and actual traveling expenses from the home of each commissioner to Washington and return once each year.

SEC. 8. That any vacancies occurring in the commission by reason of death, disability, or from any other cause, shall be filled by appointment of the President of the United States.

SEC. 9. That a sum sufficient to carry out the provisions of this act is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded on the motion to suspend the rules?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire that a second be considered as ordered?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

Mr. KEM. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KEM]. The gentleman from New York, Mr. BARTLETT, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. PHILLIPS, will please take their places as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 122, noes 1.

So a second was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PHILLIPS] is recognized to control twenty minutes, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] the same amount of time.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I reserve my time for the present.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, my object in demanding a second was to obtain the opportunity to criticise certain provisions of this bill from the standpoint of a lawyer and from a constitutional point of view. This bill being brought up to-day in this peculiar manner, under a motion to suspend the rules, every member, no matter how earnest and ardent he may be in the interest of labor, is denied opportunity to suggest any amendments. As gentlemen are well aware, no amendment is now in order. So this bill, different in form from the original bill—different from the bill as amended a few days ago on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania—this bill revamped comes up for consideration without any member having had any opportunity in advance to read it. I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that the members of this House are afraid even to criticise a bill which comes to the House in the name of the labor interests of the country. But I shall indicate, sir, two objections, of a constitutional nature, which I consider are serious, and so serious as to demand that this bill should not be passed.

Bear in mind that when the labor organizations of this country recommended such a bill it was not the bill now before the House. It was a bill proposed in the Fifty-third Congress, some time in the year 1894. We have had no opportunity to examine that bill to-day, and I call your attention to the fact that one of the labor organizations in recommending that bill conditioned its approval of it upon strict economy in expenditure. What is the case in regard to this bill? You give each of the 13 members of your composite committee $5,000 a year, and you also provide that there shall be four legal advisers—an entirely unnecessary expenditure. I certainly, Mr. Speaker, should advocate at all proper times the interests of the bar. But on this occasion I see no necessity whatever for legal advisers; hence there is a clear waste of $20,000 per annum in this one item. You also provide a number of clerks, at the salary fixed in the bill, amounting in the aggregate to $9,600 for the two years, and further $50,000 per annum in the way of general expenditures, making the sum total for the two years $279,200 as carried by the bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the first objection to the bill is that it provides that the members of the commission shall be appointed by the President of the United States alone. If we take the test of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, going back to the case of The United States vs. Hartwell, in 1867, reported in 6 Wallace, and continued in the Germaine case of eleven years later, and in the latest case, The United States vs. Monat, decided in 1887, you will find certain rules are laid down as to what constitutes an office. It is laid down by the Supreme Court that the indicia are duration, tenure, emoluments, and duties, and you find in the ideas in this particular case under consideration appertaining to the functions of these officials all the indicia of a United States officer.

Now, if they are superior officers, they must be appointed, under our Constitution, by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. If they are inferior officers, by the President, or the head of a Department, or by the courts alone. But no one will contend, when it is remembered that even a second lieutenant or an officer of inferior rank in the Army or Navy is dependent for his appointment on the confirmation of the Senate—no one will maintain that one of these commissioners is not an officer of high rank in the constitutional sense, and hence that his appointment must not be confirmed by the Senate. Now, appoint your men on that commission, but beware lest they never be paid their salaries, lest after serving two years and applying for their salaries the Supreme Court of the United States shall decide that they were officers of the United States and had been appointed in violation of the Federal Constitution.

Now, what is the other objection? It is that by the Constitution of 1787 all legislative powers are vested in the Congress of the United States. If this had been an act providing for the appointment of a commission to collate or take evidence as to strikes, lockouts, and so on, or the interests of capital as opposed to labor, I should say well and good. I should gladly support such a measure. But here is a proposition to delegate the legislative powers of Congress—that is, to delegate the powers of suggestion, with a mandatory force almost equal to that of Congress—to a body of 13 men who are to consider the whole subject-matter of legislation upon the subjects involved. And I say that there, gentlemen, you violate one of the first principles of the Federal Constitution, the principle of the tripartite division of power into the executive, legislative, and judicial branches. And if you read the Constitution of the United States you will find that Article I, section 1, provides that—

> All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States.

And yet to-day you are about to advertise yourselves to the people of this country, far and wide, as incapable of legislation. You have your great Committee on Ways and Means, your committees on Immigration, on Labor, on Banking and Currency, on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, on every civil relation of the Government, and yet you propose to say to the people of the United States that we, the members of the Fifty-fourth Congress, have not the brain power, we have not the knowledge, the experience, or the capacity to legislate for the people of the United States, and desire now, at the end of the nineteenth century, to abdicate our powers and to delegate them to a tribunal composed of twelve men.

Why, I say, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, that this is a most unconstitutional attempt to exercise the powers of the Government. I say you have no right, taking in view the fact that the only ones to be considered are the people of this country—the electors of this country—on the one hand and we, their Representatives, on the other, to abdicate your powers. They give us certain powers by electing us and sending us to Congress. The Federal Constitution gave us other powers to which the people at large consented; but nobody has ever yet voted in favor of such a change of the Federal Constitution as that which you practically will inaugurate to-day. Legislative powers are vested in the Senate and the House of Representatives. These powers from 1787 have been exercised by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will my friend permit me? I have been listening to what he has said—that there is something in this bill which gives to this commission legislative powers. I have read the bill very carefully. I have seen nothing of that kind in it. This commission may inquire into and investigate certain problems relating to labor, immigration, etc., and may recommend, may suggest to those who have the legislative power, any propositions of legislation or otherwise, that may seem to them desirable for the promotion of these great interests. Where is there anything in that bill to vest in this commission legislative powers? This is a mere commission of parliament, which Great Britain has created over and over again, and which we have created. We have a Labor Commissioner, who suggests legislation. I do not see anything in this bill which goes beyond that, as I have read it.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the distinguished gentleman from Maine, to whom I am always glad to listen, because his suggestions are always full of point and interest, let me say that if we do not violate the letter of the Federal Constitution we violate its spirit. Let me call the attention of the distinguished gentleman from Maine to the decisions of the courts in our various States, where the judges have said if the general legislative power can not be delegated with propriety to an individual it can not be delegated to communities or to the electors of the whole State.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is there any delegation of legislative power in this bill? I do not find anything of the sort.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I say that it violates the spirit of the Federal Constitution. It was intended by those great men who met at Philadelphia in 1787 that the only suggestions as to legislation should come from the people at large. Now, you give this special body of twelve men a standing between the people who have sent you here and yourselves, their representatives. If you do not give them the absolute power to legislate, you give them power to investigate on all these questions. With what intent and purpose? That their suggestions shall have a certain degree of force, be it more or less binding. I should agree with the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] if this bill were only to investigate questions of the relations of capital and labor, that is, as concerned in lockouts and strikes. That might be a pertinent and proper subject of investigation, to hold hearings, and to report the evidence taken to this body, in order that we might be guided in the future; but it is wrong to write ourselves down as incompetent, and to relegate to this commission questions pertaining to immigration, as to which we have just passed a bill, with full enlightenment from the distinguished gentleman from Missouri, the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, and the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts. You have passed your immigration bill. What more need of inquiry? Then as to labor, let that pass, if that were the only question. But you go further, and say all questions as to agriculture and all questions as to business. The last, Mr. Speaker, covers nearly every field of inquiry as to which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] is regarded by a large part of this country as the highest exponent and the most worthy legislator.

Mr. Speaker, I speak in the true interests of American labor. I am in favor of and I shall always advocate the true interests of the laboring man, of the mechanic, the artisan, and the agriculturist. I do not, for one, understand the subdivision, which must be new and artificial, between labor and agriculture. That is a division which would hold that the man who follows the plow is not embraced in the ordinary ranks of labor, but that the railway conductor is. Now, can it be said—and I ask the distinguished gentleman from Maine—that when you pass a bill authorizing the appointment of a nonpartisan commission to collate information and to consider and recommend legislation, to meet the problems presented by labor, agriculture, and capital, that the recommendations of this commission, inchoate to-day but probably springing full into being a week hence, shall have no force with this body? Can you say that they shall have no binding effect to any extent whatsoever? Does the gentleman maintain for one moment that if that commission recommends various schemes of legislation we shall be as free as we are to-day? No, there will stand another body, another armed force, between us and our constituents, a force which shall say, "Vote in accordance with these measures which we recommend or be relegated forever to political obscurity."

Mr. LOW. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. In a moment, before I have finished. Now, I maintain, gentlemen, that this bill is unconstitutional for the reasons which I have indicated. In the first place, because the appointments of the commissioners will be made without the advice and consent of the Senate, and that therein we trench upon the constitutional powers of the other body of our legislature; but beyond and above that, that the fundamental principle of the Federal Constitution that each and every measure of legislation shall come through Congress alone and through the people, by their representatives in Congress, is violated; that an attempt to form a new legislative body violates at least the spirit and intent, if not the letter, of the Federal Constitution.

Why, sir, if you go back to the formative period of American history and consider the body which led up to the convening of the Federal convention in 1787, when you consider the Annapolis convention of 1786—if I mistake not, only four of the eight colonies called upon were represented—you will find it was to be the function of that body before we had any real government, before we had any Federal Constitution, to suggest legislation.

This object which you provide for in your bill to-day might be all very well if we had not been existing with a written Constitution for the last century and more; but I appeal to you, gentlemen, do not pass this bill which will say to the people of the United States we are not competent to legislate for them at large. Do not pass such a bill because one or two gentlemen, representatives of labor organizations, said that they believed in a bill which was before us in 1894. This is a serious matter. The people of this country will not regard with favor any attempt on our part, their chosen representatives, to abdicate our functions.

Mr. LOW. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Certainly.

Mr. LOW. Is it not a fact that the Venezuela Commission was appointed by the President for the specific purpose of obtaining information, and that the members of that Commission were not appointed subject to the approval of the Senate?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. In answer to the gentleman from New York, I will state that I believe that the Venezuela Commission was appointed for the purpose of acquiring information; but that Commission was not appointed, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of suggesting legislation or recommending legislation to the Congress of the United States. As to the other point, I call the attention of the gentleman from New York to the indicia to office, as laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States—duties and emoluments, tenure and duration. That Commission is a temporary commission; but this commission, lasting as it will for a fixed and definite period of two years, carries with it, perforce, the ideas of duration and tenure.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, this is what is known as the "labor bill," reported from the Committee on Labor; and I rise to support it as a lawyer and as a laboring man. [Laughter and applause.]

My friend from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] criticises the bill because of the way that it is brought in. It was introduced on the first day of this Congress, and was reported to the House on the 15th day of February, so that the bill and the able report thereon have long been in our possession. On the 23d of this month this bill, with certain amendments, was introduced, which is the bill to be voted upon now—the only changes made cut down the number of the officials—so that everyone is familiar with this bill, and the original bill has been discussed most ably by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PHILLIPS].

Now, it is simply this: It creates a commission, consisting of three representatives of labor, three representatives of agriculture, three representatives of manufactures, and three representatives of general business. They are each paid $5,000 a year, and each of these groups is to be aided by a legal adviser, who is to be paid the same amount. This makes the total annual salaries $80,000, the object being to bring into one council chamber the representatives of all the great interests of the country. That in itself is argument enough for me to support it. In reply to my friend from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] I say that we abdicate nothing; we abdicate no power of Congress. We have it in our power to pass a law, with the help of the Senate, which shall make the officers to be confirmed with the advice of the Senate or not as we choose. We are the lawmaking power.

When it comes to getting information, notwithstanding the high attainments of the distinguished gentleman from New York, I have never been so much convinced as within the last twenty minutes of the necessity for more information for the benefit of lawmakers. [Laughter and applause.]

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that we may be able lawyers—some may be able doctors, some may be able preachers—but if we can have recommendations to this body coming from the labor interests, the great agricultural interests, and the great manufacturing interests, and representing general business, we will all get information that will be a surprise to most of us. I say to you, talk not of the $80,000 per annum. This commission in its counsels, in my judgment, will avert clashes between the great industrial interests of this country. It will prevent strikes and struggles. Where a million dollars will be saved in a single hour, why talk of your $80,000?

The gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] refers to the expense of this commission. What is the expense? This bill provides for twelve commissioners at $5,000 per annum each and one lawyer for each group, at the same rate of compensation, making a total annual expense for salaries of $80,000. To provide for this is in my judgment great economy, and is called for by the conditions of the country. It will prevent great loss and expense by bringing the great interests of this country into close and cordial consultation, and I believe that recommendations will come from this commission which, when enacted into laws, will save our people millions of dollars.

Let me make a brief quotation from the able report of Mr. PHILLIPS on the cost of strikes:

That our relations are most intimately bound up with the wage earner is shown by the many strikes and lockouts in recent years, which have entailed great suffering and loss of property, as well as the sacrifice of life. Upon this subject of strikes we desire to state that the Hon. Carroll D. Wright, Commissioner of Labor, in his third annual report submitted the results of an extensive investigation as to strikes and lockouts in the United States from 1880 to 1886. It will be seen by an examination of this summary that during the years named (1881 to 1885, both inclusive) there were 3,902 strikes in the United States.

There were 22,304 establishments and more than 1,727,273 employees involved.

It will be seen also by this report that—

The loss to the strikers for the period of six years was	$51,814,723
Loss to the employees by reason of lockouts	8,157,717
Loss to employers of labor	34,163,814
Amount of assistance to strikers by contribution	4,430,595
Total loss in the six years	98,566,859

These figures represent the actual loss to the parties engaged, and do not represent the enormous loss which incidentally came to the community by reason of such disturbances.

The facts and figures of the last few years in regard to strikes and lockouts are not fully accessible. They are recent history and are still more appalling than those given. One writer has estimated the loss caused by strikes in 1894 at $80,000,000. Others estimate it as high as $100,000,000.

What is the cost of this commission in the face of these figures? If we are going into this matter, let us do it right and make such provisions as will secure the services of the very best men.

The Interstate Commerce Commission is paid $7,500 each annually. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia get $5,000 each. The Dawes Indian Commission get $5,000 each, and the same rate was paid to the Utah Commission. In my opinion this is a more important commission than either of these. This commission should rank in point of ability with Senators and Representatives in Congress, and should receive as much compensation. The abler the men the more valuable will be their recommendations. Do not haggle over the expense in the face of the mighty interests involved.

But the wisdom of creating such a commission is called in question. Mr. Speaker, "the world moves," and the lawmaker that closes his eyes and heart to the growing needs of this world, and especially of this country, will soon be left at home, and ought to be. Labor and its associates, agriculture and manufacturing, are growing with modern civilization in importance, and their relations must be studied for their good and the good of the whole people. The spirit of the age is calling for statistics touching these great interests. In proof of this I again quote from the report of the Committee on Labor of the House:

Labor statistical bureaus are of recent origin, and were first established in the United States—the first one in Massachusetts in 1869. They have since been established in 32 of our States. The first Commissioner of Labor, the Hon. Carroll D. Wright, was appointed under the General Government in 1885. The English royal labor commission was appointed by royal warrant dated April 21, 1891, and is composed of 27 members. The fifth and final report of this commission was made to both houses of Parliament in June, 1894. The German commission of labor statistics was appointed in 1891, and it consists of 14 members, 168 civil servants, and 64 assistants. The higher council of labor was established in France in 1891. It consists of 50 members, chosen from among manufacturers, workingmen, and persons well informed upon economic and social questions. The Belgian higher council of labor was appointed in 1892. It consists of 48 members, chosen in equal numbers from workingmen, employers, and specialists in economic science.

Let the American Congress keep pace with the spirit of the age and seek for all possible light affecting these great and growing interests.

I say to this House that the labor interests and the agricultural interests of this country with united voice ask for the passage of this bill, and I am sorry that a lawyer from the great Empire State should rise and antagonize it. Let us with one voice vote for it. I hope my friend from New York will join us—I believe he will, because I see his face mellowing up with a kindly disposition. [Laughter.] Let us obey the mandates, the prayers, of all these great interests, and dedicate this petty sum to try to bring together all the great interests of this country and give us all the light that is possible before we legislate. [Applause.]

Mr. PHILLIPS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York stated with great distinctness and deliberation, as he usually makes statements, that he proposed to criticise this bill from the standpoint of a lawyer. I beseech the House to take that part of the gentleman's statement, whether by reason or by courtesy, as a matter of fact, and to assume that he did criticise it as a lawyer, and that he has said against it from that standpoint all that is to be said.

The gentleman seemed concerned because the Senate of the United States is not to confirm the members of this commission. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I take it that the Senate has the capacity to take care of itself and of the Constitution in that regard. Secondly, the view of the gentleman that that is necessary is but a part of that error which makes him set down the creation of this commission as at least an attempt on the part of Congress to create these commissioners officers of the United States possessing legislative power. I admit that the gentleman is great on the Constitution. I admit that he began somewhere this side of where the lamented Webster left off, and that he is far ahead of the most advanced stage of that great lamented expounder of the Constitution, when he discovers that there is great danger that the Congress of the United States is going to get information from an unconstitutional source. [Laughter.] If there is a suggestion in the gentleman's argument when analyzed, if there is anything left, it is that Congress is going to find an unconstitutional source from which to get information for legislation.

Now, I do not wonder—I would not wonder, I prefer to say—if some gentleman should conceive the notion that it was entirely unconstitutional to proceed to investigate questions pertaining to statesmanship outside of the area of their own horizon, but as to the great majority of this body, I trust and believe that that is not true. Mr. Speaker, nobody denies or will deny that there are in our society great questions at issue; nobody denies or will deny that there are looming above the political horizon social and political problems of mighty moment. They are neither timid nor inconsiderate people who believe that it may be possible that if society does not proceed to solve those problems, they, by and by, may proceed to solve society. If the gentleman from New York, or anybody else, would suggest a better method of meeting these questions than to appoint a commission that represents as nearly, I take it, the main interests involved——

Mr. LINNEY. Why should not this House, by a change of its rules, appoint a new committee and place the distinguished gentleman from Iowa, General HENDERSON, at the head of it, and thus get all the information by a committee of this House that could possibly be obtained by the expensive process proposed in this bill?

Mr. GARDNER. I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that the great mass of the people who are interested in the solution of these problems, finding a commission so constituted, would believe that there was about as much politics involved in its make-up as there appears to be in the questions propounded and the suggestions made in opposition to this bill.

Mr. LINNEY. But would not a committee be less open to that objection than a commission to be appointed by the President, who himself represents politics at white heat?

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to consume time in a discussion as to whether the President of the United States, upon an occasion like this, may or may not rise above petty partisan considerations and appoint a commission such as the country has a right to expect at the hands of the Chief Magistrate. I was about to say that this commission will represent the interests involved in most of the disputes that now arise in the business of the country. They will come together, and they must and will seek to reconcile their differences. They will be free from political bias and party bickering. They will have faith in the sincerity of each other, and the public in all of them. If they agree, perplexing problems will be solved. If they can not agree, they and the world will understand why, and whether there is an "irrepressible conflict." That there are problems none will deny; that they will be solved without effort nobody believes. To pass and put into operation this bill is, in my opinion, an imperative duty of the hour.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BELKNAP].

Mr. BELKNAP. Mr. Speaker, I will consume but a few minutes of the time of the House in which to express my earnest advocacy of the passage of this measure. Some seem to think that strikes and disorders of like character are always occasioned by the impetuosity or unwise acts of labor. I deny this to be the fact. All fair-minded citizens, upon reflection, must admit that often capital is oppressive and unjust, and therefore at fault; and remember, gentlemen, labor does not ask for charity; all it wants is justice.

Under our form of government all men are equal before the law, but when we recall the frequent occurrence of strikes, lockouts, and similar events, causing suffering and distress to many, we can not but conclude that often misunderstanding exists between the employer and the employee, or that there is frequently oppression and injustice. Therefore, it is our highest duty as the immediate representatives of the people, honored as we are by their suffrages with seats in this branch of our chief legislative body, to adopt such measures as will do away with this unfortunate condition of affairs. This can not be done without a careful consideration of the interests of all. The facts must all be weighed in an unselfish, thoughtful manner, so that a fair and just conclusion may be reached.

The appointment of the "industrial commission," as authorized by this bill, I believe, will accomplish this most desirable end. Composed, as it will be, of competent representatives of labor, of agriculture, of manufacturing, and of business, all sides may have a full hearing and all interests carefully weighed, and as a result proper legislation for the remedying of existing evils may be recommended.

This measure has received the earnest attention of able men, fully competent to come to a wise and proper decision upon such matters, and it has their unanimous recommendation.

By referring to the third annual report of the Hon. Carroll D. Wright, Commissioner of Labor, we find the results of an extensive investigation as to strikes and lockouts in the United States. It shows that during the years named (1881 to 1886, both inclusive) 3,902 strikes occurred in our free and grand Republic. Establishments to the number of 22,504 and more than 1,323,203 employees were involved. The report also shows that—

The loss to the strikers for the period of six years was	$51,814,723
Loss to the employees by reason of lockouts	8,157,717
Loss to employers of labor	34,163,814
Amount of assistance to strikers by contribution	4,430,595
Total loss in the six years	98,566,850

These figures, which I take from the report of the House of Representatives Committee on Labor, in connection with the bill we are considering, show the losses in dollars and cents; but, gentlemen, I ask you to reflect upon the fact of how insignificant and inconsequential are these losses in comparison with the heartaches, the distress, and sorrow brought about by these unfortunate occurrences. Think of the sorrowing wife, the suffering children, the heartbroken father; hunger and want staring in the face him and his; and all this unhappiness brought about by the selfishness of some, or on account of unfortunate misunderstandings between man and man; all occurring right here in our own prolific land, filled with plenty, and where none who are worthy should ever want. Answer by your votes if it is not high time that we, the people's servants, should act, and at once, and afford a proper method of relief.

Further, Mr. Speaker, all will recall the fact that since 1886, the last year covered by the report of the Commissioner of Labor, heretofore referred to, strikes have occurred greater and more distressing than those mentioned in the period named. Aye, sir; something must be done without delay to right this hurtful and unhappy condition ofaffairs.

The investigation of the questions involved must be made in a nonpartisan manner. This bill requires that a majority of the commission shall not belong to any one of the political parties. Therefore it meets that most necessary requirement.

Mr. Speaker, as members of this body we have considered varied and important questions, but none of which concerns more closely the welfare of the Republic and the happiness of its people than the one now before us. This bill brings together the chosen representatives of capital and of labor, in the same room, around the same table, where the needs of all may be carefully considered; where the interests of all may be discussed. It harmonizes these conflicting elements. Instead of pulling against each other they will pull together. Instead of working as enemies they will act as friends. What better method could we adopt, Mr. Speaker? This bill has the hearty approval of every labor organization in the land. It is a fair and just measure, and we owe it to the bone and sinew of our country that it should be passed.

I ask you, gentlemen, to bear in mind the fact that the Union of the States was preserved by the men who guided the plow, who swung the hammer, who pulled the throttle, or followed some other worthy avocation in the ranks of labor. To the heroism and self-sacrifice of the laboring man capital owes the preservation of the best form of government ever known to man.

Some seem to think that patriotism is dying out, that love of country is diminishing; but, Mr. Speaker, this can not be. On the heathered hills of Scotland the sword of Wallace is yet a bright tradition. The genius of France, in its brilliant literature of the day, still pays its high tribute to the young Maid of Orleans. On the mountains and in the valleys of the picturesque Republic of Switzerland the story of William Tell is still rehearsed and his memory most highly honored. The sons of the Fatherland still love the country through which runs the lovely Rhine. And the sons of the Emerald Isle still cherish the records of her heroes and are loyal to her cause. And here in our own fair land, if at any time our country should be in trouble; if at any time our free Republic should be attacked by some monarch from across the sea, the so-called laboring man would be the first to respond to a call; to see to it that the principles represented by the Stars and Stripes, the dearest flag that waves, always triumph.

Mr. Speaker, the signs of the times are auspicious; the return to power of the party of protection is assured. Then will the worthy unemployed be given the work of which they have been deprived by an unjust and uncalled-for free-trade policy.

Therefore, gentlemen, pass this bill and give to all right and justice, and thus take a grand step forward toward that happy epoch of "peace on earth, good will toward men." [Loud applause.]

Mr. PHILLIPS. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOWE].

Mr. HOWE. Mr. Speaker, to my mind this bill is one of the most important that has come up for consideration before this House. It has for its object the bringing about of a better understanding between capital and labor, and therefore I am in favor of its passage. Any legislation that has for its object the bringing about of a better understanding between capital and labor should commend itself to our most earnest thought, for it concerns the enlargement of our internal commerce and the enrichment and happiness of 70,000,000 people. This bill has the support of labor organizations throughout the country, and the fact that not a single board of trade or commercial or manufacturing organization has protested against its passage shows that it will be acceptable to all classes of our citizens, and will go far toward solving the vexed questions that so often arise between capital and labor.

It will be far-reaching in solving the problem as to the conditions that attain in all parts of this country, in Europe, and throughout the world, and, Mr. Speaker, not the least of its achievements will be to put a quietus upon the traffic in human labor as now practiced through the importation of foreign paupers; men who are bartered and sold like cattle, men who are imported by unscrupulous demagogues to compete with and degrade American labor. These foreign paupers are not immigrants; they do not come here to stay; they do not intend to make this country their home; they are scavengers; they are antagonistic to American institutions; they are as clay in the hands of the potter, and are guided by their demagogic slave owners and are only here to steal from the fruits of honest toil.

The passage of this bill will blot out this inhuman traffic in foreign pauper labor. It will also be an eye opener to the next Congress in placing the bars of protection high enough in the interests of American labor so that it will not have to compete with unfavorable conditions in Italy, Japan, and India, for, Mr. Speaker, this commission will show that the conditions that attain in this country will not compare with those in lands that are but now emerging from the dark-lantern ages of the middle century. The characteristics, results, and fruits of civilization can not be brought to the low level of ignorance and poverty without suffering loss. It will show that values here are established on quite a different basis, and that they can not be brought to the low level and conditions that exist in countries that are only now, in the beginning of the twentieth century, emerging from barbarism without bringing depreciation, stagnation, and general demoralization upon the business and labor interests of our country, for, Mr. Speaker, in proportion as we still the hammer and the chisel by foreign pauper labor, in proportion as we silence the wheels of industry, so in proportion do we breed discontent and unrest among the masses of our countrymen.

In conclusion, allow me to say that in my humble opinion the enactment of this bill will go far toward bringing all lines of business and labor to an intelligent understanding with each other, so that all will share in the general prosperity of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Speaker, I now call for a vote.

The question was taken on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill; and two-thirds voting in favor thereof, it was agreed to.

JUDICIAL ADMINISTRATION IN THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. CULBERSON. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4154) to amend section 9 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of additional judges of the United States court in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes."

Be it enacted, etc., That section 9 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of additional judges of the United States court in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," approved March 1, 1895, be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 9. That the United States court in the Indian Territory shall have jurisdiction of all offenses committed in said Territory of which the United States court in the Indian Territory now has jurisdiction, and shall have such original jurisdiction of civil cases as is now vested in the United States court in the Indian Territory, and appellate jurisdiction of all cases tried before said commissioners acting as justices of the peace where the amount of the judgment exceeds $20: Provided, That the United States courts now held in Arkansas, Kansas, and Texas, outside of the limits of the Indian Territory, shall have, retain, and possess their present jurisdiction as to offenses in said Indian Territory, as defined by law, and that all laws heretofore enacted conferring jurisdiction upon said United States courts held in Arkansas, Kansas, and Texas, outside of the limits of the Indian Territory, over the offenses aforesaid committed in the Indian Territory, and not in conflict with the provisions of this act, be, and the same are hereby, reenacted and continued in full force and effect: Provided further, That every case, civil or criminal, pending in the United States court in the Indian Territory shall be tried and disposed of by the court where the same is pending unless the venue therein be changed as herein provided."

SEC. 2. That all laws and parts of laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second, but I am willing to consider a second as ordered if there be no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. KEM. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KEM]. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] will act as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 108, noes 2.

So a second was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] is recognized.

Mr. CULBERSON. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, Doubtless the House is aware that for more than twenty years the Federal court at Fort Smith, Ark., has exercised jurisdiction in the Indian country. Later that jurisdiction was divided between that court and the court at Paris, Tex. In 1889 there was a court established, an inferior court, in the Indian country. Later on, during the last session of Congress, that court was increased to three judges, and it was provided in the bill that the jurisdiction at Fort Smith, Ark., and at Paris, Tex., should cease from the 1st of September, 1896. As a member of Congress at that time I voted for that bill, hoping that it might be sufficient to accommodate the business of that country and protect the lives of the people. But the record of the courts in that country show that they are wholly unable to transact the business. The fact is, as gentlemen here have doubtless learned, that in the Indian Territory crime has increased very materially in the last year, and the relations between the whites and the Indians in many parts of the country are becoming daily more strained. This bill simply seeks to continue the outside jurisdiction until the conditions are better arranged.

I have before me a statement which I have prepared from the report of the Attorney-General giving an idea of the business of those courts. In three districts in the Indian Territory there were instituted in the year ended July 1, 1895, 1,740 criminal cases, while there remained undisposed of on the docket July 1, 1895, 693 criminal cases. In the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Iowa during the same length of time there were instituted 1,690 cases, 1,120 of which remain undisposed of. As to the civil business in that country, there were instituted during the year 1,521 cases. In the three States named there were instituted 1,344 cases, being 177 cases more in the Territorial courts than in the three States of Ohio, Indiana, and Iowa.

I cite this, Mr. Speaker, to show the House how utterly impossible it is for the courts there to transact the business for that Territory and to punish crime so prevalent there.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LITTLE. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. If that statement be correct, and I have no disposition to dispute it, why did not the Judiciary Committee bring in a bill to increase the judicial force in the Territory instead of giving some foreign State jurisdiction of these cases?

Mr. LITTLE. I can not speak for the committee on that point, but I can say to my distinguished friend that so far as I was able to ascertain, from information outside of the committee, there was a general disposition against increasing the appointees at this particular time.

Mr. HOPKINS. Does not the gentleman from Arkansas think that it is rather a doubtful policy to allow the courts of a foreign State to take jurisdiction of matters arising in the Indian Territory, when there are regularly constituted courts there?

Mr. LITTLE. I am very glad the gentleman asked that question. I will answer it with pleasure. Do not forget this: That there are no local governments there——

Mr. HOPKINS (interrupting). Well, they have a court, as the gentleman has stated.

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. HOPKINS. And with full jurisdiction in civil and criminal matters.

Mr. LITTLE. Oh, no; not full jurisdiction, and never had.

Mr. HOPKINS. Well, they have full jurisdiction in all matters arising in the Indian Territory, have they not?

Mr. LITTLE. They have jurisdiction of all matters where the jurisdiction is not now vested in the courts at Paris and Fort Smith.

Mr. HOPKINS. Are there any cases where the courts of the Territory do not have jurisdiction?

Mr. LITTLE. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. What class of cases?

Mr. LITTLE. The higher felony cases, principally. Cases against the laws of the United States are within the jurisdiction of the Fort Smith court on the line on the east, and at the Paris (Tex.) court on the south.

Mr. HOPKINS. As a matter of fact, under existing law, by September 1 next, would not the courts of the Territory have full jurisdiction?

Mr. LITTLE. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. Then this bill will take from the courts of the Territory a certain jurisdiction in some classes of cases at least and transfer them to Paris, Tex., and Fort Smith, Ark.?

Mr. LITTLE. This continues the jurisdiction exactly as it now stands.

Mr. HOPKINS. By the legislation of Congress certain jurisdiction has been taken from the courts—from these foreign courts in the States—and is given to the courts of the Territory.

Mr. LITTLE. That is true; but it does not take effect until September.

Mr. HOPKINS. And this bill takes from the courts of the Territory the jurisdiction they will exercise in September under the law.

Mr. LITTLE. That is it. It repeals the limitation.

Now, in the entire Indian country they have not a well-established jail. There is scarcely a court-house in the Territory. There is in the jail in the city of Fort Smith an average of about 250 lawless men. But there are not sufficient facilities for the courts to execute the law, in spite of the vigilance of the officers, no matter how honest they may be, or how efficient, for they have not the means at their command to protect the country from the lawless characters there and who come into that country. And there is but little objection to this measure from the Indians from any quarter. I have talked to many of them, and have letters from others, and they all agree that the great protection of the Indians against the aggressions of lawless people invading the Territory has been in a large measure due to the court at Fort Smith. It is not a foreign court. The only difference is that Fort Smith being on the border, the jurors are taken from a State where they can act firmly and impartially without being influenced by the desperadoes. One is on one side of the line and the other is on the other side. The Indians have been going there for twenty years, and any man familiar with the conditions existing there will see that the court presided over by Judge Parker, by his vigorous and determined enforcement of the law, has done much to punish and deter the red-handed murderers who infest that land.

I hoped when Congress passed the present law taking away this jurisdiction, September 6, that sufficient provision would be made to enable them to enforce the law, but it has not been done. But when I saw the rapid increase in crime; when I saw the absolute impossibility of controlling lawlessness there and the inadequacy of the jails, I believed it would be better that the jurisdiction should be continued in these extraterritorial courts, and that it could be done without doing injustice to the people of that country. More than that, I believe that when this jurisdiction ceases there will be an increase of crime. I believe, sir, that the lives and homes of the people inhabiting that country demand a continuance of its exercise, and I am not willing to meet these perils without an earnest effort on my part to stay the rising flood of crime in that country by giving the protection of all the courts as they now exist.

Mr. HOPKINS. Does the gentleman from Arkansas state to the members of this House that the residents of the Indian Territory will not enforce the laws of the Territory against crime, and that it is necessary to go to a foreign State to have jurors selected, and to a foreign State to administer the laws of the Territory? Is that the gentleman's contention?

Mr. LITTLE. No, sir; that is not my contention. That is not the position I occupy. The position I occupy is, first, that the courts as organized there can not enforce the laws with vigor, for they have not the means. You can not confine the desperate outlaws there without the best facilities. There are no well-built jails. There is in my city one of the very best jails in the country, and yet they can hardly restrain the outlaws who are crowded into it.

I do not question that there are many good people in the Indian country, but I believe that there are many of the worst outlaws there who have ever disgraced the country; and when the people go to the jury box, they go there under restraint and fear of these desperadoes and outlaws. I do not care how good they are or may be, these influences will have much to do with the enforcement of the laws.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas and Mr. CULBERSON rose.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. I would just as soon take my time now.

Mr. Speaker, I hope this bill will be defeated. On the 1st day of March, 1895, the Fifty-third Congress passed a bill creating 13 courts in the Indian Territory, giving them jurisdiction to try the criminal cases which are now being tried at Fort Smith, Ark., and Paris, Tex.; and now these gentlemen, before these courts have had an opportunity to try a criminal case, ask that we nullify that act. The only reason given for the continuation of the courts at Fort Smith, Ark., and Paris, Tex., is that they can not obtain a fair jury in the Indian Territory to try criminal cases. I want to call attention to the fact that there are in the Indian Territory to-day 300,000 people, 250,000 of whom are white men and white women. At least 75,000 of these citizens are eligible to jury service, the most of whom are honest and law-abiding, and they should have the right to try the crimes that are committed there.

Now, we have established these courts for that purpose. That is not all. The reason these gentlemen desire to have these two courts continued is perfectly apparent. It is because of the great amount of money that has been paid out in these two cities, and will be as long as they retain jurisdiction over crimes committed in the Indian Territory. It has virtually kept these two cities for twenty years. I have a report here given out by Judge Kilgore, in which he informs us that it costs $10 to prosecute a case in his court while it costs $350 to try a similar case in the United States court at Paris, Tex., or Fort Smith, Ark. Why? Because men charged with crime are arrested in the Indian Territory and are taken to Fort Smith or Paris, having to travel hundreds of miles; the dockets are crowded, the cases are continued, the witnesses return home, and then they are forced back again and again. There is absolutely no excuse for the continuance of these courts; and let me call attention of the House to the fact that the law enacted March 1, 1895, was based on a report of the Attorney-General for the year 1893. He says:

> In 1889 Congress established courts for the Indian Territory, being the courts now held at Muscogee, South McAlester, and Ardmore. Their jurisdiction, chiefly civil, does not, however, extend to the common or the grosser criminal offenses. These are under the jurisdiction of two courts situated outside of the Territory—one at Fort Smith, Ark., and the other at Paris, Tex.

Since that time additional courts have been provided for, and there are now 13 places where court is held in that Territory.

Your attention is also called to the following statement, contained in the same report:

> In almost all cases situated very remote from the localities of the offenses. Hence defendants and witnesses are compelled to travel hundreds of miles from their homes to the places of trial, while the two courts upon which all the business is accumulated are so crowded with work that defendants and witnesses are frequently obliged to remain in waiting for weeks before their cases are called, and sometimes to return at subsequent terms because their cases are not reached at all, but continued. The necessary results are that lawlessness and crime are greatly encouraged and that their investigation and punishment are attended with great uncertainty and difficulty, with great hardship both upon the accused and upon witnesses, and with most inordinate expense to the Government.

Mr. HOPKINS. What report is that?

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. This is the report of the Attorney-General for the year 1893.

Mr. HOPKINS. Before you get through, I want to ask you if, in pursuance of the report made by the Attorney-General, legislation was had such as suggested by which the Territory is given thirteen additional courts?

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. That is right. That bill was passed by the Fifty-third Congress on the 1st day of March, 1895. The very gentlemen who are now asking that the jurisdiction of these two courts be continued were here in support of that measure, and now they are asking that the law be repealed, and they have not given a chance to have a single criminal case tried in the new courts. That is not all. The Attorney-General says further——

Mr. LITTLE. If the gentleman will allow me. We are not here insisting on destroying the courts out there. Does not he know that the courts at Ardmore, South McAlester, Vinita, and Muscogee, four of the principal places where the courts are held—that the business of those courts is more than two years behind?

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. I do not know that to be the case.

Mr. LITTLE. I have a letter stating that fact.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. The judges of these courts can try the cases just as well as they can in Texas or Arkansas. Another thing; it is well known that the criminal cases are always tried first, and no matter how far behind the docket may be, the criminal docket is called first and the cases upon it are the first to be tried.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question. Are the people there entitled to have their civil causes tried?

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. They can have them tried. If they need more courts, instead of piling up the expense of continuing these courts, that cost us over $600,000 a year, give them more courts in the Territory. What is the use of spending $310 in the trial of a criminal case when it can be tried for $10, and tried just as well in the new courts as the old?

Mr. LITTLE. Did not my friend introduce a bill to that effect as to these other courts?

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. I did not.

Mr. LITTLE. I have seen the letter of Judge Kilgore, who seems to be advocating an increase of his own powers instead of attending to his judicial business.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. I decline to yield for a speech.

Now, the Attorney-General continues:

In the face of a situation like this, which should be changed for the better at whatever cost, to advert to the expense of maintaining the existing system seems almost like trifling with a subject of grave importance. Yet the wastefulness of the system is probably as marked as its inefficiency.

The expenses of the United States courts incurred and paid during the fiscal year ending July 1, 1903, throughout the entire country, with its population of 85,000,000, amount to $4,528,676.87. The corresponding expenses incurred and paid during the same period on account of the courts of the Indian Territory, with less than one-twentieth of the population, amount to $625,226, or between one-seventh and one-eighth of the whole.

These are the courts they want you to continue, that cost us $625,000 that year. Now, why do they want them continued? Here is a letter published in one of the leading papers of the Territory and signed by Mr. Powe, in which he says:

Why is it that men are daily arrested in various parts of the Territory and taken scores and even hundreds of miles to the Fort Smith court for selling whisky to Indians, and are heavily fined and often sent to the pen, while right in Fort Smith, under the shadow of the court, a score of saloons have for twenty years sold whisky to Indians openly without molestation, and not only this, but the marshal's office is made a collection agency for the saloonists? The saloon men have runners who keep up with the court witnesses. The latter, Indians, whites, or blacks, are given credit for whisky, and in return give an order on the marshal for a certain amount of their witness fees. This order is filed in the marshal's office, and when the witness is paid the amount is withheld by the clerk and by him turned over to the saloonist or his agent. This seems incredible, but is a notorious fact which the writer has witnessed time and again and will not be denied.

The following is his opinion as to the benefits these two courts have been to the country:

Many of the most notorious outlaws this country has ever known, among them the Daltons and Starrs, have graduated out of the marshal's office and out of the Fort Smith jail, where they were incarcerated unjustly upon trivial charges and returned to their homes smarting for revenge.

I venture the assertion that this court has manufactured two criminals where it has punished one.

Why, it is a well-known fact that one of the Dalton boys was a deputy United States marshal, and yet he was the leader of one of the gangs they complain of. What do the papers down there say about the matter? I read from one of the Indian Territory papers, the Muscogee Phœnix. It says:

It could hardly be expected that the towns of Fort Smith and Paris, which for years have fattened at our expense, would be willing to give up the "snap" without a dying struggle of some kind. That struggle has materialized both from Arkansas and Texas quarters in the shape of bills introduced into Congress by Congressman LITTLE of Arkansas and Congressman BAILEY of Texas. LITTLE wants the Fort Smith court to retain jurisdiction over this country and have that jurisdiction extended. BAILEY wants a court established at Gainesville, Tex., with jurisdiction over the Indian country. In other words, they both seek to levy tribute upon the Indian Territory to bolster up the decaying grandeur and crumbling greatness of their home towns.

The House should stand by the existing law, at least until after it has been determined whether or not these courts can try the cases. I submit further that it is an insult to the 300,000 people of the Indian Territory, a large majority of whom are honest and law abiding, to say that it is impossible to get a jury from among them, when those men have gone there from every State in the Union. They talk about gangs being organized and going out to commit crimes. If they do, then they are answerable to the laws of the States where the crimes are committed and can be prosecuted there. That is not all. We have an extradition law under which if a man commits a crime in one State, in Kansas or Arkansas, and flees to the Indian Territory, he may be apprehended upon an order of a United States court. We have United States commissioners in every part of that Territory. We have given them thirteen courts, and it will not cost us one-thirtieth as much to prosecute the criminals in the Indian Territory as it costs to prosecute them in Texas or in Arkansas. I therefore hope that the House will defeat this bill. [Applause.]

I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. CULBERSON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, this bill was before the Judiciary Committee and was very carefully considered. It has been favorably reported to the House. The act conferring jurisdiction upon the courts of the Indian Territory to try persons accused of crimes committed in that Territory does not take effect until the 1st day of September next. It has never taken effect as yet. And the simple question here is whether the time has arrived when it is wise and in the interest of justice, and in the interest of the protection of lives and property of the people involved, to change the jurisdiction over these matters that has heretofore existed for years in the Federal court at Fort Smith, Ark., at Paris, Tex., and somewhere in southwestern Kansas.

Upon the facts as presented to the committee, which seem to be overwhelming in their purport and perfectly clear and satisfactory, the committee determined that that time had not arrived. It is notorious to the country and the world that some of the most terrible, outrageous, and ruinous crimes of every description have been committed in that country. It is also well known that the courts in Arkansas, Texas, and Kansas have efficiently dealt with the criminals. The purpose of a court is to uphold the law and to administer justice. Whether it is expensive or not, the court is utterly useless unless that result can be obtained. I presume that if the jurisdiction were placed in the local courts it would be attended with costs, and as they have no jails in which to confine these criminals and hold them until justice can be enforced upon them, the probability is that instead of diminishing expenses and costs there would be a considerable increase over the present system.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. What is there to prevent the sending of criminals for safe-keeping to other jails, as they do in other States, in case the local jails are not sufficient?

Mr. LEWIS. Would not that be attended with expense?

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. The expense would not be nearly as great as the traveling expenses of all the witnesses in each case.

Mr. LEWIS. I think the jail ought to be within the jurisdiction of the court whose duty it is to administer justice upon an offense. That is my idea of that. I want to say further that it is well known to the country that justice has been effectively administered in those courts which have heretofore held this jurisdiction, and that they have afforded protection to life and property. Great transcontinental lines of railway traverse this Territory. It has been made a harbor and a resort of criminals and refugees from justice from all over the country, and it seems that these crimes are committed by these classes more than by the residents of the Territory. They have to be tried by jury, and the juries trying them in the Indian Territory would be under terrorism of the confederates of those criminals. The days of martyrdom have passed, and it is no reflection upon the integrity of any man who sits as a juror to say that he would be unwilling to return a verdict of guilty when he knew that assassination or destruction of his property was impending over him. It would be too much to ask of him. The distinguished judge of the western district of Arkansas, in a letter which was before the committee, uses the following language:

As you know, the Government has at Fort Smith a very fine court-house, and perhaps the best jail in the United States, built at great expense. There is attached to the jail a Government hospital in which are cared for, treated, and nursed the persons who are brought here charged with crimes. None of these things exist in the Indian country. In fact, there is not a jail there to-day, nor is there likely to be soon, that would hold the lawless and desperate men who are now confined in the jail at Fort Smith. If there ever was a time when the protecting power of these courts should be exercised to secure the peace and protection which should be afforded to the honest and upright citizens in the Indian country it is now, because that country is in a formative condition. Hundreds and thousands of men, many of them reckless, many of them criminals, have flocked into that country in anticipation of some opportunity that might be afforded them, and they have to be dealt with by a power that is so free and independent that it can exercise the full measure intended by the law to be exercised to secure the rights of the people.

As you know, there can not be obtained better jurymen anywhere than make up the panels in the Federal court at Fort Smith. They are men of intelligence, men of integrity, men who, as a rule, dispose of cases without bias, or without prejudice, and then they are so situated that they can act independently. While it matters not how good men may be in the Indian country, and how willing they may be to uphold the law, their environment is such that they can not with safety enforce the law against the members of the banditti that at times have infested that country, though by the vigilance and activity of the courts at Fort Smith and Paris they are now largely broken up. It is not likely that men can afford, if willing, to find verdicts of guilty, say for murder, against members of lawless bands when the confederates of the man convicted would shoot them down or destroy their property.

Men can not afford to uphold the law of the United States, great as the duty may be, under such circumstances. And it is my judgment, after twenty years' experience with these conditions which exist, that the strong judicial arm of the Government, as it has been wielded by what are sometimes called these outside courts, should remain extended over the Indian country, and that the higher crimes affecting life and property should be brought before these outside courts, and that their jurisdiction to try such crimes should remain until that country is able to place its star on our flag—until its autonomy is changed from what it is now to statehood.

Respectfully, etc.,

I. C. PARKER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to have printed as a part of my remarks a portion of a letter received from a distinguished gentleman——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That can be done only by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. KEM. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made by the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] whether he desires to use the remainder of his time?

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. I reserve my time.

Mr. CULBERSON. I have the conclusion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] has five minutes and the gentleman from Kansas

[Mr. CURTIS] has seven minutes. Does the gentleman from Kansas desire to use his time?

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. No, I do not.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well, then. I yield to my colleague [Mr. BAILEY] to make a statement.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I simply desire to say that the newspaper article which has been read by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], so far as it relates to me, is an unmitigated lie. I have not introduced the bill that I am accused of introducing, nor has such a bill been introduced by anyone.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, since the act of 1895 was passed a great many lawyers have migrated to the Indian Territory and have flooded that country and filled the pockets of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] with stale statements about the courts at Paris and at Fort Smith—such statements as are read here, one of which has just been denounced as an unmitigated lie. I have on my desk a report made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY], which is one of the ablest reports I have ever read upon a subject like this, and if members want to understand the real reasons why this bill seeks to repeal the act of 1895 I ask them to listen to this report. The papers referred to are all on file. They are in the room of the Committee on the Judiciary. They come from reputable business men, not from political lawyers and hotelkeepers who have gone into that country to prey upon the substance of the people when the provision for this court goes into effect. I ask to have the portions of the report of Judge CONNOLLY that I have marked read in my time.

The Clerk read portions of the report until the time of Mr. CULBERSON had expired. By unanimous consent, leave was given to print the whole report in the RECORD. It is as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4154) to amend section 9 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of additional judges of the United States court in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," submit the following report:

By sundry acts of Congress jurisdiction over offenses against the Federal laws in the Indian Territory has heretofore been given to the Federal courts for the western district of Arkansas, the eastern district of Texas, and the district of Kansas. By an act passed March 1, 1895, provision has been made for a transfer of this jurisdiction September 1, 1896, to the new courts organized by that act.

It is well known that the district courts in Arkansas, Texas, and Kansas have long been a terror to the criminal classes in the Indian Territory, and the efficiency of these courts in enforcing the Federal laws in the Territory has been the means of making life and property comparatively safe there, notwithstanding the notorious fact that organized bands of outlaws make their hiding places there, who are in great measure restrained in their criminal career by the knowledge that condign punishment will certainly follow their arrest and conviction.

The great efficiency of these courts in enforcing the criminal laws and convicting criminals has arisen from the fact that the juries in those courts have been absolutely free of any domination or terrorism that the indicted criminals or their friends could exercise over them.

While there is no doubt that conditions of life and society are changing in the Indian Territory, yet the change has not yet reached that stage where it would be safe to intrust the enforcement of Federal laws to the average juries that would necessarily be found in the Territory, subjected as they would be to the terrorism and other influences of criminals and their friends, knowing, as they would, that a verdict of guilty against any criminal who had friends would probably be followed by a reign of terror against the jurors who should return such a verdict.

The effect of this act of March 1, 1895, is to transfer on September 1, 1896, to the care of the three courts in the Indian Territory and to the verdicts of juries in that Territory the lives and property of the denizens of the Indian Territory. And the property, business, and employees' lives of the various railroad and express companies doing business in and through that Territory, as well as of the travelers through the Territory, will be forced to depend on juries of the Indian Territory for security, for it is well known that no matter how stringent the criminal laws may be or how learned and incorruptible the courts may be, still the safety of life and property from injury, loss, and destruction by violence depends upon the courage and integrity of juries.

Already the change of jurisdiction which is threatened by the act of 1891 has aroused and alarmed the peaceable residents as well as the various business interests in the Territory, and express companies doing business through the Territory have withdrawn their money-carrying business from the Territory.

Your committee have before them a communication on this subject, dated January 25, 1896, from the general superintendent of one of the leading express companies of the country, from which we quote:

"Recently a bill has been presented to Congress * * * for the retention of jurisdiction over crime committed in the Indian Territory by the United States courts at Fort Smith, Ark., Paris, Tex., and for the southern division of Kansas. Express companies which do business in the Indian Territory are very much interested in having this bill become a law. A little over a year ago the express companies found it so hazardous to handle money within the Indian Territory that they were compelled to withdraw from that Territory that part of their business.

"The Territory was overrun with bandits, who not only robbed the trains, but robbed the express offices. One of the agents of the Pacific Express Company has been killed while his office was being robbed. The loss to the express companies did not consist wholly in the money taken by the robbers, there having been very great expense in endeavoring to protect the trains and agents and in efforts to capture the robbers.

"About that time the marshals and deputy marshals of the courts I have referred to instituted a vigorous crusade against the bandits, which resulted in the capture of a large number of them, some of whom have paid the penalty of their crimes with their lives. This resulted in breaking up nearly all the numerous bands, and the vigorous and fearless administration of justice by these courts has, up to this time, deterred the formation of new bands. The new courts which have been established in the Indian Territory have been, as I understand it, given jurisdiction over these crimes, and I wish to say that such jurisdiction by these courts within the Territory can not, in my opinion, be made effective for the prevention of crime.

"Juries for such courts having sufficient courage and patriotism to enforce the law could not be obtained.

"These bandits have the citizens of the Indian Territory thoroughly terrorized, and any jury which would find one of these desperadoes guilty would be sure to be assassinated by his friends. This assertion is based upon our experience and knowledge of the condition of things within the Territory.

"Recently we have received information that bands of robbers are now forming, and it is their avowed intention to begin operations against railroad and express companies and others in September, or as soon as the law giving to the Territorial courts the jurisdiction referred to becomes effective."

Your committee has also received a memorial from the governor and over fifty of the officials and leading men of the Chickasaw tribe of Indians, residents of the Territory, which sets forth their views as follows:

"We are heartily and sincerely in favor of that peace and security in the Indian country which can alone come from an enforcement of the laws of the United States applicable thereto, and if this continues to be done, as it has been done by the United States courts at Fort Smith, Ark., and Paris, Tex., we feel that we can take care of our own criminal classes.

"Under treaty obligations, and therefore in justice to us, the Government of the United States is pledged and in duty bound to take all necessary steps to effectually suppress lawlessness and crime in the Indian Territory.

"No more effective means can be taken, looking to the effective enforcement of the law, than to continue and retain the present jurisdiction over the Indian country of the United States courts at Paris, Tex., and Fort Smith, Ark., over the higher and graver classes of criminal offenses.

"These Federal courts, having jurors free from prejudice or bias, and who therefore act without fear or favor, have been most effective in the trial and conviction of the worst criminals who ever infested our country. Besides, they have ever shown that they are the true friends of the Indian; that they know his rights and have dared maintain them.

"We assert that the majority of the higher and graver class of criminal offenses in the Indian country are committed by those people known in that country as the criminal-intruder class from the United States, and the crimes not committed by them are very largely committed through their instigation and example.

"This jurisdiction should be given and retained in said courts for the following reason, as we believe:

"As is well known, there are two distinct classes of people now occupying the Indian country. One class, the members of the tribes or citizens of the respective nations; the other class is the white man who has settled in this country. Conflicts are frequent between these two contending classes, and crimes are committed by the one upon the other. When these conflicts arise they should be settled by a fair and impartial tribunal. This can not be done if the person charged with such offense is to be tried in the Indian Territory. The jurors there necessarily belong to one or other of these two classes, each with a sympathy for his own people, and will be incapable of doing justice to the other.

"The jurors of the United States courts at Fort Smith, Ark., and Paris, Tex., are beyond these influences, and therefore entirely unbiased and unprejudiced, and besides the United States courts at these places have demonstrated by experience that they have been the only effective barriers between such contending classes.

"The abandonment of such jurisdiction would, we believe, greatly increase such class of crimes, as we believe such criminal classes would have no fear of the courts and jurors in said Indian Territory."

Your committee also have a memorial from the officers of the Kansas City, Pittsburg and Gulf Railroad Company—which company does a large business in and through the Indian Territory—in which they strongly urge the retention of criminal jurisdiction over graver crimes of the Indian Territory in the United States courts at Fort Smith, Paris, and in Kansas.

They say of these courts:

"They are the greatest blessing the people of the Indian country have had; that they have aided them in their journey along the pathway of civilization; they fearlessly declare and vindicate rights; they have stood by the people of the Territory in their contest with the criminal invader of their country; they have taught the peaceable people of the Indian Territory to rely upon that great handmaiden of civilization whose mission is peace and harmony—the law—as upheld by brave, fearless, just, and impartial courts. * * *

"We fear the gravest consequences to express and railroad companies in that country if, in its present condition, the jurisdiction of these courts is taken away. They and they only, in our judgment, can cope with the lawless criminals who have refugeed into the Indian country."

To the same effect, and in equally vigorous terms, is a memorial your committee has received from the officers of the Wells-Fargo Express Company, which does a large business in the Territory. They say:

"The environment of the whole class of people in the Indian country is such that they can not act with that spirit of freedom and independence necessary to secure an impartial and an efficient enforcement of the law for the protection of life and property in the Indian country. In our judgment these strong judicial arms of the Government should remain extended over the Indian country until that country is able to place its star on our flag—until its autonomy is changed from what it is now to Statehood."

The United States district judge at Fort Smith, Ark., who has had over twenty years' experience in that court in dealing with the criminal classes of the Indian Territory, and whose judgment is therefore of great value on this question, writes to the committee, under date of January 21, 1896, as follows:

"DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, EIGHTH CIRCUIT,
"Fort Smith, January 21, 1896.

"In reply to your letter of the 17th instant, asking me to give my views upon the proposition as to whether the jurisdiction now in the United States courts at Fort Smith, Ark., and Paris, Tex., over the Indian country should remain until there is a change in the condition of that country: As you are well aware, as far as I am personally concerned, to take away this jurisdiction would remove a great burden from my shoulders, because for twenty years I have had to wrestle with one of the greatest problems of the age, a problem growing out of a contest between civilization and barbarism, a problem which exists because of the intrusion into the Indian country of large numbers of refugee criminals from the different States in the Union. To relieve me of this responsibility would be to take from me a great burden; but at the same time, while the Indian country is in its present condition, I can not see that it would inure to the benefit of that country or its peaceable and law-abiding people, but on the contrary, in my judgment, it would increase crime there.

"As you are aware, the Federal court for the western district of Arkansas has been held at Fort Smith since the year 1871. After the State was divided into two districts the court for the western district of the State, up to 1871, was held at Van Buren. The United States courts for the State of Arkansas, and then for the western district of Arkansas, have had jurisdiction for the punishment of crimes committed in the Indian country ever since the 15th of April, 1844. For over half a century have the people of Arkansas, as jurors in the Federal courts, administered the law for the Indian country. These courts, first for the State of Arkansas, and then for the western district of Arkansas, have had criminal jurisdiction over the whole of the Indian country.

From its eastern boundary to the Texas and Colorado lines was within the jurisdiction of this court. For some years this jurisdiction has been divided between the United States courts for the eastern district of Texas and the United States courts for the district of Kansas, held at Wichita. More recently the United States courts in the Indian Territory have been established. They have as yet but limited jurisdiction over any of the higher crimes under the laws of the United States.

"The fact that the criminal laws of the United States have been extended over the Indian country, and that the United States courts for the western district of Arkansas have had jurisdiction to enforce those laws, is why it is there are so many criminal cases tried in this court, and the same remark applies with equal force to the condition which exists in the United States courts for the eastern district of Texas, held at Paris, Tex. There have been perhaps more criminal cases of great magnitude tried in the courts at Fort Smith than in any one court in the world, yet there are fewer of these cases which come from that part of the district in the State of Arkansas than come from any district in the United States. The great majority of criminal cases in the Federal courts usually are violations of the laws of the United States regulating the operations of the Government, such as counterfeiting, offenses under the postal laws, offenses affecting the revenue department of the Government, such as violations of the revenue laws, cutting timber, etc.

"Now, there are less of these crimes committed in the State part of the western district of Arkansas than in any other Federal jurisdiction I know of. That part of the district is proverbially quiet and orderly, and largely free from violations of the Federal laws, and its people have as high a respect for the laws of the United States as people to be found in any section of the country. The whole country can with slight effort understand that these great crimes for which criminals are tried and punished in the Federal courts here are not crimes committed by the people of Arkansas, but they are very largely crimes committed in the Indian country by the refugee criminals from every State in the Union. Everyone should know that the Federal courts do not have jurisdiction over cases of murder committed in the State or over other criminal offenses affecting individual rights, such as the rights to persons or property.

"It can therefore be seen that the court here, with its juries, has had cast upon it the great responsibility of trying escaped criminals from every State in the Union. This is true also of the court at Paris, Tex. The records of the Federal court show that the great proportion of criminals tried for murder and other high crimes are not Indians, but whites and negroes, citizens of the United States, many of whom have refugeed into the Indian country. As you well know, courts are the greatest agencies of civilization to be found in any system of government, because, if efficient and able, they overcome the great enemy of peace and order, and consequently of civilization—the man of crime, the man of blood. He represents savageism and brutality, while the majesty of the law, as upheld by the courts, represents a state of public order and tranquillity growing out of the security of the citizen in all his rights.

"As you well know, I have for almost twenty-one years been the presiding judge over the United States courts at Fort Smith, and I think it may be truthfully said that during that time more has been accomplished by the United States courts at Fort Smith to establish the supremacy of the law in the Indian country than was ever before accomplished in any country with the same conditions affecting it. I think my large experience here has enabled me to understand the necessity for a vigorous enforcement of the laws in that country; the necessity for having the opportunity of selecting jurors who can from their surroundings act without fear, favor, or affection. It may be said without contradiction that the laws of the United States have been more often vindicated in the Federal courts at Fort Smith than in any other.

"The worst bands of desperadoes, murderers, and outlaws to be found in any civilized land have infested the Indian country, having run from the laws of the States. A greater per cent of them have been captured and brought to merited punishment by the United States courts here and at Paris, Tex., than in any other court. It is a maxim that certainty of arrest and reasonable certainty of conviction follows the commission of crime in the Indian country. The members of banditti after banditti have been captured, sent to prison, convicted of murder or other high crimes. The terror of certain punishment has been held before the criminal minded. Because of this certainty of punishment in the United States courts here and at Paris, Tex., and the confidence the law-abiding people have in their integrity, ability, and desire to protect the good people of the Indian country, mobs rarely exist in that country. The enforcement of the laws of the United States in these courts has rightfully, properly, and justly been vigorous, impartial, just, and most efficient. These courts have done more than courts anywhere to uphold the laws of the land, to protect the innocent by the punishment of the guilty. They do more than all agencies besides to make civilization a reality in the Indian country.

"As you are aware, the Indian courts have no jurisdiction over offenses committed by citizens of the United States, and if they had, surrounded as they now are, they are hardly strong enough, notwithstanding their willingness to uphold the law, to contend with and punish this vast horde of refugee criminals who have in violation of law sought nesting places in the Indian country. The United States courts at Paris and Fort Smith are courts where certainty of arrest and surety of punishment exists. The greatest blessing the Indian people have had or now have is these Federal courts, who have stretched their strong arms over them for their protection as well as the protection of all the peaceable and law-abiding citizens in that country. They have aided the Indian in his journey along the pathway of civilization. These courts have stood by all the peaceable and law-abiding citizens in the Indian country in their contest with the criminal invader of that country—the man of blood. These courts have taught such people to rely upon that great handmaiden of civilization whose mission is peace and harmony—the law as upheld by courts who have the opportunity of performing their duty.

"Now, in the condition of that country, there is a greater necessity for the strong arm of the Government as wielded in the Federal courts at Fort Smith and at Paris, Tex., to be stretched out over it now than ever before, and in regard to the change of jurisdiction in its present condition, to my mind it would be almost fatal to the safety of the good citizens of that country. There are many good people there among the Indians as well as among the whites who are in that country, but their environment is such that in my judgment it would be very difficult to put them in a position where they could fearlessly perform their duty as jurymen. The juries in the Federal courts both at Paris and at Fort Smith are entirely without any feeling of race prejudice, and they decide the cases before them irrespective of any feeling that may be entertained for or against the one accused or those who accuse him.

"As you know, there are many lawless and desperate men who have infested that country, and they justly fear these courts of the United States which have been engaged in bringing them to justice. For twenty years, by my own personal observation, the Federal court at Fort Smith has been placed in direct contact with this element, and it has taught the criminal element an object lesson which has inured to the lasting benefit of the Indian country. It has not only taught the Five Civilized Tribes that they can safely rely upon the laws of the United States when they are properly enforced, but it has taught the whole country a lesson of the greatest benefit to it.

"As you know, the Government has at Fort Smith a very fine court-house, and perhaps the best jail in the United States, built at great expense. There is attached to the jail a Government hospital in which are cared for, treated, and nursed the persons who are brought here charged with crimes. None of these things exist in the Indian country. In fact, there is not a jail there to-day, nor is there likely to be soon, that would hold the lawless and desperate men who are now confined in the jail at Fort Smith. If there ever was a time when the protecting power of these courts should be exercised to secure the peace and protection which should be afforded to the honest and upright citizens in the Indian country it is now, because that country is in a formative condition. Hundreds and thousands of men, many of them reckless, many of them criminals, have flocked into that country in anticipation of some opportunity that might be afforded them, and they have to be dealt with by a power that is so free and independent that it can exercise the full measure intended by the law to be exercised to secure the rights of the people.

"As you know, there can not be obtained better jurymen anywhere than make up the panels in the Federal court at Fort Smith. They are men of intelligence, men of integrity, men who, as a rule, dispose of cases without bias or without prejudice, and then they are so situated that they can act independently. While it matters not how good men may be in the Indian country, and how willing they may be to uphold the law, their environment is such that they can not with safety enforce the law against the members of the banditti that at times have infested that country, though by the vigilance and activity of the courts at Fort Smith and Paris they are now largely broken up. It is not likely that men can afford, if willing, to find verdicts of guilty, say for murder, against members of lawless bands when the confederates of the man convicted would shoot them down or destroy their property.

"Men can not afford to uphold the law of the United States, great as the duty may be, under such circumstances. And it is my judgment, after twenty years' experience with these conditions which exist, that the strong judicial arm of the Government, as it has been wielded by what are sometimes called these outside courts, should remain extended over the Indian country, and that the higher crimes affecting life and property should be brought before these outside courts, and that their jurisdiction to try such crimes should remain until that country is able to place its star on our flag—until its autonomy is changed from what it is now to statehood.

"Respectfully, etc.,

"I. C. PARKER."

The Indian Territory is no longer a closed country. Railroads have made public passageways through it, along which thousands of citizens of the States are annually compelled to travel from east to west and from north to south in pursuit of business or pleasure, and over which millions of dollars' worth of property and treasure belonging to citizens of the different States are necessarily carried in the ordinary course of commerce between the States, and no chances should be taken that would imperil the safety of these travelers or this commerce between the States; and your committee, regarding it as a dangerous experiment to remit the protection of these travelers and this commerce to the courts and juries of the Indian Territory, believe that the jurisdiction heretofore and now exercised over crimes committed in the Indian Territory in violation of the Federal laws should be continued as provided by this bill, instead of being turned over to the Indian Territory courts, as will be the case on September 1, 1896, unless this bill becomes a law. Your committee therefore report this bill back with the recommendation that it do pass.

The question being taken on suspending the rules and passing the bill, there were—ayes 63, noes 66.

So the motion was rejected.

ARIZONA FUNDING ACT.

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the Senate bill which I send to the desk.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of the acts of Congress approved June 25, 1890, and August 3, 1894, authorizing the funding of certain indebtedness of the Territory of Arizona, are hereby amended and extended so as to authorize the funding of all outstanding obligations of said Territory, and the counties, municipalities, and school districts thereof, as provided in the act of Congress approved June 25, 1890, until January 1, 1897, and all outstanding bonds, warrants, and other evidences of indebtedness of the Territory of Arizona, and the counties, municipalities, and school districts thereof, heretofore authorized by legislative enactments of said Territory bearing a higher rate of interest than is authorized by the aforesaid funding act approved June 25, 1890, and which said bonds, warrants, and other evidences of indebtedness have been sold or exchanged in good faith in compliance with the terms of the acts of the legislature by which they were authorized, shall be funded, with the interest thereon which has accrued and may accrue until funded into the lower interest-bearing bonds as provided by this act.

SEC. 2. That all bonds and other evidences of indebtedness heretofore funded by the loan commission of Arizona under the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 25, 1890, and the act amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto approved August 3, 1894, are hereby declared to be valid and legal for the purposes for which they were issued and funded; and all bonds and other evidences of indebtedness heretofore issued under the authority of the legislature of said Territory, as hereinbefore authorized to be funded, are hereby confirmed, approved, and validated, and may be funded as in this act provided until January 1, 1897: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to make the Government of the United States liable or responsible for the payment of any of said bonds, warrants, or other evidences of indebtedness by this act approved, confirmed, and made valid, and authorized to be funded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. HEPBURN. I demand a second.

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. KEM. I object.

Tellers being ordered upon the question of ordering a second, the House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 80, noes 1.

So a second was ordered.

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the report upon this bill be read. It is a unanimous report and explains the object of the bill clearly.

The report (by Mr. HARRIS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Territories, to whom was referred House bill 8885, beg leave to submit the following report:

The act of Congress entitled "An act approving, with amendments, the funding act of Arizona" became a law June 25, 1890, and authorized the funding of all Territorial, county, municipal, and school district indebtedness of Arizona which had accrued and would accrue, with the interest thereon, until and including December 31, 1890, into 5 per cent bonds, and under the provisions of the act a loan commission, consisting of the governor, secretary of the Territory, and Territorial auditor, was created to fund indebtedness under the terms of the act.

The purpose of the law was to effect an annual saving in interest and place the Territory upon a cash basis. The floating indebtedness of the Territory represented by warrants bore 10 per cent interest, and upon that indebtedness an immediate saving was had of 5 per cent. The average rate of interest on the bonded indebtedness of the Territory was 8 per cent, and the operation of the law effected a saving of 3 per cent upon all indebtedness funded. Only such bonded indebtedness could be funded as had matured or was voluntarily surrendered by the holders thereof.

A supplemental act of Congress was passed and approved August 3, 1894, extending the time for funding outstanding warrants for Territorial expenses only until December 31, 1895. The object of the present bill is to further extend the provisions of the funding act approved June 25, 1890, until January 1, 1897, so as to permit and authorize the funding of such outstanding indebtedness as might have been funded under the original act had the same been surrendered before the act had lapsed.

It is not proposed to fund any indebtedness which could not have been funded under the original act had said indebtedness been presented in time.

No new indebtedness is proposed to be funded in excess of the limit prescribed by law. In authorizing the funding of the outstanding liabilities the act also validifies the indebtedness already funded and authorized to be funded, so as to prevent the possibility of repudiation of bona fide obligations.

The eighteenth legislature of Arizona unanimously memorialized Congress to validate securities about which doubt existed.

Upon investigation the committee believe the legislation beneficial and wise and in the interest of good government, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. I reserve the balance of my time, unless some gentleman desires to ask questions.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite important that the gentleman should explain the provisions of this bill somewhat.

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. I supposed that the report explained it sufficiently, but if the gentleman thinks it does not I will gladly supplement it with a brief explanation. Under the working of the act of Congress approved June 25, 1890, the Territory of Arizona was authorized to fund all its indebtedness of whatever nature into 5 per cent bonds, thereby effecting an average saving of 3 per cent upon its indebtedness. That law applied to all kinds of indebtedness—school district, Territorial, county, and municipal.

A commission was organized under the act, consisting of the governor, the secretary, and the Territorial auditor, for the purpose of executing the law, but of course the outstanding indebtedness bearing a higher rate of interest could not be compelled to be surrendered or funded unless it had matured, and therefore there still remained a considerable portion which could not be funded. Many obligations were about to mature, and they were funded. A portion of the 8 per cent indebtedness was funded, but some of the higher interest-bearing bonds of counties and municipalities were refused to be surrendered for funding. The expectation was to put the Territory upon a cash basis, but that expectation was disappointed, and the members of the Territorial government came here and asked the last Congress to extend the funding act for a year longer, covering the floating indebtedness and the Territorial expenses only, but not including the outstanding indebtedness of municipalities bearing a higher rate of interest. That act was passed August 3, 1894.

A question was raised here this morning about a cloud being on Territorial bonds, and a bill was passed validating certain bonds of New Mexico. A large amount of the bonds of Arizona might possibly give rise to the same questions if our people desired to repudiate their obligations, but there is no such desire on their part, and the Territorial legislature, recognizing the danger to the credit of the Territory if anyone should undertake to litigate these securities, have unanimously memorialized Congress to pass this act to validate both the bonds which have been funded and others outstanding, bearing a higher rate of interest, upon their voluntary surrender by their holders. There is about $200,000 involved altogether. I will ask the Clerk to read the memorial of the legislature, if the gentleman desires.

Mr. HOPKINS. That is not necessary.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. I wish to ask the gentleman whether there is anything in the act of 1890 safeguarding these bonds against being sold for less than par?

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. Yes, sir; they can not be so sold.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. I do not see any provision of that kind in the bill.

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. Well, this bill refers to the provisions of the other act, which prohibits the selling of the bonds for less than par.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. What arrangement is there for securing a premium on the bonds, provided the market should warrant it?

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. The Territorial officers constituting the loan commission are required, under the provisions of the act, to advertise for bids.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. What experience have you had on that subject since the act of 1890?

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. Bonds to the amount of $500,000 were sold at a premium, bringing 102.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. The bonds, as I understand, which were sold under the act of 1894 were gold bonds; that is, the interest was payable in gold.

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. Yes, sir; and the principal in lawful money.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. And the same requirement applies with regard to these bonds?

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will this issue of bonds cover the entire indebtedness of the Territory?

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. Yes, sir; the entire indebtedness of the Territory may be funded under this act.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Will this bill, if it becomes a law, have the effect of validating any bonds which are now questionable?

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. Yes, sir; to a certain degree. None of the bonds have been repudiated by the Territory, but there is a cloud to a certain extent resting upon some of them.

Mr. HEPBURN. This indebtedness, or the larger part of it, was incurred, I believe, while a statute of the United States forbidding the Territory from issuing bonds was in force?

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. Oh, no; only a very small portion of it—about $200,000.

Mr. HEPBURN. What is the total amount that has been funded or may be funded under this act—the total amount of the indebtedness of the Territory?

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. Probably less than $2,000,000. I funded $1,600,000 while I was governor. The aggregate I have named covers not simply debts of the Territory proper, but indebtedness of cities, counties, townships, and school districts. No one would call the debt of New York City the debt of New York. The amount of indebtedness I have named includes every kind of obligation of the Territory proper and the indebtedness of municipalities, school districts, etc.; and the funding of this debt will save us on the average 3 per cent interest.

Mr. HEPBURN. What portion of the $2,000,000 of indebtedness has been or will be incurred in the refunding of bonds of the prohibited class of which we have been speaking?

Mr. HILBORN. The Pima claims?

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. None of the Pima claims; but of obligations similar to those, about $200,000.

Mr. HEPBURN. I am willing to yield the floor to any gentleman who wants to speak on this subject. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The question was taken; and the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7907) for the protection of the people of the Indian Territory, extending the jurisdiction of the United States courts, providing for the laying out of towns, the leasing of coal and other mineral, timber, farming, and grazing lands, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the criminal laws of the United States be, and the same are hereby, extended over the Indian Territory, and the United States courts now in existence, or that may be hereafter created in or for said Territory, are hereby given jurisdiction over all prosecutions for crimes and misdemeanors committed within their respective jurisdiction, without regard to the race or citizenship of the person or persons violating or charged with having violated any of the laws of the United States, or the laws of the State of Arkansas heretofore put in force in said Territory by acts of Congress, and sections 1636 to 1644, inclusive, entitled embezzlement, and sections 1711 to 1718, inclusive, entitled bribery and embracery of Mansfield's Digest of the State of Arkansas, are hereby extended over and put in force in said Territory, and the word officer where the same appears in said laws shall include all officers of any of the governments of either of said tribe of Indians: Provided, That this section shall in no way destroy or curtail the jurisdiction of the United States courts at Fort Smith, Ark., and Paris, Tex., under existing laws. The fifteenth section of the act of Congress entitled "An act to establish United States courts in the Territory, and for other purposes," approved March 1, 1889, limiting jurors to citizens of the United States, is hereby repealed, but not to affect any causes now pending in said court or crimes committed prior to the passage of this act.

SEC. 2. That said United States courts within their respective districts be, and they are hereby, given exclusive jurisdiction to hear and determine all civil suits arising between citizens of the United States or between citizens of the United States and members of any of said five tribes of Indians, or between Indians of the several five different tribes, and said courts shall also have jurisdiction over all appeals from any judgment or determination of any Indian court in said Territory, and the said United States court may, in the event of a reversal of any such judgment or determination of an Indian court, order a new trial to proceed within its own jurisdiction.

SEC. 3. That said courts are hereby given jurisdiction in their respective districts to try cases against those who may unlawfully and forcibly enter into lands and tenements and detain the same, and also those who having originally made a lawful and peaceable entry into lands and tenements and unlawfully and by force hold the same beyond the legal period, and also those who claim to hold as members of a tribe and whose membership is denied by the tribe but continue to hold said lands and tenements notwithstanding the objection of the tribe; and if it be found upon trial that an unlawful and forcible entry has been made, or that the said lands and tenements are held by force, or that the same, after lawful or peaceable entry, are held unlawfully, or that the same are held unlawfully against the tribe by those claiming to be members thereof, and the membership and right is disallowed by the court, then said court shall cause the parties charged with unlawfully holding said possessions to be removed from the same and cause the lands and tenements to be restored to the person or persons or nation or tribe of Indians entitled to the possession of the same.

SEC. 4. That before any action by any tribe or person shall be commenced under section 3 of this act it shall be the duty of the party bringing the same to notify the adverse party to leave the premises for the possession of which the action is about to be brought, which notice shall be served at least thirty days before commencing the action by leaving a written copy with the defendant, or if he can not be found, by leaving the same at his last known place of residence or business with any person occupying the premises over the age of 12 years, or if his residence or business address can not be ascertained, by leaving the same with any person over the age of 12 years upon the premises sought to be recovered and described in said notice.

SEC. 5. That the summons shall not issue in such action until the chief or governor of the tribe or person or persons bringing suit in his own behalf shall have filed a sworn complaint on behalf of the tribe or himself with the court, which shall as near as practicable describe the premises so entered upon or detained, and shall set forth either an unlawful and forcible entry and detention or an unlawful and forcible detention after a peaceful entry, or a detention without the consent of the person bringing said suit or the tribe by one whose membership is denied by it: Provided, That if the chief or governor refuse or fail to bring suit in behalf of the tribe, then any person authorized by the council of the tribe may make complaint and bring said suit.

SEC. 6. That no continuance shall be granted for a longer period than thirty days, unless the defendant applying therefor shall give an undertaking, if required by the court, to the adverse party, with good and sufficient sureties, to be approved by the judge of the court, conditioned for the payment of all damages and costs and double the rent that may accrue if judgment be rendered against the defendant.

SEC. 7. That when a judgment for restitution shall be entered by the court the judge shall, at the request of the plaintiff or his attorney, issue a writ of execution thereon which shall command the proper officer of the court to cause the defendant or defendants to be forthwith removed and ejected from the premises and the plaintiff given complete and undisturbed possession of the same. The writ shall also command the said officer to levy upon the property of the defendant or defendants subject to execution, and also collect therefrom the costs of the action and all accruing costs in the service of the writ; said writ shall be executed within ten days.

SEC. 8. That the rolls of citizenship of the several tribes as now existing are hereby confirmed, and any person who shall claim to be entitled to be added to said rolls as a citizen of either of said tribes and whose right thereto has either been denied or not acted upon, or any citizen who may within six months from and after the passage of this act desire such citizenship, may apply to the legally constituted court or committee designated by the several tribes for such citizenship, and such court or committee shall determine such application within thirty days from the date thereof.

SEC. 9. That the commission heretofore appointed under acts of Congress approved March 3, 1893, and March 2, 1895, or their successors, to negotiate with the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, in addition to the authority already conferred upon them by law, are authorized and directed to proceed at once to hear and determine the application of all persons who may apply to them for citizenship in any of said nations, and after such hearing they shall determine the right of such applicant to be so admitted and enrolled: Provided, however, That such application shall be made to such commissioners within six months after the passage of this act. The said commissioners shall decide all such applications within ninety days after the same shall be made. That in determining all such applications said commission shall respect all laws of the several nations or tribes not inconsistent with the laws of the United States, and all treaties with either of said nations or tribes, and shall give due force and effect to the rolls, usages, and customs of each of said nations or tribes.

SEC. 10. That the said commission, after the expiration of nine months, shall cause a complete roll of citizenship of each of said nations to be made up from their records, and add thereto the names of citizens whose right may be conferred under sections 8 and 9 of this act, and said rolls shall be, and are hereby, made rolls of citizenship of said nations or tribes, subject, however, to the determination of the United States courts, as provided herein.

In the performance of such duties said commission, and each of them, shall have power and authority to administer oaths, to issue process for and compel the attendance of witnesses, and to send for persons and papers, and all depositions and affidavits and other evidence in any form whatsoever heretofore taken where the witnesses giving said testimony are dead or now residing beyond the limits of said Territory, and to use every fair and reasonable means within their reach for the purpose of determining the rights of persons claiming such citizenship, or to protect any of said nations from fraud and wrong, and the rolls so prepared by them shall be hereafter held and considered to be the true and correct rolls of persons entitled to the rights of citizenship in said several tribes: Provided, That if the tribe, or any person, be aggrieved with the decision of the tribal authorities or the commission provided for in this act, it or he may appeal from such decision to the United States district court: Provided, however, That the appeal shall be taken within sixty days, and the judgment of the court shall be final, and such appeal shall not suspend or delay the allotment of lands as provided for in this act.

When the roll of citizenship of any one of said nations or tribes is fully completed, as hereinbefore provided, and the survey of the lands of said nation or tribe is also completed, the said commission shall proceed to allot the exclusive use and occupancy of all the lands of said nation susceptible of allotment among the citizens thereof, to them and their heirs, as shown by said roll, giving to each so far as possible his fair and equal share thereof, considering the nature and fertility of the soil, location, and value of same. All known and valuable coal and mineral deposits and town sites are reserved to the several tribes, and shall be set apart as incapable of division. When such allotment of the lands of any tribes has been by them completed, said commission shall make full report thereof to the Secretary of the Interior for his approval, reporting all town sites, coal and other mineral deposits thus reserved, or other property which they find incapable of division, and giving reasons why the same can not be divided; and the Secretary shall thereupon direct the disposition of the use of such undivided property in the best manner for the benefit of the respective tribes: Provided, That allotments herein provided for shall not impair any rights heretofore granted by Congress: Provided further, That whenever it shall appear that any member of a tribe is in possession of lands to an amount in excess of the number of acres to which he shall be entitled by reason of the allotment hereinbefore provided for, his allotment shall be made out of the lands in his possession if the holder so desires as the said commission may select: Provided further, That if the person to whom an allotment shall have been made shall be declared, upon appeal as herein provided for by any of the courts of the United States in or for the aforesaid Territory, to have been illegally accorded rights of citizenship, and for that or any other reason declared to be not entitled to any allotment, he shall be ousted and ejected from said lands; that all persons known as intruders who have been paid for their improvements under existing laws, who may be found under the provisions of this act to be entitled to citizenship, shall, within thirty days thereafter, refund the amount so paid them, with 6 per cent interest, to the tribe entitled thereto; and upon their failure so to do said amount shall become a lien upon all improvements owned by such person in such Territory, and may be enforced by such trib; and unless such person makes such restitution no allotments shall be made to him.

SEC. 11. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to provide rules and regulations in regard to the leasing of coal, mineral, and timber lands, and whenever either of the tribes shall hereafter make a lease of coal, mineral, or timber land the same shall be done in compliance with the directions of the Secretary of the Interior; and any lease for any such land hereafter made shall be absolutely void until approved by him: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall impair the rights of any holder or owner of a leasehold interest in any coal rights, coal claims, mineral or timber rights, which have been acquired with the consent or authority of Congress, but all such interests shall continue unimpaired hereby: And provided further, That when, under the customs and laws heretofore existing and prevailing in the Indian Territory, leases have been made of different groups or parcels of coal deposits and possession has been taken thereunder and improvements made for the development of such coal deposits by lessees or their assigns, which have resulted in the production of coal in commercial quantities by such lessees or their assigns, then such parties in possession shall be given preference in the making of new leases, in conformity with the laws of the tribe, and in compliance with the directions of the Secretary of the Interior; and in making new leases due consideration shall be made for the improvements of such lessees, and in all cases the leasing or renewal of leases of coal deposits preference shall be given to parties in possession who have made improvements.

SEC. 12. That when the allotment of lands of any member of a tribe is made, a record of the same shall be made and kept by the officers of the tribe, and a full report thereof made to the Secretary of the Interior, and after the said Secretary of the Interior shall confirm the same, the persons making such selections shall remain in peaceable and undisturbed possession thereof, subject to the provisions contained in section 2 hereof.

SEC. 13. That if the person to whom an allotment is made shall die, leaving no widow or descendants surviving him, then such land shall revert to the tribe and may be allotted by the Secretary of the Interior to any citizen of said tribe who shall be without allotted land. But in the event of the death of any person to whom an allotment is made, who shall leave a widow or children surviving him, then said lands shall go to the use and occupancy of said widow during her lifetime, and his children during their minority, and upon her death the same shall go to the use and occupancy of the children of the original allottee, share and share alike, with the same rights, however, as said lands were originally held by the original allottee.

SEC. 14. That all actions for restitution, ejectment, and possession of real property under this act must be commenced by the service of a summons within two years after the passage of this act where the wrongful entry, detention, and posession began prior to the date of its passage, and all actions which shall be commenced hereafter based upon wrongful entry, detention, and possession committed since the passage of this act must be commenced within two years after the cause of action accrued. And nothing in this act shall take away the right to maintain an action for unlawful and forcible entry and detainer, given by the act of Congress passed May 2, 1890 (26th United States Statutes, page 95).

SEC. 15. That said commission is further authorized and directed to cause to be surveyed and laid out town sites at such places as they may deem expedient and necessary for the needs of the people and the prosperous growth of the country, at the present sites of towns and at such other places as may seem necessary, opening or laying off such streets, alleys, and other grounds as they may deem sufficient, and giving to such town sites such extent of territory as may appear necessary for the future growth thereof, and making correct and proper plats of each town, and filing said plats in the clerk's office of the United States court in the district in which said towns are located, to be there recorded: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to vest any right or title in anyone occupying any of said lots or lands so laid off into town sites: Provided further, That the said commission provided for in this act may exempt from ground rental a sufficient amount of land near such town for cemetery purposes, and such lots inside of such towns upon which to erect churches, public-school buildings, or buildings for the purpose of education or charity, and public parks, and also shall exempt from ground rental all property used or occupied under former acts of Congress.

SEC. 16. That upon the approval by the Secretary of the Interior of the plats the said commission is authorized to let and lease any and all of the lots in such town at not less than the annual ground rental fixed by them and approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and for terms of one year, and renewals shall be for the same period as the original letting. The ground rental herein provided for shall be paid by the lessee into the Treasury of the United States for the benefit of the tribe or nation in whose territory such town is located, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

In making such leases, and the renewal of leases, preference shall be given to the owner of the improvements upon such lots, or to the person in the possession of the same, as the case may be. Should the owner of any such improvement neglect or refuse to lease the said lot or lots, then said commission shall lease to any other person or persons on the terms provided in this act. The rightful owners of improvements or the possessors of lots shall have preference to lease as herein provided.

SEC. 17. That should any lessee of lots, in such towns as are provided in this act, in possession of any lot or lots, neglect or refuse to pay the ground rental within thirty days after the same be due and demanded by the proper officer, such overdue ground rental shall become a lien upon the improvements situated thereon.

SEC. 18. That the inhabitants of any town in said Territory having two hundred or more residents therein may proceed, by petition to the United States court in the district in which such town is located, to have the same incorporated as provided in chapter 29 of Mansfield's Digest of the Statutes of Arkansas, if not already incorporated thereunder, and such town government, when so authorized and organized, shall possess all the powers and exercise all the rights of similar town governments in said State of Arkansas. All male inhabitants of such towns over the age of 21 years, who are citizens of the United States or of either of said tribes, who have resided therein more than six months next before any election held under this act shall be qualified voters at such election.

All elections shall be conducted under the provisions of chapter 56 of said digest, entitled "Elections," so far as the same may be applicable; and all inhabitants of such towns, without regard to race, shall be subject to all laws and ordinances of such town governments, and shall have equal rights, privileges, and protection therein. Such town governments shall in no case have any authority to impose upon or levy any tax against any lands in said towns; but all other property, including all improvements on town lots, which for the purposes of this act shall be deemed and considered personal property, together with all occupations and privileges, shall be subject to taxation. And the town councils of such town governments, for the support of the same, and for school and other public purposes, may provide by ordinance for the assessment, levy, and collection, annually, of a tax upon such property, not to exceed in the aggregate 1 per cent of the assessed value thereof, in manner provided in chapter 129 of said digest, entitled "Revenue," and for such purposes may also impose a tax upon occupations and privileges.

Such town councils may also establish and maintain free schools in such towns, under the provisions of sections 6258 to 6276, inclusive, of said digest; and may exercise all the powers conferred upon special school districts in towns in the State of Arkansas by the laws of said State when the same are not in conflict with the provisions of this act.

For the purposes of this section all the laws of said State of Arkansas herein referred to, so far as applicable, are hereby put in force in said Territory; and the United States court therein shall have jurisdiction to enforce the same, and to punish any violation thereof: Provided, That owners and holders of leases shall be privileged to transfer the same.

SEC. 19. That it shall be unlawful for any person, after the passage of this act, to claim, demand, or receive for his own use or for the use of anyone else any royalty on stone, coal, or other mineral, or on any timber or lumber, or any other kind of property whatsoever, or any rents on any lands or property belonging to any one of said tribes or nations in said Territory, or for anyone to pay to any individual any such royalty or rents or any consideration therefor whatsoever; and all royalties and rents hereafter payable to the tribe shall be paid, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the tribe to which they belong: Provided, That where any citizen shall be in possession of only such amount of agricultural or grazing lands as would be his just and reasonable share of the lands of his nation or tribe and that to which his wife and minor children are entitled, he may continue to use or receive the rents thereon until allotment has been made to him: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall impair the rights of any member of a tribe whose allotment of lands may hereafter disclose coal or other minerals from using the same for his or her own use and benefit.

SEC. 20. That it shall be unlawful for any citizen of any one of said tribes to inclose, or in any manner, by himself or through another, directly or indirectly, to hold possession of any greater amount of lands or other property belonging to any such nation or tribe than that which would be his approximate share of the lands belonging to such nation or tribe, and that of his wife and his minor children as per allotment herein provided; and any person found in such possession of lands or other property in excess of his share and that of his family, as aforesaid, or having the same in any manner inclosed, at the expiration of nine months after the passage of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

SEC. 21. That any person convicted of violating any of the provisions of sections 19 and 20 of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and punished by a fine of not less than $100, and shall stand committed until such fine and costs are paid (such commitment not to exceed one day for every $2 of said fine and costs), and shall forfeit possession of any property in question, and each day on which such offense is committed or continues to exist shall be deemed a separate offense. And the United States district attorney in said Territory is required to see that the provisions of said sections are strictly enforced, and he shall at once proceed to dispossess all persons of such excessive holding of lands and to prosecute them for so unlawfully holding the same.

SEC. 22. That all per capita payments hereafter made to the citizens of any of said nations shall be paid directly to each individual citizen by a bonded officer of the United States, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, who shall be required to render strict account for such disbursements to Congress.

SEC. 23. That said commission shall have power to employ such assistants as may be found necessary in the performance of its duties, such employment to be first approved by the Secretary of the Interior, who may fix their compensation.

SEC. 24. That all rights of way granted to railroad corporations whose lines have heretofore been constructed, and at the time of the passage of this act are being operated, and those granted by act of Congress which are now in the course of construction, or are hereafter constructed as provided in the act or acts of Congress granting the right, together with such lands as they were or are authorized to take or acquire for depot or rights of way, sidings, and freight or storage purposes, are hereby confirmed.

SEC. 25. That whenever the executive of any State or Territory shall demand of the United States judge of any of the districts in the Indian Territory any person as a fugitive from justice, and shall have complied with the requirements of the act of Congress in regard to requisitions on governors of States in similar cases, it shall be the duty of the judge of the district to issue a warrant, under the seal of the court, directed to the United States marshal, for the apprehension of such person.

SEC. 26. That every warrant so issued may be served in any part of the Territory, and when the person named in the warrant is arrested, he shall be taken before the judge; and if, upon hearing, the judge is satisfied that the person arrested is a fugitive from justice, he shall order that the prisoner be delivered to the agent or officer of the State demanding him.

SEC. 27. That no act, resolution, ordinance, or decree of the councils of either of said tribes in any manner affecting the public domain, moneys, or other property of the tribe, the right of any person to employ any kind of labor, the rights of persons who have taken the oath of allegiance to the United States Government, or its authorities, shall be of any validity after the passage of this act, until approved by the President of the United States; and all such acts, resolutions, ordinances, and decrees so approved shall be published in at least two newspapers having a bona fide circulation in the Territory of the tribe affected thereby, with such approval, before the same shall be valid.

SEC. 28. That the said commission is hereby authorized and directed to make a full and complete roll of all those persons residing in the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, and designated in article 3 of the treaties of said nations of April 28, 1866, as "persons of African descent residing in said nation at the date of the treaty of Fort Smith, and their descendants, heretofore held in slavery among said Indians," who shall not be found by said commission to be entitled to be enrolled as citizens of said nation; and the said Secretary of the Interior shall make his report thereon, showing whether the stipulations described in said treaty of April 28, 1866, for the benefit of said persons, have been fulfilled, with his recommendation for such action by Congress as in his judgment is required.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I demand a second on the motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

Mr. TATE. I object.

Mr. TATE and Mr. SHERMAN were appointed tellers.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 77, noes 14.

Mr. TATE. No quorum.

The Speaker proceeded to count the House.

Mr. TRACEY (before the count was concluded). I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. One hundred and eighty members are present—a quorum. The motion to suspend the rules is seconded.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I shall occupy but a moment in speaking on this bill; and then I shall yield to the gentlemen composing the subcommittee that did most of the work in framing the measure. There were introduced some three or four bills on the general subject of ameliorating the condition of affairs in the Indian Territory. Those bills were considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs for many weeks. The members of the Dawes Commission were before the committee time and time again, discussing fully the condition of affairs in the Indian Territory. Full hearings were given to the representatives of every tribe of Indians in the Territory. The Committee on Indian Affairs sat daily between three and four weeks until every interest desiring to be heard upon the propositions covered by the various bills had had the fullest possible hearing. And then that subcommittee took up the subject and framed the bill which is now presented as a substitute for the various propositions which were before the committee for its consideration.

It has the approval, Mr. Speaker, of these gentlemen; it has the unanimous approval of the full committee; it has the approval of the Indian Bureau, the Secretary, and of the Dawes Commission; and I believe it has the approval of every person who has any understanding of the condition of affairs in that Territory and who desires to see a step taken in the line of better government and progress among the people there. The bill as presented gives proper consideration to every interest involved, and is the first important step to civilize the uncivilized and advance the condition of over one-quarter of a million of people, now residing within the limits of the Indian Territory. I believe it ought to pass; yes, without opposition.

I now yield to my colleague on the committee, Mr. LITTLE of Arkansas, for ten minutes.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, the recent history of this country furnishes no more striking examples or illustrations of a lawless condition of affairs which has worked to unsettle all progress and destroy all material interests than are to be found in the Indian Territory. The growing shame of that country is, first, the nonenforcement of law in the Indian courts; second, a monopoly in landholding, and thirdly, the unfortunate condition of the many towns inhabited by good citizens situated in all parts of it.

The bill that the Committee on Indian Affairs has now presented for the consideration of the House has been the result of many months of labor on the part of that committee. Objections have been met and remedied, until the bill now presented is the unanimous voice of that committee as to what they believe ought to be done; not what many of us believe should have been done, but that this, at least, should be done under present circumstances as an urgent necessity.

In the first place it has become a notorious fact that the Indian courts in that Territory are incapable of enforcing their laws and unable to protect the lives and the property of their own people. This is a well-recognized fact by all persons who are at all familiar with the condition of affairs existing in that Territory.

This bill provides that all criminal jurisdiction shall be vested in the Federal courts in the Territory. It gives the right of appeal from the Indian courts in civil cases to the Federal courts. To that extent it affects the jurisdiction of the courts there. It provides next for completing and finishing the rolls of citizens of that country for a just, equitable, and legal distribution of the common property. These rolls are essential and necessary before a step can be taken looking to a just division of this property.

It is a crying shame, as I said at the beginning of my remarks to-day, that a few people, some of them members of the Indian tribes, and many of them in whose veins not a drop of Indian blood flows, should absorb the public domain of the Territory, as they are absorbing its wealth steadily, in violation of the treaty rights of the Indian people.

This bill seeks to remedy what all recognize as an evil in that respect, and that is that the lands, as soon as they are surveyed (not the title, for the title is maintained intact to the tribes under the treaties)—but it is made the duty of the commission, after the survey of the land is made, to set apart the right of occupancy equally to every member of every tribe in the Territory.

It seems to me that any man who loves justice to the Indians must see the wisdom and the necessity of such an enactment, and that there can be no possible objection to this provision. It is in proof beyond controversy that in one tribe 61 people occupy no less than 1,250,000 acres of this land. In another tribe 21 people occupy 164,000 acres of the public domain. And yet hundreds and thousands of their citizens are without homes and land.

This bill does not affect the title, but decrees that the occupancy of the land shall be set apart to these people. In the towns, many of them with three, four, five, or six thousand inhabitants they stand in that country absolutely without any corporate or municipal law governing them. They have no means of enforcing health regulations or sanitary rules, no means of protection against fire or otherwise. They are absolutely helpless to-day. The bill provides for the incorporation and organization of the towns.

More than that, Mr. Speaker, there are some hundred and fifty thousand white children in that country without schools, growing up in utter ignorance to become part of the bone and blood of this great nation. This bill provides that they shall have the benefit of a common-school education; that school shall be established and maintained by taxes levied on the property of noncitizens, and I believe a provision of that character looking to the education of these children will meet the approval of this House without any dissent. As to the leases in that country, this bill maintains those that are legal. The others are disregarded, and the land is directed to be set apart, as I have said.

As to the abolition of the criminal jurisdiction of these courts, I have in mind an instance where only a few weeks ago the sheriff of one of the counties was murdered in open daylight, and the next day the murderer announced himself as a candidate for successor to the position of the man he had murdered.

In the courts of the Choctaw Nation 14 criminals charged with murder forfeited their bonds and went into an organization and defied the courts of the Territory. This bill, in order to create uniformity in the administration of the law, invests the criminal jurisdiction over all the people, without regard to race, in the Federal courts of that country. More than that, the bill provides for an investigation of the condition and status of the colored population of the Choctaw Nation who claim the rights of citizenship.

I wish I had time to consider this bill section by section and explain it to this House, because I feel sure that it would commend itself to every man who wants to see the right done and the treaties carried out with these people.

This bill does not violate a treaty with the Indians. In every treaty between the United States and any tribe it is provided that it shall be the duty of the Government to maintain and protect life and property in the Territory. That right is reserved to the Government, and order can not be restored until the conditions in that country are broken up.

Why, sir, if you will travel over that country—the richest in almost all the land, you will see men occupying hundreds and thousands of acres to which they have no right. On the other hand, you will see the young Indian who has called to his heart the young, loving squaw who is to preside over his home in future hunting for land on which to erect an honest little cabin home in which to live. He finds the land guaranteed to him by the treaties, guaranteed to him by this Government, yet he can not obtain it. It is in the possession of another. And disappointed and broken-hearted they enter the battles of life, while others feast upon their inheritance. These things have commended themselves to the committee. The committee have acted with great earnestness, and have endeavored to protect every interest in that country. We urge this Congress to raise its hand in defense of these defenseless people, the Indians themselves. The lobbyists who hang around this Capitol pay their expenses out of money which they have extorted from their own people, and are not representative in their character. The fruits of their own criminality is used to further their extortions and monopolies.

I beg this Congress, in the name of the rights of the people in the Indian Territory, to give to them, under the law, the rights which the treaties guarantee to them. Do not let the tribes handle these rolls as a political football. Let the authorities of the Government make an authorized roll and then set apart the lands for these Indians. Why, sir, it is not infrequent in that country when a man is arrested, charged with crime, for him to stand in with the Indian authorities and have his name placed on the roll as an Indian. That defeats the jurisdiction of the Federal courts. Then, if the Indian courts seek to pursue him, they strike him off the roll and the Indian courts have no jurisdiction.

A number of cases of that sort have happened, resulting in a mere trifling with the sacred rights of the people and resulted in the exoneration of the worst criminals. I urge upon Congress the necessity of prompt action. We have waited and waited for these Indian governments to do something to relieve their people, but they are dumb to the appeals of justice. Commission after commission and committee after committee have gone into that country and investigated the condition of these tribes, and they return here telling you with one voice of the conditions which exist there. There is no disagreement in that regard. If you seek to make that country a country of law, of order, and of equal rights of the people to whom it belongs, it is the duty of Congress either to pass this measure or some other measure of similar import, giving to the Indian his rights and to the good, honest American citizens of that country protection to their lives and families and education for their children. [Applause.]

How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has one minute remaining.

Mr. LITTLE. I yield that back to the gentleman in charge of the time.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I should like to ask the gentleman is this bill approved by the Dawes Commission?

Mr. LITTLE. It is substantially on the same line as their bill. It is not so radical as the one which they recommend.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I yield ten minutes to my colleague, Mr. TRACEY.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion this bill is entirely too important to be passed under a suspension of the rules, without opportunity for amendment. There are some good features in the bill, which, in my opinion, ought to become law, but it ought to be amended in some respects; and without an opportunity to amend it it ought not to be taken up and passed. There are several particulars in which amendments are necessary in order to preserve existing rights. Those rights ought not to be disregarded, because they are the rights of men who have invested considerable sums of money in the development of property in the Territory. Those rights ought not to be trampled upon. They ought not to be disregarded, and unless the bill is amended in some particulars they will be disregarded.

Now, I hold this to be an absolutely just position. In the years gone by men have been invited to go into the Indian Territory and other portions of that country down there and develop the coal and mineral lands. They have accepted that invitation and gone there. Some of them, about whom I know personally, have invested a good many thousands of dollars in the development of those lands.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. TRACEY. Yes; certainly.

Mr. LITTLE. The bill protects their rights.

Mr. TRACEY. In my opinion it does not.

Mr. LITTLE. It certainly does.

Mr. TRACEY. I understand it is the belief of the committee that in section 11 they have protected all these rights, but I do not think the section is sufficiently explicit to protect the rights to which I refer.

With reference to what constitutes the matter in issue in the case of the renewal of a lease, the language is not sufficiently explicit, in my opinion. I should like to make it more explicit, and that is one of the reasons why I am opposed to the consideration of so important a bill as this in this way.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the gentleman kindly read section 11, which covers that point?

Mr. TRACEY. I have read section 11 three or four times, or half a dozen times. The provision to which the gentleman refers reads as follows:

That when, under the customs and laws existing and prevailing in the Indian Territory, leases have been made of different groups or parcels of coal deposits and possession has been taken thereunder and improvements made for the development of such coal deposits by lessees or their assignees——

Mr. SHERMAN. Read the provision that begins on line 6.

Mr. TRACEY (reading):

That nothing herein contained shall impair the rights of any holder or owner of a leasehold interest in any coal rights, coal claims, mineral or timber rights which have been acquired with the consent or authority of Congress, but all such interests shall continue unimpaired hereby.

That is all very true. But when you come to the succeeding provision, talking about the renewal of leases, you do not continue the language used in that provision; and hence in the following provision, if it is necessary to put it in at all, the same explicit language ought to govern and control the leases; that is to say, specifying the right that any holder or owner of the leasehold has under the provision referred to:

And provided further, That when under the customs and laws heretofore existing, etc.

Now, under that provision, instead of using the language of the provision just read, you have:

In making new leases due consideration shall be made for the improvements of such lessees, and in all cases the leasing or renewal of leases of coal deposits preference shall be given to parties in possession who have made improvements.

Now, if the language of the provision covering the first provision had been continued, so that the subject of the leases or the renewal of leases of coal deposits was included as specifically as in the first provision for coal claims and mineral or timber claims, then I think it would not still be perfect as to the rights of the parties about which I am talking, but they would be certainly much better protected than they are in the bill as it is. In other words, it is not sufficiently explicit in the latter part. "And in all cases of the leasing or renewal of leases" it should be, and the specification should be made as in the first provision, where the words "coal and coal deposits" are used in the latter part of the section. It ought to be construed, and the law ought to so state, as to "coal rights, coal claims, mineral or timber rights." That ought to be provided for in the last as well as in the first provision.

Evidently it was the intention of the framers of the bill to guard and protect the interests of these men who have invested their money for the purpose of developing the coal mining in that country. It is evident that they intended to do it, but I do not think they have done it. There is at least a question of doubt as to whether they have done it; and when it comes to the renewal of leases down there, there ought to be a provision more explicit than there is here, which gives a preference to those men who have invested their money. That is attempted to be guarded here in the bill, but I do not think the language is as explicit upon that point as it ought to be in order to guard and protect the rights of the people who have invested their money down in the Territory.

Now, for these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the passage of this bill in this way, and for an additional and larger reason than that—that no bill involving what is involved in this bill, no bill having the importance that this bill has, ought to be taken up and passed under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, I have been endeavoring to consider this bill in a few moments. Of course I was not aware that it would be taken up at this time. I have examined it to some extent heretofore, and I am inclined to believe that the bill in many particulars is a very excellent one. There is one objection I had to the bill, but since making that objection I have been informed by a member of the committee that the committee concede the correctness of my opposition and that an effort will be made in the Senate to have an amendment inserted.

Now, from our part of the country quite a number of people have gone down into the Indian Territory, have been invited down there, for the purpose of improving the farms, and they made leases that have been heretofore recognized as valid. These parties have acted upon these leases and have expended large amounts of money in the improvement of farms with the privilege of keeping them from five to seven and eight years to pay them for making these improvements. Now, it seems to me that this bill does not protect the rights of these persons; but the committee suggests that an effort or application will be made in the Senate to amend this bill so as to protect the rights of these people. You can readily see that if this bill should go through in its present condition, if the construction is to be placed on it that it annuls and vacates all these leases, it would be a manifest injustice to a large number of persons. For that reason I have opposed the passage of this bill. It seems to me it is an unsafe thing to pass a bill and then submit it to the other body, the Senate, and take our chances to secure an amendment which is conceded should be made in this House.

It would have been far better for those who have been interested in this bill that it should wait until it could be considered in a proper way, and all suitable amendments could be suggested. This is a bill dealing with very important questions. That we need legislation along the line proposed in this bill there is no question; but we should proceed in a careful way about this matter, so as not to do an injustice to a great number of citizens who have honestly gone down there to develop that country and have expended their time and their money. They should not have their rights, I say, trampled under foot, in order that we may protect the rights of some one else. For that reason I can not vote for this measure in its present condition. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish the gentleman would occupy all his time now.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Unless some other gentleman desires to be heard, I have no further remarks to make.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then let us take the vote.

The question being taken on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill, the Speaker declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. TATE. I ask for a division.

Mr. KEM. Mr. Speaker, it is evident that there is no quorum, and I make that point.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 85, noes none.

Mr. TATE. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) adjourned.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

SENATE.

TUESDAY, June 2, 1896.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. HALE, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

COST OF PRODUCTION OF GOLD AND SILVER BULLION.

Mr. PEFFER. I have had frequent requests recently for Senate Report No. 1310, second session Fifty-second Congress. Upon inquiry I find that the edition has been exhausted. I ask that it may be reprinted. It is a report of the Committee on Mines and Mining.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8293) "making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for prior years, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 10, 12, 20, 58, 59, 62, 75, 76, 77, 89, 114, 146, 176, and 186.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 11, 13, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 21, 22, 23, 26, 28, 29, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 60, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 78, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 90, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 144, 145, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 187, 188, 189, 191, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, and 232, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 61, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$304"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 91, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert said amendment after line 10 on page 37 of the bill; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 92, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$64,951.03"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 93, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$307,094.62"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 143, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$134.85"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 199, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"To pay Mrs. Hattie Newsom, widow of James A. Newsom, who died while a member of the Capitol police, $450, being one-half of a year's salary."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 214 and 215, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendments insert after the matter inserted by amendment numbered 179 the following:

"To pay Henry A. Du Pont, in full compensation for all his time and expenses, including printing and counsel fees, in prosecuting his claim to a seat in the Senate of the United States as a Senator from the State of Delaware, $2,500.

"To pay James L. Wolcott, for himself and associates, counsel in opposition to the claim of Henry A. Du Pont, the same to embrace all their disbursements and expenses of the prosecution of their case in such opposition, $2,500."

And the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference have been unable to agree on the amendments of the Senate numbered 14, 24, 25, 27, 30, 31, 37, 74, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 103, 104, 105, 106, 122, 137, 147, 148, 190, 192, 200, 207, and 208.

EUGENE HALE,
W. B. ALLISON,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. G. CANNON,
S. A. NORTHWAY,
JOSEPH D. SAYERS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate further insist on its amendments still in disagreement between the two Houses, and request a further conference thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference; and Mr. HALE, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. COCKRELL were appointed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a memorial of the Downing and Lawrence Dry Dock Company, of Brooklyn, N. Y., remonstrating against the adoption of amendment numbered 45 to the river and harbor appropriation bill, giving to the estate of the late J. P. Robinson land in Gowanus Bay Channel, at the foot of Court street; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PRITCHARD presented a petition of Biltmore Branch, Journeymen Stone Cutters' Association of North America, of Asheville, N. C., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the use of stone cut by convict labor in penitentiaries in the construction of public buildings by the Government; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BURROWS (for Mr. MCMILLAN) presented petitions of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, of Somerset Center, Mich., praying for the enactment of a Sunday-rest law for the District of Columbia; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GALLINGER (for Mr. MCMILLAN), from the Committee on the District of Columbia, submitted a report to accompany the bill (H. R. 8469) to authorize the Baltimore and Washington Transit Company of Maryland to enter the District of Columbia, heretofore reported from that committee.

He also (for Mr. MCMILLAN) from the same committee, submitted a report to accompany the bill (S. 2840) to incorporate the East Washington Heights Traction Railway Company of the District of Columbia, heretofore reported from that committee.

He also, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3218) granting an increase of pension to Charles D. Hanscom, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1551) granting a pension to Mrs. Selena McKay, of Suwanee County, Fla., reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SHOUP, from the Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3243) regulating the salaries of printers, bookbinders, and other skilled workmen employed in the Government Printing Office, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also (for Mr. HANSBROUGH), from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1820) granting a pension to Neil McNeil, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BERRY. I am directed by the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1453) for the relief of Daniel Drawbaugh, to report it with an amendment, and submit a report thereon.

Mr. PLATT. I desire to state that this is not a unanimous report; that I disagree to it, with other members of the committee. I ask for a little time in which to prepare the views of the minority, which may be printed with the report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Leave will be granted, in the absence of objection.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3787) for the relief of H. C. Herndon, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2009) to simplify the system of making sales in the Subsistence Department to officers and enlisted men of the Army, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. LINDSAY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 4721) granting an increase of pension to Orleina J. Clark, of Louisville, Ky.;

A bill (H. R. 4720) granting an increase of pension to Isaac H. Whetsel, of Louisville, Ky.;

A bill (H. R. 950) granting increase of pension to John Coombs;

A bill (H. R. 2359) granting a pension to Katherine Zeigenheim, of Louisville, Ky.; and

A bill (H. R. 4604) granting a pension to Jane Fisher.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2916) granting an increase of pension to Mary Sprague, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PALMER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 1022) to increase the pension of Byron Cotton; and

A bill (H. R. 6466) to increase the pension of George V. Barnard.

Mr. BRICE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4888) for the relief of George Hager, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3224) to amend an act approved August 19, 1890, entitled "An act to adopt regulations for preventing collisions at sea," reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

MARY E. CHAMBERLIN.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6221) granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Chamberlin, to report it without amendment. I will state that the Senate passed a bill for this claimant increasing the pension to $40 per month. The House, instead of acting on the Senate bill, passed a House bill at $30 a month. The Senate committee has concluded to report the House bill back without amendment, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Mary E. Chamberlin, widow of Lowell A. Chamberlin, late a captain in the First United States Artillery, and pay her a pension of $30 a month, in lieu of the pension she is now receiving or of that to which she is entitled.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

W. H. MICHAEL.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to report back favorably the resolution referred to that committee yesterday, and on behalf of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] I ask that it be considered at the present time.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. HALE was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate to W. H. Michael the sum of $1,000 for compiling and indexing all the acts imposing duties on imports heretofore passed by Congress, the said compilation having been made and completed under the authority of the Joint Committee on Printing, as authorized by concurrent resolution of January 16, 1896.

HENRY H. BAILEY.

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 3582) to remove the charge of desertion now standing against Henry H. Bailey.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to remove the charge of desertion now standing against Henry H. Bailey, private of Company H, First Massachusetts Heavy Artillery, and record the fact that this soldier died on or about December 21, 1862, while in the service of the United States and in the line of duty.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MILITIA ORGANIZATION.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2849) to promote the efficiency of the militia, to report it with amendments.

I beg leave to say a very few words. The report is not yet ready to be submitted. This bill may be called the essence of the acts that have been attempted in Congress from time to time for a hundred years.

The original militia act of 1795 had hardly passed before George Washington begged that somebody would take up the subject and reorganize the militia properly. Every President from that time down to—I think the last formal recommendation was in 1843—repeatedly called attention to the inefficiency and utter uselessness of the act, which required the enrollment of every single man between the ages of 18 and 45 and required that he should be trained every year, etc.

The act died. Gradually there has grown up by natural selection a system of national guards throughout the States, which is practically an organized militia. Other citizens are practically a reserve militia.

The bill proceeds upon that theory, and we have simply recognized what is in fact in existence and put it in form, and repealed the rubbish of the old law.

There are some delicate questions in regard to the use of the Army, as at elections, for example, and in certain circumstances to enforce the statutes and protect public property, that are provided for in other statutes. Those questions have nothing to do with this bill and we have nothing to do with them. Our bill is simply the business of revision, repealing an old and obsolete act and covering with statute law the National Guard system, which has so happily grown up under the independent legislation and expenditures of the individual States.

The bill will not be called up until the next session, and I make these remarks only that I may forefend misapprehension and speak for its kindly consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the following bills, reported adversely thereon; and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 1285) to promote the efficiency of the militia; and

A bill (S. 833) to promote the efficiency of the militia.

ABRAHAM H. PARKER.

Mr. LINDSAY. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5946) granting an increase of pension to Abraham H. Parker, to report it back favorably without amendment, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place the name of Abraham H. Parker, late private of Company A, Forty-fifth Regiment Kentucky Mounted Infantry, on the pension roll of the United States at the rate of $50 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES H. KILE.

Mr. PRITCHARD. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3184) granting an increase of pension to James H. Kile, to report it with an amendment. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment of the Committee on Pensions was, in line 6, before the word "dollars," to strike out "thirty-six" and insert "twenty-four"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay James H. Kile, late first lieutenant, Battery D, First Tennessee Light Artillery Volunteers, $24 per month, in lieu of $17 he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CELESTE A. BOUGHTON.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1291) granting an increase of pension to Celeste A. Boughton, widow of Bvt. Brig. Gen. Horace Boughton.

The amendment of the House of Representatives was, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "thirty."

Mr. GALLINGER. Inasmuch as the amendment to the bill made by the House of Representatives grants the beneficiary precisely the amount of pension that she is now drawing under the general law, I am constrained to move that the Senate disagree to the amendment and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. PALMER, and Mr. HANSBROUGH were appointed.

LENA D. SMITH.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1342) granting a pension to Lena D. Smith.

The amendment of the House of Representatives was, in line 7, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment made by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

NANCY G. ALLABACH—VETO MESSAGE.

Mr. PALMER. I desire to give notice that to-morrow morning, after the regular morning business is disposed of, I shall ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to call up and consider the bill (S. 894) granting a pension to Nancy G. Allabach, which has been returned to the Senate with the disapproval of the President.

FRANCIS E. HOOVER—VETO MESSAGE.

Mr. GALLINGER. I give notice in the same connection that if the Senate will be kind enough to permit me, I shall at the same time ask for the consideration of the pension veto on the bill (H. R. 1094) granting a pension to Francis E. Hoover, a case that I am very sure will not consume much time when all the facts are known to the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 3251) to procure a site and erect a peace monument at Appomattox, Va.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. CANNON introduced a bill (S. 3252) to increase the pension of Esther Brown; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WOLCOTT introduced a bill (S. 3253) granting an increase of pension to Mark Hathaway; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BRICE introduced a bill (S. 3254) to increase the pension of Mrs. Helen A. De Russy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VILAS introduced a bill (S. 3255) granting a pension to Anna B. Gillett; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ALLISON introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 155) to authorize a scientific investigation of the fur-seal fisheries; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

PRICES OF ARMOR FOR NAVAL VESSELS.

Mr. GORMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 1,000 copies of the testimony taken before the Naval Committee entitled "Prices of Armor for Naval Vessels."

AFFAIRS IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. CHANDLER. I submit a resolution which I ask to have read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be directed to inquire, respecting the southern judicial district for the Indian Territory, into the manner in which contracts have been made for court-houses, jails, and other public buildings, and whether the rentals paid for the same are reasonable, and into the cause for any excessive rentals; into the fees and compensation received by the clerk, commissioners, and other officers before as well as since the creation of said district, and whether any such fees or compensation have been paid by such officers directly or indirectly to any persons not legally entitled to the same, and if so, the cause or consideration for such payment, and whether such fees and compensation have been fair and reasonable; into the appointment of jailers, janitors, criers, deputy clerks, and deputy marshals; whether any appointments have been made in direct or indirect violation of section 7 of the judiciary act approved August 13, 1888, and whether the persons holding these positions have been permitted to receive and retain the full compensation allowed by the Government, or have been required to divide the same with any other persons, and whether the same person has been permitted to hold more than one office; into the appointment of receivers and the granting of injunctions, and the disposition of property in the hands of receivers, and whether any abuses have existed in connection with the receiverships and injunctions and like cases; into the question whether railroads are being constructed wholly on receivers' certificates; into the conduct and appointment of masters and referees in chancery and the class of cases and questions submitted to them, the compensation allowed and how collected, and whether any abuses have existed in the employment of masters or referees; and whether demurrers or other contested questions of law which it was the duty of the judge to hear and determine have been referred to masters and the parties required to pay the expenses of such hearings, and whether any arbitrary methods have been employed to compel the parties to pay for services which it was the duty of the judge to render; and generally into the administration of justice in said district, to determine whether irregularities and abuses have existed, and if so, whether any legislation is necessary to apply remedies therefor.

Mr. CHANDLER. I shall not ask for the adoption of the resolution, but its reference to the Judiciary Committee. I wish, however, to call the especial attention of the Judiciary Committee—and I should like the attention of the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY], if he will listen to me—to the singular fact about which inquiry is made in the resolution, as to whether in the Indian Territory a railroad is being constructed wholly upon receivers' certificates. I had heard of this in one or two ways, and I now have a letter inclosing to me a slip from a newspaper, not stating from what newspaper it came, as follows:

Judge Kilgore, at Ardmore, in the United States court for the southern district of the Indian Territory, on motion by the creditors of the road, placed the Denison and Northern in the hands of a receiver, Moran Scott being appointed such receiver. Now, the court has authorized and directed said receiver to proceed with the construction and equipment of the Denison and Northern from Dougherty, Ind. T., on the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fe Railway, easterly to a point near Coalgate, in said Territory, and from a point near Pennington, in said Territory, on the line of the Denison and Northern, south to the Red River, near the city of Denison, Tex., the lines so to be constructed being about 104 miles. For the purpose of carrying on this construction work the receiver is empowered to issue receiver's certificates at the rate of $11,000 per mile, said certificates to be issued "at the par value thereof," to bear 6 per cent interest per year and to be payable January 1, 1897, to be secured by a lien upon all the rights, franchises, equipment, and appurtenances of every kind, "with right of priority over all other claims except those of complainants in this cause."

I am informed that this company has no assets whatever; that substantially no money whatever has been paid into the treasury of the company, but that the court has appointed Moran Scott a receiver, and that all the means for building this railroad of 104 miles are the receiver's certificates. If this be true, it is a gross perversion of justice, and it ought to be promptly checked by the action of Congress. I call it to the attention of the Senator from Arkansas. He may know something about it.

Mr. BERRY. A Senator told me that the Senator from New Hampshire made some reference to me. What was the reference?

Mr. CHANDLER. The inquiry was whether the Senator knew anything about the construction of the Denison and Northern Railroad in the Indian Territory on receiver's certificates.

Mr. BERRY. I had never heard of the Denison and Northern Railroad, or receiver's certificates, or anything in reference to it in any way whatever until the Senator made his statement. I know nothing about it at all. I never heard any intimation in regard to it.

Mr. CHANDLER. If any judge of a United States court in the Indian Territory or in any other Territory is building a railroad wholly on receiver's certificates the proceeding ought to be checked. I have reason to believe that is being done, and my belief is that the certificates never will be worth the paper they are written on.

Mr. HILL. I suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that this is a practical illustration of the Government running a railroad, and is in accordance with the doctrine advocated by certain people.

Mr. CHANDLER. The broad and statesmanlike view taken on this subject and the lesson which the Senator from New York proposes to draw from it I do not care to discuss now. I am on a narrower line of debate, and that is the proposition that this thing should be arrested by the aid of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, if it can possibly be done.

Mr. BERRY. I would suggest that it is another illustration of the necessity of agreeing to the conference report made by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW], and that legislation should be had with reference to the Indian Territory. The condition of affairs there should be changed at the earliest practicable moment.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am happy to perceive that all is fish that comes to the net of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, just a word. Allusion has been made by the Senator from New Hampshire to the action of Judge Kilgore, of the United States district court for the Indian Territory. I have no familiarity with the particular transaction about which the Senator reads—the newspaper clipping—but I remember at an early day in the present session to have had a conversation with a gentleman connected with the Denison and Northern Railway, and my recollection of the state of the matter is that after a great deal of money had been spent upon the grading of that railroad the company failed and the road was put into the hands of a receiver. Its promoters came to Congress and asked for an extension of time for the construction of their road. Some citizens of Texas were interested in it, and I enlisted myself in securing the necessary extension.

While I know nothing about the particular order of Judge Kilgore to which the Senator from New Hampshire alludes, my information in a general way has been that finding, after the grading of the road was largely completed, that they had no money to continue its construction, in order to prevent the whole project from failing they secured an order from the court to buy the iron so as to make the railroad a serviceable enterprise.

The Senator from New Hampshire criticises that sort of judicial order, and I think myself that such a method of administering receiverships merits disfavor; but it certainly is no novelty. Federal courts have frequently ordered the issuance of receiver's certificates to complete the construction of unfinished lines. The practice has sometimes been a matter of judicial censure. I remember that the late Judge Miller, of the Supreme Court of the United States, on one occasion enlarged a good deal upon this topic, referring sharply to the difficulties in building railroads and protracting receiverships in the Federal courts.

But in this case, as I have said, according to my information, these certificates were authorized as a matter of necessity, and by general consent, to make the railroad an active concern.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CHAPELL, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6994) relating to the sale of gas in the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 9188) authorizing the appointment of a nonpartisan commission to collate information and to consider and recommend legislation to meet the problems presented by labor, agriculture, and capital; and

A bill (H. R. 9275) approving certain acts of the legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, authorizing the issue of certain bonds of said Territory, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution requesting the President to return to the House the bill (H. R. 3279) to authorize the reassessment of water-main taxes, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. 148) granting a pension to Catharine Dillon;

A bill (S. 804) granting a pension to Mrs. Eleanor Carroll Poe;

A bill (S. 807) granting a pension to Charles Williamson;

A bill (S. 819) granting a pension to Catharine Leary;

A bill (S. 997) granting a pension to Ella D. Cross;

A bill (S. 1247) to establish and provide for the maintenance of a free public library and reading room in the District of Columbia;

A bill (S. 1672) granting a pension to Lue R. Brown;

A bill (S. 3161) amending and extending the provisions of an act of Congress entitled "An act approving with amendments the funding act of Arizona," approved June 25, 1890, and the act amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto approved August 3, 1894;

A bill (H. R. 3578) granting a pension to Elmira E. Dustin; and

A bill (H. R. 7578) granting the Flagstaff and Canyon Railroad Company right of way for railroad purposes through the Grand Canyon Forest Reserve in northern Arizona.

PROPOSED FINANCIAL LEGISLATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the Secretary to read the title of the House tariff bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 9749) to temporarily increase revenue to meet the expenses of Government and provide against a deficiency.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, the discussion of the tariff, free coinage, and collateral matter by the Senate having been conducted very largely by one side only, I hope it will not be intrusive for me to ask to be briefly heard on the other side, though I could wish it were represented by more ability.

When Congress met here in December last, all Republicans were supposed to be agreed, in view of the failure of the Wilson tariff bill in supplying sufficient revenue, to add to the receipts of the Treasury thirty or forty million dollars by amending the existing Democratic tariff. They knew that it could not be done by a plenary and thoroughbred Republican tariff bill so long as the executive department was under Democratic control, nor so long as the leadership of the Senate Populists wabbled between the learned and iridescent farmer of Nebraska and the veiled prophet of Kansas. All knew, however, that any tariff additions would afford some incidental protection. The tariff bill of the House of Representatives at the present session proposed this, and very little more. The business of agriculture, manufacture, mercantile trade, and transportation might all be classified, if not wholly in the group of nondividend-paying enterprises, certainly as enterprises so very seriously depressed that even a little incidental protection would have been refreshing to all the group, while the direct aid of more revenue to the Treasury would have been highly appreciated even by Democrats, if conferred, and no questions asked.

The Democratic party might well blush for having proposed in time of peace a clumsily made income tax, but after its defects had been exposed, and the law ignominiously thrown overboard by the Supreme Court, the party might well have admitted without a blush that there would be a shortage of thirty to forty million dollars of revenue. Otherwise the party must concede that it had maladroitly attempted to obtain thirty or forty millions of unnecessary revenue. The expenditures of the Government, compared with its receipts, every month still show a deficit.

The Democrats have broken away from the leadership of their President, and, while marching to the drum and fife of a North Carolina Populist, are in such dread lest the Populists should get control of their party that they seem to be in a hurry to become Populists themselves.

The executive department would seem to be bound by law to maintain the parity of gold and silver money, but with no other means within its reach for the purpose than an issue of bonds for whatever amount might be required. The Republicans were not only willing to provide bonds, as more quickly available in the emergency, but were willing also to provide a more ample revenue to prevent an endless recurrence of such emergencies.

To the bond bill of the House of Representatives the Democrats and Populists of the Senate, in sheer mockery, at once proposed a free-coinage substitute. The stiff refusal of the go-it-alone free-coinage Senators to favor any measure by which gold can be cheaply obtained to maintain the parity of all our money now in circulation undeniably uncovers a purpose, whether acknowledged or not, to stampede the country, if they get the power, to silver monometallism.

The recent obstructive tactics brought forth in the Senate to defeat the "coin redemption fund" bill, as well as also to defeat the emergency tariff bill of the House of Representatives, with a silver coinage substitute, wholly irrelevant, and having no possibility of becoming a law, but contemptuously obtruded solely to defeat the measures of the House, can hardly be regarded as standard Senatorial statesmanship, nor as legitimate opposition by regular party opponents, still less when promoted by those who claim to be friends, and the excuses of such participants, if not merely accusatory of somebody else, must always have a fair hearing, even if unsatisfactory.

The Democratic vote for the substitute is poorly justified by the fact that the party deny any present deficiency of revenue and repudiate all tariff protection, but the hot and cold prevailing reasons for the adverse votes of their auxiliaries was conspicuous, some claiming to hold to the doctrine of protection, yet, like Ensign Stebbins, on prohibition, were against its enforcement, and asserting that the present Democratic tariff was protective or high enough on everything except wool, and that all further revenues should be collected by internal-revenue taxes, that the bill should have been made nonpartisan, and, finally, that the bill was not of a Republican protective tariff character and did not change ad valorem duties to specifics, well knowing that such a tariff bill would not receive an Executive approval.

The incongruous free-coinage silver substitute for the House tariff bill was a repetition of the Senate substitute for the House bond bill—a legislative twin, of which the Committee on Finance only may now be supposed to be especially proud—and illustrates the old apothegm that "Men are but children of a larger growth," as they appear to have as much pleasure in playing with cheap toy silver substitutes to House bills as juveniles ever enjoyed with the repeated and stunning toy show of a jumping-jack-in-the-box.

The tariff bill of the Republican House of Representatives, subjected to remarkable assaults by Republicans, and made with much ability, but with some condiments, perhaps, most agreeable to the taste of our Democratic opponents, was merely an emergency bill to last only until 1898, when it is believed the Executive Mansion will have a Republican occupant and that a less number of free traders in the Senate will disport themselves with revenue bills. Some obloquy seems to have been borrowed to be thrown upon the tariff bill suggesting that "while little or nothing was proposed for wool, the New England woolen mills were very well taken care of." A more careful reading of the House bill might have made it unnecessary to call upon either Ahithophel or Abishai for its true interpretation, as that would have shown the bill to have squarely proposed on first and second class wool, now free, 60 per cent of the duties imposed by the McKinley Act of 1890, and only an equal compensatory duty on woolens, but that the woolen Schedule K was wholly excluded from the additional 15 per cent ad valorem duty proposed upon all other schedules. Was this not right? And does it not choke the life out of any borrowed charge of neglect on wool, or of sectionalism?

When, even in friendly hands, the promotion of sheep husbandry has long been a difficult problem where land is dear and where winter feeding is most expensive. The wools of Australia, Africa, and South America are produced at a cost so small comparatively with all other countries that the duty on wool imported into the United States has to be placed at a rate almost as high as would be expedient if it were a luxury, or it would yield little revenue, and the protection would be wholly inadequate.

The wide difference in the market price of wool before protective duties were repealed and after will show the benefit derived by the woolgrower. The market price of Ohio XX wool in July, 1892, was 28 to 29 cents per pound; in December, 1894, after wool was made free, it was 18 to 18½ cents per pound, and to-day (1896) it is less.

The Democratic tariff has made sheep husbandry no longer successful in any American State, and this most attractive national industry, if free-trade supporters hold the power, is to be wholly and forever abandoned and extinguished. Now, while the woolen mills of Great Britain are busy and have nothing to complain of, here in the United States it is different, where it is reported that only 64 per cent of the hands in the woolen manufacture are now employed, and those at a reduction of wages. The sales of wool daily reported are the smallest ever known, and, among the non-dividend class of mills, the woolen mills are more largely represented than any other.

The bill was sent to the Senate by a Republican majority of the House of Representatives the largest we have had in many years. A Republican caucus of the members of the Senate had instructed the Republican members of the Committee on Finance to support the bill without any amendment. As chairman of a committee, though it was erroneously supposed to have had a majority of its members who were, at least, in favor of incidental protection, I did not think it an "unseemly" discharge of my duties to move the consideration of the tariff bill in the Senate, February 13, and repeated the motion February 25. Both of these motions were defeated, showing conclusively that the tariff bill was not to have any chance, even of amendment, but that the plot of the majority to obtain, through the threatened policy of coercion, the free coinage of silver, was to be inaugurated at once, if possible, by stopping all further tariff supplies.

Whenever the Republican party shall be so unfortunate as to have presented for its adoption any measure not practically for the general welfare, or not worthy of national favor, the party will not mourn to see it slide into oblivion, but the party will spurn the success of even a cardinal measure if it is to degrade its members by being obtained contingently for an equal support of any other measure, good or bad. No man of independence, no freeman goes even to his dinner on compulsion, and no political party will be prone to suicide when it is nearing the goal which promises the mastery with its highest honors.

The National Republican platform of 1892 in relation to silver, though constructed, as recently disclosed, by the distinguished Senators from Colorado and Nevada [Messrs. TELLER and JONES] with the exception only of the best and most important part which provided for the preservation of the money parity of silver with gold, did not secure, as it will be remembered, either the vote of Colorado or Nevada for the Republican ticket. But, if the same distinguished platform builders should this year be intrusted with full authority to give form and substance to the financial part of the Republican platform, there would be as little doubt of their learning and ability to so frame and dovetail it that a victory would be as plump and sure in Colorado and Nevada as would be a Waterloo defeat in other equally important States.

As there have been already elected to the St. Louis convention between seven and eight hundred sound-money delegates, and less than one hundred who favor the free coinage of silver without the cooperation of any other Government, or who want the pockets of the American people to jingle with silver money only, it is very certain that the platform of the Republican party in 1896 will place every dollar of our money in circulation on a parity with the best dollar of the world.

It seldom happens that any member of a political party is read out of the party to which he may have attached himself. Such parties are apt to be tolerant, even of the vagaries of their friends, and do not rashly pursue technical heresies. Occasionally some members will put themselves outside of the party breastworks, especially if pondering a divorce from their party, and then they feel bound to put forth some plausible pretext by finding fault with pending measures. The retention of constantly growling members of a party, like the retention of loose teeth, is rarely possible and never very serviceable.

The political ground under the Democratic party appears dangerously volcanic. In South Carolina a portentous revolt is threatened unless the convention at Chicago favors the free coinage of the 16 to 1 fifty-cent dollar. In Missouri, no longer conservative, an irruption hardly less sublime is indicated by the meteoric denunciations poured out upon sound-money Democrats who may dare to go to their Chicago convention. Even a Democratic President can not adhere to the sound-money doctrine of Jackson and Jefferson without being "barked at by Tray, Blanche, and Sweetheart" of his own party.

Some Republicans of Colorado, also afflicted with the same epidemic, have announced with telling emphasis that if the Republican convention at St. Louis should not sufficiently recognize the claims of silver Colorado would bolt as heretofore, and Mr. Belford claims the State should secede. Idaho, too, is training a bolt, which the trainers do not expect will be as Harmless as summer lightning.

It does not yet appear, however, whether these bolters will all cuddle together in one thunderclap, or each one have a separate and independent bolt. They are all of age, and have the right in a Presidential race to go, bolt, or burst as they please.

No doubt had our country been shielded by a sound protective tariff, during the hopeless years of the present Democratic Administration, much of the business distress and woe of unemployed labor might have been averted; but another adverse and sore bewitchery of all business affairs in the United States, hardly less potent than a free-trade tariff, has been the unceasing agitation of the free coinage of silver, and on a ratio that would not fail to reduce the standard value of our money, as well as the whole fabric of public and private credit, to one-half of its present value. Parties most respectable in numbers and ability, as well as parties with that reputation all yet to win, have together made what they call demonetized silver their snarling and woeful jeremiad, and to them might justly be imputed the fatherhood of much of the unrest and distrust in many industries which now becloud even republican institutions. They have disclosed the fact that the people of several States are not unwilling to pay debts in cheaper money than what they borrowed, nor to obtain wealth by compelling the Government to take their silver bullion at twice its value. The extreme positions thus proclaimed have jostled and prodded all American securities abroad, insomuch that their easily frightened holders have been sending them home on a canter.

There is a lofty imperial assumption among its 16-to-1-standard advocates that silver has a miraculous dignity of character as one of the elect money metals, and that it must not be wickedly degraded by having its value subjected to criticism or to the vulgar test of a commercial market. Therefore any inquiry into the present standing and character of the white metal, even if not as white as it should be, is to be regarded as worthy only of wicked Pharisees and uncircumcised gold bugs.

The droll and weak-backed contention appears to be, if the United States should alone open its mints to the free and unlimited coinage of silver, that it would at once be hoisted to its ancient full-coinage value, and would not only increase the value of the silver actually coined in the United States, but would hypnotize and increase the value of silver in all the markets of the world. The insurmountable impediment to this high-stepping theory is that it is proposed to have the American people assume all of the risk, loss, and shame of a gigantic boomerang in the perilous attempt to boom silver.

It is preposterously claimed by leading supporters of the silver 16-to-1 standard that its consumption in the arts as merchandise, or in whatever manner, however large, except that of free coinage as standard money, will debase and not increase its value, and that even the purchase and coinage of silver is not an equivalent of bimetallism. Nothing less than the perpetual free coinage of silver until the crack of doom, and giving to the owners all the difference between its nominal and its real value, with no charge of seigniorage, it is seriously urged, will prove a wholesome tonic and restore silver to its former prestige and standard value.

According to this hysterical theory the United States may thus indefinitely inflate our currency with silver dollars, but, should their coinage at our mints ever cease or be suspended, the Treasury and our people would find these dollars had suddenly tumbled from their fiat value to that of the paralytic class of 50-cent dollars.

The increase of the annual silver product of the world since 1873 has been very great, that of the United States alone being, in 1894, in coinage value, $77,575,757, or almost as much as the $81,800,000 of the whole world in 1873. Our present stock of silver, now mainly in the Treasury, and a drug wherever pushed as circulation, $624,000,000, is excessive and far beyond any legitimate demand. No one hoards or covets for himself a stock of dear-bought silver any more than he would nurse or covet carbuncles, but all prefer "some other fellow," especially bond-holding gold bugs, should exclusively enjoy the blessing.

If the President now finds it a task of some difficulty to sustain our silver and silver certificates on a parity with gold, obviously an unlimited increase of such currency would be perilous.

If the Government has been sadly overreached financially by taking at a cost much too dear from the mine owners several hundred millions of silver, for which its obligations were exchanged, to circulate as money, it appears to have only prompted the mine owners, after silver has had a further and profounder slump, to shove a bigger job upon the Government and people, and the demand now made is for the free and unlimited coinage of all the silver bullion, domestic or foreign, which may be brought to our mints. For all this our paper obligations, in the shape of silver certificates, are to be exchanged, to circulate as the chief part of our paper money, and be receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues at the rate of $1 for 371¼ grains of silver, or at nearly twice the present value.

The Government can never recoup its loss of over $150,000,000 on its recently acquired stock of silver, as that loss, like the depreciated silver itself, came to stay, but the loss may be indefinitely expanded if the silver autocrats now succeed in their world-wide 16 to 1 free coinage plot. In spite of all past experience, we are asked to stubbornly embark alone in the knight errantry of a world-bounded coinage of silver dollars, having the very significant legend of "Trust in God" prayerfully stamped on their face, but dollars only in circumference and number of pennyweights, not in real value, and with the honorable pledge of the United States to preserve their parity with gold carefully, silently, and wholly omitted.

If it was a great crime in the sixth, fourteenth, and sixteenth centuries for the rulers of nations to grossly debase their silver coins for their own profit and to defraud their subjects by shoving such coins into circulation as standard money, a similar act to-day of defrauding the people can not be sweetened by the denial of any depreciation of the metal or made innocuous by providing that the profit of coining depreciated silver shall accrue to and be pocketed wholly by the owners of silver mines. It would be even more reprehensible for our Government to incite the greed and cupidity not only of our own people, but to spread out an invitation over the whole world to all holders of silver bullion to bring it to our market to be coined as dollars, wrongly stamped as dollars, and paid for and held by our people as dollars, although known to be much less in real value.

Hamilton and Jefferson are entitled to the credit of establishing the ratio of our gold and silver coins, and their labor then was what it would be were they here to-day—to fix the ratio precisely in proportion to the intrinsic value of gold and silver. In 1805, under the Administration of President Jefferson, the coinage of silver dollars was wholly suspended and not resumed for over thirty years. Jefferson then furnished the precedent for what is now denounced as the "demonetization of silver and the great crime of 1873," and yet the learned and alert Senator from Nevada has neither denounced the thirty years of silver demonetization nor the great crime of Tom Jefferson in 1805.

Even at the present reduced value of silver bullion, its pursuit is indisputably more remunerative than that of agriculture or manufactures, and this fact appears to be confirmed by a distinguished Senator from one of the silver fertilized States, who with pardonable exultation has told us that the wealth per capita of his people is two dollars to one compared with that of the more populous Eastern States of Massachusetts and Pennsylvania, and yet all the Senators from the States now enriched or pregnant with silver, rigorously demand about 100 per cent additional profit on their silver bullion through its coinage by the Government, although that profit must come out of the more limited earnings of those whose wealth per capita, after two hundred years of hard labor, by themselves or their ancestors, is only one dollar to two, compared with that in some of these young and more wealthy silver States.

We are often sympathetically informed by silver-tongued orators that Japan manufactures numerous articles—bicycles especially—far cheaper than they can be made in the United States, and that it is the silver currency of the oriental people which confers upon them this mastery by the cheaper payment of their wage earners, who are now receiving less than one-third of what is paid in the United States, and are paid in silver, as they were before its great superabundance had so largely depreciated its value throughout the world.

The patent and only remedy of the United States, as we are pitifully told, is to crush this all-conquering Japanese competition by equalizing our exchanges; that is to say, by pushing our silver coinage to the front, leaving gold behind as a commodity to be bought and sold at a premium, and thus to obtain the supremacy of cheap silver with which to pay all American wage earners. To thus equalize exchanges would not relieve us of the competition unless it brought down American wages, as would be the manifest tendency, to the level of wages in Japan, or brought up Japanese wages to the level of wages in America.

Beyond all controversy, wherever the silver standard of money alone practically prevails, the lowest and poorest standard of wages prevails. The wages of the progressive Japanese, however, within the last ten years have been much increased, and their workmen are likely to demand American wages long before Americans will stoop to accepting wages now current in Japan.

The ludicrous misinformation which supports the broad assertion that countries where the silver-money standard prevails have a hundred per cent premium in their favor of exchange is as much a travesty on the facts as on common sense. The country which uses a depreciated currency falls under many disadvantages and as certainly and swiftly as the man of business whose credit is depreciated. What we buy of silver-standard countries can be paid for in depreciated silver. What they buy of us must be paid for in the best of sound money and nowhere subject to any discount. Free coinage of silver as a remedy against Japanese or any cheap foreign labor would prove very much like taking refuge in a pest-house to avoid the plague.

Bimetallism is nothing more than two-metallism, though sometimes industriously and artfully used to mean the unlimited free coinage of gold and silver, and was first used by Cernuschi, a distinguished Frenchman, soon after Germany and the Latin nations had lost confidence in the stability of silver money, who then began the agitation of a larger use of silver among nations. When this prominent leader of bimetallism visited this country some years later, he was invited by me as the honored guest to a dinner party, and his advice then was against the free coinage of silver without the cooperation of other leading nations, as no nation was competent alone to handle so large a question. M. Cernuschi has reiterated this opinion several times since. If the United States start in this desperate silver risk alone, of course we shall be defeated, and silver will be further humbled and take a lower position in the estimation of all commercial nations.

Certainly an invitation from commercial nations to join in a cooperative agreement for a larger money use of silver would here be accepted by a Republican Administration, and it would be more desirable that the United States should receive rather than offer the invitation, as the American production of silver is comparatively so large that any initiatory step on our part might subject us to the charge of being inspired by the thrifty purpose of securing a better market for our annual domestic product.

Were it as certain, as some extreme silver advocates represent, that no cooperative agreement among leading nations for a larger use of silver can be obtained, that fact alone would be a cogent and sufficient reason why the United States should decline to stultify itself by embarking single-handed in an experiment so reckless and so distrusted as to be shunned and coldly rejected by the statesmen of every enlightened nation.

But this hopeless representation of the silver question in Europe is untrue. The trend of public opinion in Germany and in Great Britain favors tolerance of the question. Very recently Mr. Balfour, the first lord of the treasury, in response to an inquiry whether the Government had refused to cooperate with Germany in furthering an international monetary agreement by reopening the Indian mints, replied that there was no truth in the rumor, and added that "we should willingly consider, in conjunction with the Indian government, the reopening of the Indian mints, if the measure comprised a satisfactory scheme of currency."

As recently as April 20, 1896, there was an international bimetallic conference held at Brussels, with the view of paving the way to international negotiations on the subject, to which delegates were present from Germany, the United States, Great Britain, France, Austria, Russia, Belgium, Denmark, Holland, and Roumania.

It would almost look as though—if the vociferous cry here about opening our mints alone to the free coinage of silver were only to cease—the United States might be invited to a conference where silver would have some practical favor besides wind.

Our Southern States are for the most part far less densely populated than their sister States of equal age, and the acreage of their uncultivated land is enormously greater. The unused water power of their numerous rivers, and their inexhaustible iron ores and coal fields would seem to invite an unlimited expansion of diversified industries as well as a large increase of population. Their material prosperity and advance in the value of their estates in land must be, for generations to come, wholly based upon inspiring confidence in the owners of capital and in many people to move there with the view of finding a safe and conservative home for both labor and property. Instead of this the silver heresy, threatening the stability of all values, rages like an epidemic, and is rampant in the South, where it may be supposed that some advantage will be derived by cheap money in payment of cheap labor, and where, I fear, they are about to show their willingness to bid adieu to any large additional Anglo-Saxon growth.

The highest ambition of all the enterprising people of our new States must be to attract large accessions of an industrious and intelligent class of citizens to their respective States. Will this be accomplished where one industry alone is made dominant, and where all other occupations, if not deemed intrusive, are held as subordinate, or where there is the same dictator in politics as in business? They also want to attract capital to make great and permanent investments within their magnificent boundaries, but, as an attractive sign to tempt either domestic or foreign capital and labor to go west of the Mississippi to build up safe and happy homes, will it be wise to advertise and tolerate no other financial flag but the silver standard at 16 to 1?

If the silver States want tariff on silver as a raw material in which they are largely interested, they may feel sure that Republicans will make no opposition to the imposition of such a tariff; but, if it is only an attempt to unload the depreciated white metal upon the people of the United States by demanding its unlimited coinage as the standard money of final redemption, then it must be discussed upon its present intrinsic or commercial merits, and the ratio of 16 to 1 of gold must now be dismissed as a stupendous fraud upon the pockets of the people, as well as an imputation upon their business capacity.

The free coinage of silver is treated by most of its advocates, not as a great national question touching many large commercial nations, and challenging all of their financial resources, but merely as a local affair to be exclusively handled here by bluffing the whole world with a standing offer by statute law to receive at our mints and coin the present surplus and all the world's product of silver which may be annually presented. For all this, with no charge of seigniorage, the United States is to exchange silver certificates, to go into circulation as money at double the value of the silver received, and then it is claimed, with smooth-faced solemnity, that silver will at once spontaneously flop upward to the same value where it stood years ago, when the annual product was comparatively small and when its coinage had not ceased, as it has now ceased altogether among the largest commercial nations.

There are some persons who accept with reluctance the miracles of the Bible who eagerly accept in advance the miracle thus prophesied by stump orators concerning the resurrection of silver by the magic wand of the United States.

My interest in the silver question is no other than that of every American citizen who would promote the interest and happiness of the greatest number, and the public credit of our Republican Government. I believe the prosperity of the South is absolutely essential to that of the North, and that the prosperity of the West, where the East finds kith and kin in every school district and every church, is the prosperity of the same family. The growth of every State is a subject of national pride. I am glad not to belong to a party which flourishes most in times of adversity, and whose prospects brighten when calamities threaten. I believe the party soon expected to control national affairs will best flourish in days of prosperity, and whose prospects will brighten when our people find full employment and full wages, and are paid in money that will suffer no degradation in contact or exchange with the sound money of the most enlightened and leading nations of the world.

THE NICARAGUA CANAL.

Mr. MORGAN. I am instructed by the Select Committee on the Construction of the Nicaragua Canal to report back the bill (S. 3247) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua," approved February 28, 1881, and submit a report thereon. I ask that the report may be printed, and that the bill may be put upon the Calendar.

I am also instructed by the committee to ask the Senate to fix Monday, the 14th day of December next, as the day on which the bill may be taken up for consideration. I now ask unanimous consent to that effect.

Mr. PETTIGREW. What is the request?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The Senator from Alabama asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that the 14th day of December next shall be fixed for the consideration of the bill which he has reported. Is there objection?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I object.

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection has been made by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW].

JUDGMENTS IN INDIAN DEPREDATION CASES.

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent for the adoption of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be directed to transmit forthwith to the Senate a list of all final judgments rendered in Indian depredation claims since the 21st day of May, 1896, being the date of the last report to Congress.

Mr. HILL. What is the point of the resolution?

Mr. MILLS. The resolution merely calls on the Attorney-General for a report of judgments in Indian depredation cases.

Mr. HILL. Have not all the appropriation bills been passed? No one proposes to legislate in conference committees any more.

Mr. MILLS. It merely asks for a report for the benefit of the Senate. I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask to have the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill laid before the Senate.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the conference report on the bill (H. R. 6249) making appropriations for current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. VILAS. I should like to ask of the Senator from Mississippi, before he begins, the privilege of adding a word or two of information in respect to one branch of the amendment which I did not have yesterday. It will take but a moment. It has reference to the Sisseton and Wahpeton Indians of South Dakota.

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. VILAS. The treaty was made with these Indians on the 12th day of December, 1889, and was ratified on the 3d day of March, 1891. It contained this provision in reference to the lands which were sold by those Indians to the United States:

That the sum so to be paid—

That is, in consideration of the land—shall be held in the Treasury of the United States for the sole use and benefit of the said bands of Indians; and the same, with interest thereon at 3 per cent per annum, shall be at all times subject to appropriation by Congress for the education and civilization of the said bands of Indians or members thereof.

Under that act it has been the custom of the Government to make appropriation from the annual interest in such manner as shall best employ it for the education of the Indians and their civilization.

In reference to that also the Commissioner of Indian Affairs has sent to me a copy of a letter which he addressed to the honorable Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] on the 26th day of May last, which I suppose probably the Senator may have received before yesterday's discussion. It had reference to the amendment which for the first time I was informed yesterday by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] the Senate had adopted on the general deficiency bill. His letter related, therefore, to the proposed amendment to the general deficiency bill, but of course it has precisely the same effect as applied to the amendment when now proposed through the conference committee as an attachment to the Dawes Commission appropriation. I will read it:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington May 26, 1896.

SIR: I notice on page 5664 of the RECORD of yesterday the following adopted amendment to the general deficiency bill, namely:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to pay to the Sisseton and Wahpeton Indians of South Dakota all interest money due them up to July 1, 1896, and that thereafter all interest money as it shall accrue shall be paid on the 1st day of November annually."

If this amendment should become a law it will have the effect of stopping all educational work upon the Sisseton Reservation and leave the Indians without necessary employees to conduct the agency. Under the direction of the President there is paid out of this interest fund the sum of $4,000 for agency employees and $8,450 for school employees, and the sum of about $12,000 for school supplies annually. This money accrues from the agreement concluded with them December 12, 1889, and ratified by act of Congress approved March 3, 1891. Section 27 of the agreement provides that the principal and interest shall be at all times subject to appropriation by Congress or to application by order of the President for the education and civilization of said Indians. Their present annual interest amounts to $75,000.

I am of the opinion that this amendment should be changed so as to provide that at least $25,000 should be reserved for education and necessary employees.

Very respectfully, D. M. BROWNING, Commissioner.

Hon. R. F. PETTIGREW,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. ALLISON. I will simply say, in view of what the Senator from Wisconsin has stated, that this amendment is still in disagreement on the deficiency bill. We have in the Committee on Appropriations a similar letter to that just read by the Senator, and of course modifications will be made in the amendment so as to comply with what seems to be necessary under the agreement.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I wish to state, in reply to the Senator from Wisconsin, that I received the letter which he has read before the amendment was agreed to in conference. The amendment agreed to in conference protects the schools upon the reservation, while the amendment placed upon the deficiency bill does not protect them.

The act of Congress or the agreement with those Indians reads as follows:

In consideration for the lands ceded, sold, relinquished, and conveyed as aforesaid the United States stipulates and agrees to pay to the Sisseton and Wahpeton bands of Dakota or Sioux Indians, parties hereto, the sum of $2.50 per acre for each and every acre thereof, and it is agreed by the parties hereto that the sum so to be paid shall be held in the Treasury of the United States for the sole use and benefit of the said bands of Indians; and the same, with interest thereon at 3 per cent per annum, shall be at all times subject to appropriation by Congress for the education and civilization of the said bands of Indians or members thereof, as provided in section 5 of an act of Congress approved February 8, 1887.

The act ratifying this agreement varied its terms and provided that the money might be paid out upon the order of the President or by appropriation on the part of Congress. The Indians insist upon a compliance with their agreement and their treaty. The money has always been paid to the Indians in cash per capita, except that which was expended for agency employees and for schools.

Now, as to that question, those Indians live in my State, and I know their situation and position fully as well as the Department knows it. Many of them are very intelligent and educated gentlemen, fully capable of managing their own affairs. The agent is paid by the Government of the United States in the regular appropriation. He has no duties to perform except to pay out this money and in a general sort of way to look after their affairs. They are all voters. Some of them are officeholders in the county where they reside. They do not believe that $4,000 of their fund should be spent for agency employees, and they object to that distribution of their money. They are willing that the schools shall be continued, and that the money necessary to run them shall be paid out by the Department. The amendment inserted in conference provides for the schools and does not provide for the surplus agency employees. Those people know better than anybody else whether the agency employees should be employed and paid out of their money.

One thing is certain, and that is that very few, if any, of those people get any benefit from the agency employees. It is doubtful if an agent is needed, but even if an agent is needed it is not required that in addition to that $4,000 of their money shall be paid perhaps to men as a reward for political service. For that reason it was left out of the amendment, and properly so, in my opinion.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CHANDLER. I was puzzled yesterday by the remark made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] to the effect that there was a clause already upon the deficiency bill in connection with the Sisseton and Wahpeton Indians. I could not understand why this clause should be in these two places. If it is on the general deficiency bill, why is it on this bill? Why is it in two places? Why, if the clause is upon the deficiency bill, is it necessary to write it into the conference report on this bill? That is what I can not understand.

The remark of the Senator from Iowa was mysterious to me. I thought it was bad enough to have the clause on the conference report, but to learn that it was also in the deficiency bill was a great puzzle. I thought perhaps I was getting dizzy in the matter of legislation and unable to comprehend the modern methods of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from New Hampshire is laboring under a misapprehension. The amendment was not put on the deficiency bill by the conferees. It was put on in the Senate before we had any knowledge of the conference now in charge of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CHANDLER. Why, if it is on the deficiency bill, is it put in the Indian appropriation bill?

Mr. ALLISON. That I do not know.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, at the close of my remarks yesterday I stated that this amendment of the bill, as recommended by the committee of conference, was inartificially drawn, ambiguous, and seemed to be impossible of execution. I desire to call the attention of the Senate, and especially I desire to call the attention of the members of the conference committee, if there be any of them present and take an interest in this matter, to what I am now about to state as to the effect of the amendment. It is provided—

That said commission is further authorized and directed to proceed at once to hear and determine the application of all persons who may apply to them for citizenship in any of said nations, and after such hearing they shall determine the right of such applicant to be so admitted and enrolled.

That is one distinct provision for the purpose of amending the rolls of the citizenship of the various tribes. There is another provision on the same subject to which I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], if he will give me his attention, so that he may explain it:

Provided, however, That such application shall be made to such commissioners within three months after the passage of this act. The said commission shall decide all such applications within ninety days after the same shall be made.

* * * * * * *

And provided further, That the rolls of citizenship of the several tribes as now existing are hereby confirmed.

This is the point to which I desire especially to call the attention of the conferees:

And any person who shall claim to be entitled to be added to said rolls as a citizen of either of said tribes and whose right thereto has either been denied or not acted upon, or any citizen who may within three months from and after the passage of this act desire such citizenship, may apply to the legally constituted court or committee designated by the several tribes for such citizenship, and such court or committee shall determine such application within thirty days from the date thereof.

So it appears there are two distinct provisions for the purpose of adding to the rolls of the tribes. One is that the addition shall be made by the Dawes Commission. The second is that an addition may be made by any one of the authorized committees or tribunals of the several tribes. So it appears that there are two boards, two tribunals, having equal authority, having the same jurisdiction, who at the same time are to hear the applications of these parties. What I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Colorado to is, if a man should apply to one of these tribunals and at the same time should apply to the other, because he has a right to apply to both, and one should decide one way and the other the other, what would be the situation of the applicant? Would he be a member of the tribe or would he be excluded? I think that ought to be answered. I hear no answer.

The amendment proposes these two distinct and contradictory and inconsistent tribunals to decide the same thing. Either may act or both may act, and if one acts one way and the other the other there is no provision here as to which shall prevail.

I call the attention of the Senate, too, as it is very pertinent, to the question whether we ought on a mere conference report to decide to legislate upon these important matters. They are always drawn up in haste; they are always acted upon without amendment in this body, so that incongruities and inconsistencies occur, as they do here.

There is another provision to which I call attention. The Dawes Commission is required to decide an application within ninety days after the application is made. When the application is made to the Indian commissions, to the Indian committees, to the Indian tribunals, they must make the decision within thirty days. I should like to know what motive or reason influenced the committee in giving the Dawes Commission ninety days in which to make the decision and confining the tribunals of the tribes to thirty days?

Then I should like to know, and it is a very pertinent inquiry, if a man shall apply to the Indian committee and it should be decided against his right within thirty days, there would be sixty days, then, in which he could apply to the other commission; and is it the meaning of the amendment that an applicant shall experiment in this way with both tribunals, that he shall apply to the Indian commission or to the Indian tribunals that are to decide within thirty days, and then after the thirty days he is allowed sixty days more in which to apply to the Dawes Commission? How is that? Why was that done? Will the Senator from Colorado or any other member of the committee explain it to the Senate?

Then, there is another ambiguous provision in the amendment, and one on a very important point:

That in determining all such applications said commission shall respect all laws of the several nations or tribes, not inconsistent with the laws of the United States, and all treaties with either of said nations or tribes, and shall give due force and effect to the rolls, usages, and customs of each of said nations or tribes.

What is due force? Is it just such force as the commission shall see proper to give them? If so, there is no use for the introduction of this provision at all. What is due force? I should like to have that explained. I will read further to show what a very remarkable provision this committee of conference have given to the Senate for its ratification:

In the performance of such duties said commission shall have power and authority to administer oaths, to issue process for and compel the attendance of witnesses, and to send for persons and papers, and all depositions and affidavits and other evidence in any form whatsoever heretofore taken where the witnesses giving said testimony are dead or now residing beyond the limits of said Territory.

What affidavits? Taken before whom? Taken in what kind of proceeding? Taken merely ex parte, without any judicial proceeding pending in which affidavits can be used? If that be the meaning of it—and I think it is—then every affidavit, every deposition, not taken under judicial proceedings and with the view of being used in judicial trial and pertinent to the issue in that trial will be utterly worthless, because if the party swore falsely in a case of that sort he could not be indicted or punished for perjury. Do the committee of conference mean to say that mere ex parte statements, made by anybody at any time, may be used for the purpose of determining the very great question whether a man is a citizen of one of these tribes or not?

Then here is another very important provision, such as I undertake to say was never found in any statute which attempted to regulate proceedings for the determination of rights of person or property. They are not only to take these ex parte affidavits, taken at any time and anywhere and for any purpose, but they are also—

To use every fair and reasonable means within their reach.

What are "fair and reasonable means"? Simply the discretion of the Commission. Whatever the Commission may determine to be fair, whatever they may determine to be reasonable, for the purpose of ascertaining the truth in this case, whether they be legal or not, they are authorized to use; and that, too, in a case which I have just said is one of the most important that could be submitted to any tribunal in the world—the right of citizenship.

Then we come to another very extraordinary provision, one which the committee of conference must have supposed to be effectual for the purpose of securing right and justice to these tribes. It is the proviso—

That if the tribe or any person be aggrieved with the decision of the tribal authorities or the commission provided for in this act, it or he may appeal from such decision to the United States district court.

There is no provision as to how the appeal shall be granted. There is no provision as to any bond or want of bond for costs that may be given. There is no provision as to whether an appeal shall operate as a suspension of the decision of the commission, and, what is more important, there is no means provided whereby the nation shall know the date of the decision of the commission, so that it may take the appeal within the time specified. There is no provision for any notice to be given to the nation or any one of its authorities when an appeal is taken. There is no provision as to what record shall be sent by this commission on an appeal. There is no provision whether the trial in the district court shall be upon a record or whether it shall be de novo. No man can tell.

I should like to hear some member of the conference committee explain these things. How is the appeal to be taken? What notice is to be given to the other side? Then what record is to be made and sent up? Then how the district court shall proceed—whether upon testimony introduced originally in that court or whether upon the testimony certified? It must do one or the other. Now, see. If they are to try it upon the record made in the court below, then there is no provision for any record at all to be made in the court below. There is no clerk. There is no duty imposed upon the commission but to make one record, and that record is to be made at any time after six months, after the performance of all the duties imposed upon the commission. Next, sir, I was going to remark, there is no provision made for the purpose of putting in the record any evidence that might be introduced before this commission. How is the court to decide it? There is but the one record required to be made, and I will read to the Senate what that record is:

The commission is hereby required to file the lists of members as they finally approve them with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, to remain there for use as the final judgment of the duly constituted authorities.

After everything has been done, after six months have expired, then the first record that this Commission is authorized to make is to be made, and what is it? Is there any evidence to be reported? No; nothing but the simple names of the parties who have been admitted to the roll.

I should like for some member of the conference committee or for some member of the Senate who favors this report to explain to the Senate how that appeal is to be taken, how it is to be tried.

Then here is another remarkable thing. While the two boards, while the Commission and any tribunal in the Territory are limited as to the time in which they shall make their decision, there is no limit as to the time in which the court shall make its decision. So it may be years after the final adjournment of all the proceedings under the Commission before the decision of the district court.

Mr. President, it may be said or it may be thought (I do not think any lawyer will say it in the Senate openly) that all these omissions to which I have called the attention of the Senate may be supplied by the action of the Commission. In answer to that I have but to cite to the Senate a very simple rule of law, which every lawyer recognizes at once as soon as it is stated. Where a tribunal of any kind, having judicial powers, has a limited jurisdiction, it has no power to go beyond the letter of the law which created it. The reason is very simple. Here is a board, not a court, an executive board, with no common-law powers, who are endowed with certain powers by act of Congress. What are the powers? They are simply the powers specified in this amendment, and where there is no specification of a right or of a duty by a well recognized principle of law, not disputed by anybody, there is no power on the part of the board.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator desire to interrupt me?

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator from Mississippi will pardon me, I call attention of the Chair to the fact that the morning hour has expired. The Senate having met at 11 o'clock, the morning hour ends at 1. I ask that the bond bill be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina raising the question of consideration of the unfinished business, if there is no objection, the unfinished business will be laid before the Senate.

Mr. GEORGE. Does not that come up at 2 o'clock?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning hour comprises two hours. When the Senate meets at 11 o'clock, of course 1 o'clock is the end of the morning hour. The question of the consideration of the unfinished business being made, the Chair will lay, if there is no objection, the unfinished business before the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not object, but I do contend that a conference report has priority over the unfinished business. It is a subject that may be discussed hereafter. If the unfinished business was pending a conference report could be presented, and being presented it must stay before the Senate until it is disposed of in some way by a vote of the Senate. It seems to be a unanimous-consent agreement that the bond bill shall go on, but I do not acquiesce in any such decision of parliamentary law as will give the unfinished business preference over a conference report.

Mr. GEORGE. I have no objection to the conference report going over. I do not claim any rights in the matter. I am willing to abide by the rules of the Senate. If by the rules of the Senate the unfinished business does not come up until 2 o'clock, I will go on; if it is the rule of the Senate to lay the matter before the Senate at 1 o'clock, I will yield very cheerfully.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business, as a general rule, will come up at 1 o'clock when the Senate meets at 11.

Mr. VILAS. If the unfinished business has rightful precedence over this business, I am willing to yield to it. If it has not, I insist upon the conference report being proceeded with. I desire to observe the rule if there is one.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that there was an agreement a day or two ago that there should be a vote on the unfinished business to-day. If there are Senators who desire to speak it seems to me to be very unfair, without regard to the question whether it is absolutely right, that the unfinished business shall give way to the conference report. The unfinished business ought at least to have the right, in view of the fact that there has been a unanimous-consent agreement that there should be a vote to-day on the unfinished business.

Mr. VILAS. I understand that the unanimous-consent agreement did not limit the hour.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. No, sir, it did not; but Senators prefer not to stay all night in session.

Mr. GEORGE. I think that the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas has great force, and ought to weigh and prevail with the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. In view of the point suggested by the Senator from Arkansas, that it has been agreed to finish the bond bill to-day, I make no objection to going on with the unfinished business, if the Senator from Mississippi does not care to go on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, if there be no objection.

REGULATION OF BOND ISSUES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1341) to prohibit the further issuance of interest-bearing bonds without the consent of Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah [Mr. BROWN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Utah allow me to offer an amendment?

Mr. BROWN. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move to add at the end of the bill:

Unless in case of an emergency it is necessary, in the opinion of the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury, to issue such bonds in accordance with the provisions of existing law, to preserve the public credit or to meet obligations of the United States created by such existing law which can not otherwise be met, and all such bonds when so issued shall first be offered at public sale.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Utah give way a moment for me to make a suggestion? The Senator yesterday introduced a resolution in regard to this same bond question. He was discussing it yesterday, and I presume he may continue that discussion to-day. In order that the whole bond question may be disposed of at once, as the Senate will probably be as prepared to understand the question now as ever and not have it come up hereafter, I suggest to the Senator whether it would not be wise to ask unanimous consent to take up that resolution and vote upon it without further debate immediately after the bond bill is acted upon.

Mr. BROWN. I had intended to ask it at that time.

Mr. HILL. There ought to be an understanding now, if at all.

Mr. BROWN. If it is more fitting to ask it now, I will do so.

Mr. ALLEN. I think the resolution of the Senator from Utah is worthy of very serious discussion and very close examination by the Senate. I am in favor of the resolution; I have been in favor of it for a great number of years; but I feel as though the remarks of the Senator from Utah ought not to pass without a reply of some kind from the Populist representation in this Chamber. Therefore I shall object to its——

Mr. HILL. Object to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ALLEN. No; I shall not object to its consideration, but I shall object to voting on it immediately after the vote is taken on the pending measure.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Utah that we get unanimous consent, if that is the pleasure of the Senate, to vote on the resolution to-morrow evening at 6 o'clock. I should like to be heard ten minutes on it.

Mr. HILL. No; let us dispose of this whole bond business to-day, or not at all. We do not want this thing hanging along to interfere with other business. Let us clear the floor of the whole thing or else not at all. I am sorry that there is a disposition to filibuster against action on the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah asks that after the vote on the bill which is now the unfinished business the resolution that he introduced relating to the same subject be voted upon without further debate. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLEN. There is objection upon the ground alone that I desire to debate the resolution before it is finally disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. BROWN. With regard to that matter, I believe that it is our duty to take action, and I shall call the attention of the Senate to it immediately after the vote has been taken upon the measure now pending before the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska if he has any objection to voting upon it and answering the Senator from Utah after it has been voted on.

Mr. ALLEN. Probably not.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is the customary method in the Senate these days. If the Senator would do that it would be a great convenience to other Senators.

Mr. ALLEN. I am decidedly in favor of the resolution of the Senator from Utah, and the only serious objection I would have to letting it be voted on and then debating it afterwards would be the absence, I am afraid, of my distinguished friend from New Hampshire. I should like to have him here until the question is disposed of.

Mr. CHANDLER. I assure the Senator I will be here when the vote is taken, and if I absent myself when he speaks it will be from no disrespect whatever to the Senator.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from New Hampshire be present when I speak?

Mr. CHANDLER. I will give consent to the arrangement. I will agree to stay even if no other Senator does.

Mr. ALLEN. Then I will consent, too.

Mr. BROWN. Then it is the unanimous agreement, I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent that after the vote is taken on the unfinished business the resolution that he introduced touching the bond question shall also be voted upon immediately after the other votes without debate.

Mr. TURPIE. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana objects.

Mr. BROWN. I will say, so that there may be a fair test of the question, that immediately after the vote has been taken on the pending bill, if it is in order, and I understand it will be, I shall move to take the resolution from the table and pass it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest to the Senator from Utah that he has a remedy in his own hands. He can move it as an amendment to the pending bill.

Mr. BROWN. I can move it independently.

Mr. ALDRICH. You can move it as an additional section to the pending bill. I presume that the friends of one measure are also the friends of the other.

Mr. ALLEN. We are losing all the remarks of the Senator from Rhode Island, which are no doubt very entertaining.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggested to the Senator from Utah that he move his resolution as an amendment to the pending bill, either in the form of an amendment to the first section or as an additional section; and then he will be sure to get a vote on it.

Mr. ALLEN. I hope the Senator from Utah will not be persuaded to walk into that trap.

Mr. ALDRICH. I presume Senators who are in favor of one measure are also in favor of the other.

Mr. BROWN. Undoubtedly I should have been misled by it had I not had the light of my friend from Nebraska to warn me. Otherwise I should have allowed this purely Senatorial resolution, to be passed by the Senate as the expression of their judicial opinion, to have been attached to the bill. But in view of the fact that the Senator from Nebraska has put me upon my guard I think I shall not add the Senatorial resolution to an act of Congress.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I shall always feel as though I have accomplished something.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman is satisfied with very little, though. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah has the floor and will proceed.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, recurring to the subject which I was discussing when we adjourned last night, I wish to say that protection in the sense in which it is used—protection of our American industries—and the free coinage of silver go together. They are kindred. They are measures of the same class. Both are for the protection of the same persons. Both are for the protection of the American farmer, the American laborer, American enterprise, and American institutions as against the foreigner.

The merits of each have been tried and each has been found an efficacious remedy for hard times. The period when we have been deprived of both—the last three years—is the period of the greatest depression in all classes of industry and all enterprises. Since the beginning of the war we have had protection in greater or less measure. It has brought us prosperity notwithstanding our calamities. The Senator from New Hampshire has most ably presented in detail the benefits derived from a purely protective-tariff law. I agree with all his conclusions. I presume he is correct in his figures; I know he is correct in his argument, and yet I apply the word protection in a little broader sense. Protection is not only a tariff on imports, but is such legislative assistance to each kind and class of industry, labor, production, or manufacture as that particular form of enterprise may, under all the circumstances, need to place it on an equal footing with every other and to enable such industry to successfully compete with foreign rivals. The nature of the protection must depend upon the nature of the business. It may mean a tariff for one article, a bounty for another, a subsidy for a third, and discrimination in duties for a fourth.

We applied the doctrine of Republican protection when we voted a subsidy to the oceanic steamship for carrying the United States mail. It was in the line of upbuilding that industry. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] has introduced a most beneficial protection and Republican measure in proposing to discriminate in duties in favor of American ships. The shipbuilding and shipowning can not be built up merely by tariff protection; but it may be built up by proper discrimination in duties and, if necessary, by subsidy. So with silver. Silver is a production of American soil. The miner and manufacturer of silver and the laborer who digs it out are equally entitled to the protection of the United States; not merely as an article of commerce, not merely for the benefit of the laborer and the silver-mine owner. That is but a trivial benefit subsidiary to the great, vast good that is to come to the whole community by the free coinage of silver. It is a money, and coinage is the true protection, not only for the silver miner, but for the whole nation.

We meet with two classes of opponents to the free coinage of silver; one class who believe theoretically in a single standard, who wish all nations and our nation to come to the one gold standard all over the world, and thus accomplish two objects—one to have, it is believed, but one measure of value, a single uniform measure of all values, and have also, as necessary to it, the concomitant and constantly appreciating value of money; the other class is in favor of the free coinage of silver at a uniform ratio to be agreed upon by us with all the rest of the world. They desire, or say they desire, or believe that they desire, to enhance the value of silver so that it shall remain constantly on a par with gold at the ratio that may be thus agreed to. They believe in a double standard, an appreciating value of production or a depreciating value of money, but think that the United States is not strong enough or large enough to bring about a double standard alone, and that the free coinage of silver in this country would force us to a single standard of silver. The fact remains, however, recognized by each of these classes and by the advocates of free coinage by the United States only, that a single standard constantly does increase the value of money and decreases the value of products. The believer in the theoretic gold standard regards this as the goal to be reached, the constantly increasing power of money, constantly enhancing the value of it and the depreciation of all other interests, all other property. The true way, however, as we believe who are not only silver advocates, but also that branch of the advocates of the present status of affairs who say that they desire to return to a silver basis if they can do so safely, and I am sure the only way to prosperity is that, as the population of the nations is increasing, as the needs of money are constantly greater, as civilization spreads over the face of the earth, the value of the dollar should be all the time slightly, very, very slightly, depreciated; that is, that the value of human labor, of human enterprise, of human production the world over should be constantly, slightly, very slightly, increasing, so that enterprise and commerce, agriculture and manufacturing may always be having the advantage of advancing prices, subject to the competition which improved methods will always produce.

The natural competition which comes from inventive genius and enterprise, so far as that depresses prices, is proper, that is a proper depression; but the price of products should never be depressed in any other manner; it should not be depressed by law or by a constantly growing measure of value. The world is not at a standstill; the world is advancing. It demands more and more money. It can only do its increasing business upon a double standard. It demands money more and more because it is doing more and more business everywhere over the face of the earth. We need more and more railroads, more and more manufactures, more and more enterprises; and labor, in a broader and wider sense of the definition of that term, is called for from one end of the earth to the other. The single standard is but an experiment. It never has been put in practice for a sufficient length of time to know whether it is a success or not. No country or nation or series of nations, not even Great Britain, has ever, until the last twenty years, tried the experiment of a single standard of gold, and never yet has the single standard of gold been successful to the single nation or to the world at large. I might say, perhaps, that with the apparent exception of certain classes of Great Britain, but not to Great Britain, has the single gold standard been entirely a success. To her agricultural classes, to the great mass who have created Great Britain free and independent and glorious, the single standard has been a curse. If we may believe the public press and the discussions in the newspapers, the agricultural classes have suffered immensely by the single gold standard of Great Britain. It must be remembered that at some ratio silver and gold have always been measures and standards of value in all countries until 1873. I do not forget that Great Britain nominally, by law, abolished the silver standard as early as 1816. But alone, the act of Great Britain's legislation had no effect whatever.

Silver circulated as money side by side with gold in Great Britain freely and constantly at par on the usual ratio from 1816 to 1873, and in all the rest of the nations of the world. All the other nations together were enabled to hold up the other standard so it was fully equal and sometimes more valuable than the gold standard. At no time was there any serious departure from the value of these two standards. Whenever the one became more valuable, the cheaper was used until that in turn equaled the value of the other, and thus we have had the true measure of values by adjusting one standard by the other. The double standard prevents the single standard from appreciating constantly in value. It prevents any fictitious value of the single standard, which may for a time exist and thus destroy the proper relation of commerce, product, and money. By the double standard the cheaper metal will always be used, and thus, making an increased demand, will enhance its value until it passes the limit of the dearer. It was only after the leading representative nations and the United States legislated against silver that its price began seriously to decline as compared with the gold price, and the price of gold to advance in proportion. The result has been from that time to this a constantly falling price. I care not to go into particular details of the tables, which have been so often repeated and spread before the Senate, in different arguments which have been made upon that subject, though the tables will show that there has been constantly falling values in everything that can be produced.

Differences exist as to the extent of those values. There have been slight variations. It has been shown that the values have not fallen exactly in proportion to the fall of silver, but as a whole, looking through the twenty years past, silver has substantially been the measure of the value of land and of land products. It has been substantially the measure of the value of the manufactured products. It has been the measure of everything excepting indebtedness. I say that we need not go to statistics to prove this, because every argument that has been addressed against the free coinage of silver begins by that statement and ends in it. It has been said here on this floor that the effect of free coinage of silver would be to permit the debtors to pay their debts in 50-cent dollars. In that sentence is the concession of all that can be claimed for the falling prices. How can the debtors get possession of these 50-cent silver dollars with which to pay their debts, except it be that their prices for that which they have to sell will advance from 50 cents to 100 cents in nominal valuation? They get 50-cent dollars and are able to pay their debts in 50-cent dollars, because they get twice as much for whatever they have to sell. The land will advance; the land production will advance; the manufactured products will advance exactly in the proportion of 50 cents to 100 cents. It does mean that the indebtedness of this nation and the private debt shall be paid in just one-half the product that it is required to pay it in, or just such a proportion as silver bears to gold. And this statement of 50-cent dollars not only shows that this is to be the result, but it shows that this is the right result, because if it is true that restoring silver to its place equal to gold, at the ratio of 16 to 1, will double the price of products and of manufactures, if it will advance everything in that proportion, then it must follow that had silver never been dethroned from its position as a money metal, had it remained on a parity with gold at the ratio of 16 to 1, these prices never would have fallen to where they are, but they would have kept at the prices to which we would restore them.

"Fifty-cent dollar" means that, with a double standard, dollars will buy only half as much as now—that is, the farmer, manufacturer, and producer of all kinds get double the price. "Fifty-cent dollar" means that if the double standard had been maintained as it was before 1873, produce would now be worth just twice what it is and dollars worth just half as much.

The use of the phrase "50-cent dollars" concedes all that silver men have ever claimed to have been the effect of demonetization of silver, viz, that the relative value of production and money has changed so that production is worth only one-half and money has doubled. It means that the indebtedness payable in money (coin) has been doubled by the single standard. It means that we must pay our English creditor twice as much as we did under the double standard, twice as much as we will if we return to a double standard. It means that we are willing to aid in the robbery by the English creditor taking 200 cents on the dollar for 100 cents contracted from the American farmer.

The single standard means bankruptcy. It is dishonest to change the contract and double the obligation, just as dishonest as to forge a note doubling the promise.

"Fifty-cent dollar" is a phrase intended to imply turpitude in those that advocate double standard. When examined the phrase is used to cover a steal. It is twice as dishonest to demand 200 cents for a dollar as it is to pay 50 cents.

All this vast indebtedness of the United States and all the indebtedness of the world was in equity contracted under the old system—under the system which has kept gold and silver at a parity at that ratio, and under promises which have been made ever since by every platform and by the nation in its law to keep the parity of gold and silver at that ratio. It has been said here on this floor that the old contracts have been changed, have taken new forms, have been created within a few years, and that the present indebtedness is a new contract. That is but paltering with the letter. The debt that the United States owes is a sacred one, because it was contracted in behalf of the Union and for the preservation of the nation.

It was contracted from 1861 to 1865. It is that which makes it sacred; when it dates back to that, when values were formed upon the basis of a double standard, there can be nothing but injustice and wrong in attempting to pay an indebtedness thus created in a single standard. It is the payment and has been the payment of an indebtedness contracted on 100-cent dollars and not 200-cent dollars. It is not a 50-cent dollar that we now ask to be restored, but we do ask to abolish the 200-cent dollar. When men speak as if it were dishonest to pay in 50-cent dollars, they must remember that the indebtedness has been advanced to 200 per cent of its original amount. It is the doubling of the dollar which we now demand shall be reduced to its old figure.

The cry of 50-cent dollars will be equally true, even more true, of bimetallism procured by international agreement. Then all nations will have agreed that the relative value of production and money shall change, that money shall be reduced to one-half what it now commands under the single standard, or that production shall be doubled. It is but the other form of stating the same proposition. We in this country accomplish the same result, however, alone and by ourselves, if we are able, by passing a free-coinage measure to raise the standard of silver the world over, so that it shall be worth, not only in our own country but in the markets of other countries, as much as gold, dollar for dollar, at the ratio of 16 to 1. We shall have doubled the value of production the world over if we are able to accomplish that, of which it seems as if there could be no possible doubt. But at all events the effect will be the same whether we do it by international agreement or whether we do it alone. As soon as the price of silver goes up relatively to gold, so that they stand equal at the old ratio, the value of production will at once be doubled and the value of the dollar will be cut in two. It is just as true whether we do it alone or whether we do it by the aid of all the nations.

The effect of the single standard has been to drive out of business all kinds of effort to manufacture or to produce or to speculate. How can any person safely buy with a view of profit any product of the hand, of the soil, or the soil itself upon a constantly falling market? Every man that ever dealt in any property whatever knows that it is never safe to buy upon a falling market. It is only when the market begins to rise, when there is hope for the future, that anybody will invest. The single standard has produced a constantly falling market from the moment that we have embarked upon it, from 1879 to 1896. The market of everything has been down, down, down. The Senator from Kentucky shows the relative price of wheat to be to-day one-half what it was when the single standard was adopted. The fall in the other 23 items he had in his list was equally as great in proportion.

Perhaps a test better than any test of marketable articles may be found by every Senator by applying it to farming lands in his own vicinity. Go outside of a city anywhere, into any farming community from New York to California, go through the large States, go to Ohio or Michigan, and as soon as you get into the country where farming lands are, you will find that they are worth a little less to-day than they were last year. That they are worth only half the price that they were in 1873. That land has kept pace with silver. That it is down, down, down, and going lower. How can any man be expected to invest in lands, or in farming, or in producing anything when it is certain that his price is going down and getting to be less each year? The Senators who have argued in favor of the single standard have not held out any other hope. They do not pretend to any other expectation. They simply say that this is all owing to some other cause, and that it is right that it should fall; but it is not land only, it is manufactured articles as well. How can a man engage in manufacturing when the manufactured article will every year sell for less and less and less, and stack his warehouse with something that will produce him less than cost—something that if he does not happen to sell it immediately in the market, the next year he knows somebody else can make it cheaper. The only profitable business to do under the single standard, and apparently the only business intended to be profitable by the single standard, is the lending of money. Somebody has to be a borrower and somebody a creditor. That business alone is successful.

The result of a single standard means slavery to Great Britain, and nothing else. We still owe her. We have this enormous debt to pay. The decline is not going to stop here on 50-cent dollars and 50-cent prices and 50-cent wheat and 50-cent land, but it is going lower so long as the single standard is maintained, because with but one metal to supply the needs of the whole world, by which to measure all the values of all the world, that metal, according to the law of supply and demand, the supply being not equal to the demand, must appreciate in value. The desire for that gold dollar is greater, and greater, and greater, and the supply is less, and less, and less, or at least not in proportion to this enhanced demand. That is the trouble with this redemption fund, or the lack of it. There is but little gold in the world. All the nations are striving for it. If we are to redeem constantly and every year the five hundred millions of greenbacks in gold it will soon be an impossibility with all the mortgages that we may place upon our property. Mortgage it as you will, it will only be a few years until the debt will get so high that we can not raise money by mortgage or bonds, which is the same thing. Our property is already bonded or mortgaged almost to the extent of its value.

The time is nearly at hand when instead of our bonds going at a premium of 11½ or 16 per cent they will go below par. The inevitable result of a single standard has been outlined in the expression of the Senator from Connecticut. The single standard means "repudiation, bankruptcy, anarchy, infamy." It means bankruptcy because, like "the affluent spendthrift," to use the expression of the Senator from Ohio, running in debt and giving a bond upon what we have leads to the inevitable result of expensive habits and expenditures that we would not otherwise indulge in. It leads to seventy-million-dollar harbor bills. It leads to every other conceivable improper bill that can possibly be passed, and then when the debt is due we have no means from the revenue to pay it with, and we have no revenue with which to raise means. The people are getting poorer and poorer, and nothing is left but constantly mortgaging over and over again. Where is it to end, and where can it end? The President has shown by his message that the constant presentation of the legal tenders for gold produces the endless chain by which the Treasury is being depleted and by which it will be infinitely and forever depleted. There is no way to stop it until the wealth of this country is wholly absorbed and wrapped up in this loan or this series of loans. Must this process of drawing the gold out of the Treasury and replacing it with bonds be continued? That is bankruptcy, to mortgage in time of peace our property and our wealth. To mortgage to pay the common ordinary expenses of the Government, the ordinary expenses of existence, is bankruptcy in either a government or an individual.

It is worse than bankruptcy; it is repudiation. The Senators have already heard the growl of repudiation on the floor of the Senate at this session. I do not believe in repudiation. I believe that every cent should be paid, but there comes a time when the constantly enhancing debt and the enhancing value of a dollar will render the nation wild and crazy. Usurpation leads to anarchy, and anarchy is repudiation. The holder of the indebtedness of the United States should be willing, must be willing, to accept its payment in the same coin in which the debt was contracted. He will either be paid in silver, as his debt was contracted in silver, or he must be content to take the result which his own avarice is bringing upon this country—bankruptcy, repudiation, anarchy, infamy.

The "affluent spendthrift" designation of the United States by the Senator from Ohio, in seeking the single standard, borrowing money from year to year to live upon, has the same result as to a private individual. What would we think of a man who would mortgage year after year all his own earnings, mortgage his inheritance, and when the interest came due, instead of earning it and paying it, would run in debt and issue bond after bond? A single standard and issuing bonds will indeed take the last shirt from the people, as the Senator said he is anxious to do, to protect the public credit by gold monometallism. And yet the Senator from Ohio is among those who vote for aiding in spending the means of the affluent spendthrift; to vote the river and harbor bill of seventy millions when we have not a cent with which to meet it; to run in debt to build deep-sea harbors for British ships, even though it takes the last shirt from the people to pay for it.

If this nation is really to govern itself as an individual should be governed, the appropriations must always be within and less than the system of revenue provides; and, first, we must agree upon the system of revenue before we can take anything to appropriate. If a farmer of Ohio had raised both corn and wheat to sell, and he should insist on burning up and destroying his corn, locking it up so it could not be used, and only utilized his wheat crop, and should then go and borrow money to make good the deficiency for what he might have received for his corn crop, we all would agree that he was not only a spendthrift, "affluent or otherwise," but that he was insane. And yet that is just exactly what is being asked of us here. We are asked to destroy our silver crop. The United States is the greatest producer of silver in the world. The others that produce are small, so small that their product amounts to little or nothing compared to that of the United States. The wealth that would flow to us, a debtor nation and a nation producing silver, from making this one article commercial the world over at a dollar for 371¼ grains would be immense, and the Senator from Virginia has estimated it as equivalent to over a billion per annum. Perhaps the estimate may be a little indefinite; but certain it is that in a short time it would wipe out the indebtedness. The effect of the legislation against silver has been to deprive the United States of this great source of revenue. I know it is said that if we adopt the system to-day by law—the free coinage of silver alone and unaided—that gold will disappear, go to a premium, and therefore we shall lose one of the elements of the circulating medium. But why should it disappear? It can not unless it goes to a premium. It can not go to a premium unless there is plenty of silver money to supply its place. The question is, is there silver to be shipped to this country to supply its place? It is said by those who believe in the gold standard that there is danger that silver will be brought in here and coined, so that this country will have to pay $1.29 per ounce for foreign silver. Where is it to come from? What silver is there in existence outside of that produced by the United States? European silver is coined. It is in use. We ship from here to Europe, and from Europe to Asia. It is the United States that supplies the silver, and not Europe that supplies it to us. It is not shipped from Asia here.

The single standard has never yet been fully tried in any of the countries, and it has been successful in none, unless it is in Great Britain, the great creditor country, and unsuccessful there so far as the agricultural classes go. Ever since the single standard was adopted by law prices have been falling in this country. We have been able to check in a measure the force of the wrong and evil by that other kindred necessity, a protective tariff, and from the date of our resumption in 1879 to the date when the Republican party went out of power in the fall of 1892, the protective tariff and Bland-Allison Act had broken the force of the blow which had been made to our industries by the single-standard law.

It should not be forgotten that we did not entirely go upon the single-standard basis during those years. We broke the force of the injury that came to us by another measure, and that was the Bland-Allison silver law. We had the free coinage of $2,000,000 per month, the amount provided by that law, and it produced great benefit up to the time of its repeal. It aided in keeping up prices. Yet notwithstanding a protective tariff, notwithstanding the Bland-Allison law, notwithstanding the Sherman Act of 1890, notwithstanding the different efforts which have been made to keep prices up, they have gone down in consequence of the single standard. True, notwithstanding the tariff, there had been a deficiency. The tariff was essential to our welfare, and it enabled us to tide over, but prices fell constantly even under the beneficent effects of that. We only received the full benefit of the single standard and free trade when in 1892 it was believed that the Democratic party was about to come in power and enforce their free-trade doctrine. Then it was, believing that the Democratic party would keep their platform, that every manufacturer ceased to buy and every consumer at once ceased to buy. Then it was that trade was brought to the condition in which it must always be with the single standard and free trade. The effect of it from the fall of 1892 to the fall of 1893 I need not recall. The memory of it will always be with the American people—the gradual constant injury, the loss and financial crash, ruining and blighting wherever these two doctrines were brought together. It destroyed the banks which created the panic, and it destroyed the manufacturers, ruining debtor and creditor alike and impoverishing the farmer. It was only when the Wilson bill was found not to be a free-trade measure that in part the country slowly rose from the staggering blows which had been given to it. Now, there is but one method by which we can return to prosperity; that is to return to the finances of our forefathers; return to the double standard. Coin silver freely, so that the debtor may pay his creditor and not be bankrupted.

It has been said here that the employee, the workman, the wage earner will be thus compelled to receive less. It may be true that his dollar will be worth less, but, on the other hand, he will be enabled to obtain it. As it is now, under the conditions of a single standard, the employers of the wage earners—those who take the risk of business enterprise—are growing fewer and fewer. There are 15,000,000 employees and wage earners in the United States, it is estimated, and when we subtract from the 70,000,000 the women and children who are neither wage earners nor employees, and then deduct the million or more of those who have accumulated wealth and live only by loaning money, it must be apparent that the number of employers—those who are enabled to pay wage earners—must be very few, probably not more than a million as against the 15,000,000 wage earners. Who can become an employer with the certainty staring him in the face that the article he produces by hired labor is constantly diminishing in value? From the farmer to the manufacturer the lesson is the same. The farmer may possibly till his soil for himself with his own hands—be laborer and owner at once, for his own subsistence—but he can not afford to hire help to enable him to run his farm when the products of his farm will not pay for that hired help. The manufacturer who must depend entirely upon hired employees can not afford to manufacture goods when the articles, after they are produced, will not pay the price of his employees; and yet that is the condition of affairs we have to-day, and the result is that just as rapidly as the men who are employers can get out of the business of employing help they cease.

The single standard and free trade make war upon every man who is engaged in promoting industry, every rustler, every person who hires, and thus prevents the employees from having an opportunity. A wage earner can do better to be paid $1 a day for six days than to be paid $2 a day for three, and yet that would be the effect of free coinage of silver. His dollar may not be worth so much, but his opportunity is vastly greater; his chance of employment is five times greater. The whole amount of money that will be paid out to all the wage earners of the United States under free silver coinage will be double that paid now to the laborers of the United States. The single salaried officer might complain that his dollar will not buy so much, but the great mass of wage earners are the very ones that will be benefited by it. Among those who are equally benefited is the creditor. The free coinage of silver is for the benefit of the debtor and creditor alike. In the first place, there are few, if any, creditors in these United States. It is almost impossible to say when a man is a creditor. The same man is debtor and the same man is creditor in so many complicated transactions of this world that it is impossible almost for the man himself to say whether he is a debtor or creditor on the whole balance. We are all in debt. We all owe our share and portion of the national indebtedness. However wealthy the capitalists imagine themselves, they owe a part of the national debt. We all owe a part of the municipal debt. We all owe a part of the railroad debt. Whether we like it or dislike it, whether we live near or far from the railroad, the railroad indebtedness of this nation to foreign nations, to Great Britain, must be paid by all of us. By means of their rates they reach down to the pocket of every man, woman, and child in this country. They reach all property as if with taxing power.

No man can use the railroad to ride himself or to transport what he produces or to purchase what he consumes without paying in some measure some part of the railroad indebtedness. He can consume nothing unless it has been brought to him by the railroads, roads of which he knows nothing, whose names perhaps he may never have heard. But he is paying in every consumption he makes a portion of the indebtedness of railroads. It must come from us all, and we are all debtors to the extent of our proportion of it. But so with all the rest of the debt of the nation. When this shall have been adjusted, when this shall have been paid, it is impossible to say whether an individual is a debtor or creditor. The benefit, however, of the free coinage of silver is to all alike.

It is not right for this Congress to adjourn without making some effort to pass some measure to raise revenue for the benefit of the Government. We do not do our duty until we do. It is our duty now to return to constitutional methods, our duty to see to it, first, that the Executive is stripped of that evil power which he is now exerting, contrary to the Constitution and contrary to its law, of himself determining when, where, and how much money shall be borrowed. It is our duty to deprive him of that first, and then proceed to pass some measure, upon which we must agree, to furnish revenue by means of a proper and suitable bill. The occasion is here. The bill is still before us as it came from the House. It is our duty to-day to take that bill up, to consider it, to amend it, and provide revenue and to thus prevent the need of the Executive usurpation.

This country can well afford at once to undertake the free coinage of silver. The coinage itself is necessarily slow, and no great amount of foreign silver could be received or coined at our mints. Joined with protection, which the nation is demanding, free coinage would stop the constant fall of prices of everything. We would begin upon an era of industry, prosperity, higher prices, and success in all parts of the country. Both parties were in 1892 committed to a double standard. True, there were certain qualifications detracting from the force of the plain statements that they were in favor of the double standard, but the declarations still stand, and all the United States is pledged to this double standard. The Republican party is pledged to carry out measures to bring this country to a double standard. That promise remains unredeemed. It is the duty of the party to fulfill that promise. Strike from the platform the qualifications, leaving the simple declaration in favor of the use of both gold and silver at the old ratio and the free coinage of both, added to the protective policy, which is the index of American patriotism, and then the country and prosperity will join hands and thank with acclaim the fulfillment of these promises.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Daniel,	Hill,	Pugh,
Allen,	Davis,	Jones, Ark.	Quay,
Allison,	Dubois,	Lindsay,	Sherman,
Bate,	Elkins,	McBride,	Smith,
Berry,	Faulkner,	Mitchell, Oreg.	Stewart,
Brice,	Gallinger,	Morgan,	Teller,
Brown,	Gear,	Morrill,	Tillman,
Butler,	George,	Nelson,	Vest,
Cannon,	Gibson,	Peffer,	Walthall,
Carter,	Gorman,	Perkins,	Warren,
Chandler,	Hale,	Pettigrew,	White,
Chilton,	Harris,	Platt,	Wilson,
Cullom,	Hawley,	Pritchard,	Wolcott.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, it is probable that 90 per cent of the American people believe that the power to issue bonds should be withdrawn from the Administration, if it ever existed there constitutionally and legally, and that it should be reposed again in the hands of the representatives of the people. The granting of such authority was a threat of danger. Its appalling misuse by the present Administration is an achieved disaster. I believe in the bill now pending and shall therefore vote for it, as also for the resolution which has been proposed to serve notice that all bonds hereafter issued without consent of Congress shall be considered void.

Having said so much, Mr. President, which is all that is necessary on this question, I might conclude, but for the necessity of referring to strictures which have been passed upon those Republicans who chose on the 25th day of February of the present year to vote according to conscience and the will of their constituents and against consideration of the so-called Dingley bill.

It has become the fashion of late on the part of those Senators who do not believe in the free coinage of silver to hold up to popular disapproval and to invoke the detestation of the people upon the Senators of Republican faith who joined with the Democracy and the Populists in favor of silver as against a partial and indefensible tariff. It is quite noticeable that such remarks usually come from Senators who have political fences to repair at home, and who, feeling the need of an argument to reenforce a position already declared by their people to be untenable, seek to transfer disapproval from themselves either to their colleagues or to other Senators belonging to their own party. I have the utmost sympathy with such gentlemen, and I do not desire to resent with any unkindness the attacks which they may choose to make. If any man can find comfort in this way, if he can win back the lost love of his people, if he can again acquire their confidence by such methods, no matter who may be the object of attack, I simply pity him, as I always pity weakness. But, Mr. President, it is not within the province of any man on this floor to cast aspersion upon any one of the five Senators of Republican faith who on the 25th of February voted against the consideration of an iniquity, a monstrosity in legislation; nor is it just to allow such aspersion to be attempted without comment. The Dingley bill would have taken from those who had not to give to those who already had too much. It was a narrow, a sectional, an unjust measure. This is not to question the conscientious vote, or speech, or conduct of any man upon this floor. I believe that those who themselves are honest in their motives and in their deeds are ready to concede that others are also honest. The imputation of insincerity attempted to be cast upon us reflects directly back upon the men who utter it. A hypocrite fancies all others are guilty of hypocrisy, no matter how straightforward their course.

I know of only two influences which should guide a man in this Chamber or in any position of public trust. The highest and the first—that which should always control—is conscience. A man should first satisfy his own idea of right. Next to that he should gratify the wishes of the people who sent him here. I do not care to fall into the custom, which is more honored in the breach than in the observance, of making a speech to my constituents from this Chamber, by which to repair some break in the lines of selfish or political interests at home. But I do wish to say that there is not one of the five Senators upon the Republican side who voted against the consideration of the Dingley bill who has not had a vindication which any man, no matter how high his station, might well take with pride unto himself.

THOMAS H. CARTER and LEE MANTLE, Senators of the United States from the State of Montana, voted against consideration of that bill. At the ensuing State Republican convention they were unanimously returned to the national convention of the Republican party. FRED T. DUBOIS, a Senator from the State of Idaho, voted against consideration of the Dingley bill. At the ensuing State Republican convention in Idaho he was returned to head his delegation to St. Louis with only 5 dissenting votes; and by the way, Mr. President, he was the only Senator from the State of Idaho who was thus honored by his people, as he was the only Senator from the State of Idaho who chose to vote against consideration of the Dingley bill. HENRY M. TELLER, a Senator from the State of Colorado, voted against consideration of the Dingley bill, and he was unanimously sent to St. Louis at the head of the delegation from that State, and the other delegates were instructed to follow his leadership. One Senator from the State of Utah voted against the consideration of the Dingley bill, and at the ensuing State convention he received 501 votes out of a total of 522, and his nearest competitor received more than 200 votes less than that number.

Mr. President, the five Senators from the silver States who declared that a protective tariff, sectional and unjust, should not become a part of the revenue system of the United States by their votes, and who declared in public announcement that no protective tariff disassociated from bimetallism would be sufficient to relieve the distresses of the people of the United States, have all the consolation which they need. Doubtless each one of them feels the approval of his conscience, and each one of them has positively received the indorsement of his people at home.

I have no desire to reflect upon any gentlemen on this floor or elsewhere, but I do know that the great beating heart of the intermountain States is for free and unlimited coinage of silver, and that the people there take for their leader on this question HENRY M. TELLER, rather than the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]. Any gentleman who seeks to pacify his people at home by saying that he voted for the free and unlimited coinage of silver, or for the consideration of a measure looking in that direction, by following the leadership of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] rather than the leadership of the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] will find that his people reject magnificent technicality and splendid hairsplitting and plant themselves on the plain common sense of the proposition.

Mr. ALLISON obtained the floor.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Utah [Mr. BROWN], who has addressed the Senate at considerable length on this subject, entered into an elaborate argument to show that the power granted by the act of January 14, 1875, had been exhausted, and that any further issue of bonds under its provisions is illegal and void. I should like to ask that Senator, who is a distinguished lawyer, what disposition he would make of section 3700 of the Revised Statutes, under which all the bonds which have been issued recently have been issued.

Mr. BROWN. I do not understand that they were issued under that section, and I ask the Senator whether he claims that they were issued under it or the act of 1875?

Mr. ALDRICH. The Secretary of the Treasury and the President say so in a published communication, both to Congress and the country.

Mr. BROWN. In the published statements, as I understand and as I have read, they say that they are issued under the law of 1875. If I am not very much mistaken, the bonds themselves state that they are issued under the law of 1875. The discussion in their favor has been upon the law of 1875, the discussion against them has been upon the law of 1875, although of course that would not weigh.

Mr. ALDRICH. The President in his annual message stated that the bonds were issued under section 3700 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. BROWN. The last one?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes, the last one.

Mr. HARRIS. If Senators would address the Chair and not each other perhaps the rest of us could hear what is going on.

Mr. ALDRICH. And the Secretary of the Treasury makes the same statement. If there is not sufficient power under the act of 1875, there is certainly under the provisions of section 3700 of the Revised Statutes. This is surely too serious a question to be disposed of without full consideration. If the Senator from Utah expects to get the action of the Senate upon this proposition it seems to me that he and the gentlemen who think with him should state what view they take of section 3700. If the bonds which have been issued recently have not been legally issued, if they are not valid, if they are void in the opinion of Senators, it is time that the holders of those bonds and the country should understand it.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. ALLISON. I will yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. BROWN. I should like to ask the Senator from Rhode Island whether he claims that these bonds were not issued and not authorized by the law of 1875 or whether they were wholly issued by the law of 1862 and section 3700 of the Revised Statutes? Because it must be true that they were issued under one or the other. There must be some explicit law to authorize it. They must be authorized by one or the other, and we must plant our right to issue them upon that particular law. I had supposed from the argument of the venerable Senator from Ohio—I had supposed from the statement made by the President that it was assumed that the law of 1875 was the only power for their issue. I can state, if necessary, why I think that section 3700 does not give authority.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Utah has asked me a question as to my opinion. I have not the slightest doubt myself that both the act of 1875 and section 3700 of the Revised Statutes authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell bonds of the United States to any extent he pleases whenever it is necessary to maintain the public credit, for the redemption of United States notes, or for the payment in whole or in part of the public debt of the United States.

Mr. STEWART. May I be allowed to say a word?

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. STEWART. I wish to say just one word.

Mr. ALLISON. I will yield with great pleasure to my friend from Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. I have taken this matter into consideration before. Section 3700 of the Revised Statutes reads as follows:

The Secretary of the Treasury may purchase coin—

Not gold coin—

with any of the bonds or notes of the United States authorized by law, at such rates and upon such terms as he may deem most advantageous to the public interest.

It does not authorize the Secretary to purchase coin with any other bonds than those authorized by law. He can not sell bonds to buy coin unless he is so authorized by law.

This was passed in 1862, when from time to time laws were being passed to buy coin to pay interest on the public debt which was payable in coin. But the funding act of July 14, 1870, provided what kind of bonds should be issued, and all the bonds now issued were issued under that law. There is no other law in existence on the statute books describing a bond that may be issued. The bonds issued under that law were confined, in the first place, to the refunding of the national debt, with a provision that the national debt should not be increased in amount. When the national debt had been funded and the full amount issued there was no further power to issue under that act.

The only other act that authorized the issue of bonds was the provision in the act of 1875 authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell bonds to the extent necessary and to buy coin to redeem the greenbacks which would be outstanding on the 1st day of January, 1879. So the law is absolutely inoperative unless you can point to a provision that authorizes the issuance of the bonds. If there is any law authorizing the issuance of the bonds the Secretary can sell them for coin whenever the law authorizes it.

Mr. ALDRICH. The act of 1870 does it in express terms.

Mr. STEWART. The act of 1870 authorizes the issuance of bonds?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes, sir; of various denominations.

Mr. STEWART. I beg pardon; it authorizes the issuance of bonds enough to fund the public debt, and it declares that there shall be no more issued than an amount sufficient to fund the public debt, and that the public debt shall not be increased thereby. When the public debt was funded all the bonds authorized by the act of 1870 were issued and no more could be issued. The only authority for issuing bonds must be found in the act of 1875. That is a limited authority and does not apply to the issuance of bonds now.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator from Rhode Island put a question to me which I in part answered, but not fully. I desire to answer why section 3700 did not, in my judgment, authorize the issue of bonds. My answer is that that statute permits the sale of bonds for coin, but in itself does not authorize the borrowing of money or the issuing of bonds. It presupposes that bonds have been authorized by some other statute. Of itself it would not be operative. But if bonds were authorized by another statute, and there were other statutes then in force stating the amount to which the Executive might borrow, the Secretary could issue the bonds which he was allowed then to issue; he could exchange them for coin. That was the sole purpose of that statute as it has just been read here and as it appears in and of itself. It is not sufficient to warrant the Secretary of the Treasury to borrow money. But if he were authorized by some other statute he might exchange bonds for coin. That is my answer, and I think it is conclusive.

Mr. ALDRICH. There is no authority of law for the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds to borrow money to pay current expenses. There is no contention of that kind here or anywhere else, so far as I know. He is authorized to issue bonds for two purposes. One is to provide for the redemption of United States notes; the other is to obtain coin to pay the public debt, the whole or any part, either the principal or interest; and no Secretary of the Treasury has any authority of law to issue bonds for any other purpose.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, having yielded to Senators about me, I hope, as I intend only to speak briefly, that I may proceed without interruption and say what I desire to say on the pending bill. I regret that we have occupied several days of the closing hours or days of the session in the discussion of a proposition which it is well known can not pass at the present session, and therefore will have no other effect than to enable those who desire so to do to express their opinion upon the subject.

There is, I think, no doubt of the fact that every Senator on this floor agrees that the power to borrow money is not an executive power. It does not rest in the President or in the Secretary. It is a power conferred upon Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa will suspend while the Senate receives a message from the House of Representatives.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the President of the United States having returned to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, the bill (H. R. 7977) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repair of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, with his objections thereto, the House proceeded in pursuance of the Constitution to consider the same; and

Resolved, That the said bill pass, two-thirds of the House of Representatives agreeing to the same.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. ALLISON. I will yield.

Mr. VEST. I ask unanimous consent that the river and harbor bill and the message of the President thereon be taken up for consideration immediately after action upon what is known as the bond bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the bill known as the river and harbor bill, with the message of the President of the United States, be taken up for consideration immediately after final action upon the pending unfinished business. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERMAN. I must object unless some arrangement is made in regard to the bill which has been before the Senate two or three times, and which ought to have been disposed of several days since. I shall object to any order being made until we have some agreement in regard to the measure known as the filled-cheese bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio objects.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator wants to take that responsibility he can do so. He will get no agreement about the filled-cheese bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio objects.

Mr. VEST. I give notice that I shall move to take up the river and harbor bill to-morrow morning immediately after the routine business.

SALE OF GAS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6094) relating to the sale of gas in the District of Columbia, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the first and second amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same amended so that the first section of the bill, down to the proviso, shall read as follows:

"That the Washington Gas Light Company of the District of Columbia is authorized to charge and collect, after the 1st day of July, 1896, for illuminating gas furnished to and paid for by private consumers in the District of Columbia, at the rate of not exceeding $1.10 per thousand cubic feet until the 1st day of July, 1901, after which last-named date the rate shall not exceed $1 per thousand cubic feet; and that after the 1st day of July, 1896, the Washington Gas Light Company of the District of Columbia shall furnish to the United States Government and the District of Columbia gas at the rate of $1 per thousand cubic feet."

And that the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3 and 4, and agree to the same amended so that the second section of the bill, down to the proviso, shall read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the Georgetown Gas Light Company, doing business in that part of the District of Columbia formerly known as Georgetown, is authorized to charge and collect after the 1st day of July, 1896, for illuminating gas furnished to and paid for by private consumers in that part of the District of Columbia, at the rate of not exceeding $1.35 per thousand cubic feet, until the 1st day of July, 1901, after which last-named date the rate shall not exceed $1.25 per thousand cubic feet; and that after the 1st day of July, 1896, the said Georgetown Gas Light Company shall furnish to the United States Government and the District of Columbia gas at the rate of $1.25 per thousand cubic feet."

And that the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the fifth, seventh, and eighth amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the sixth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same amended as follows: In lieu of the words "twenty-four" insert the words "twenty-five"; and that the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the ninth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same amended so that section 5 shall read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That neither the Washington Gas Light Company nor the Georgetown Gas Light Company shall hereafter issue any greater number of shares of stock than shall be equal to the actual cash value of said plants and necessary cost of the construction of future extensions or future enlargement of plant, which cash value and cost of extensions shall first be ascertained and authorized upon petition therefor to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, under such regulations as the chief justice and the justices thereof shall prescribe; also if either of the said corporations shall desire hereafter to issue bonds upon their property, secured by mortgage or otherwise, upon petition therefor to said court, setting forth the necessity thereof and the amount of stock issued and outstanding, it may and shall be lawful for said court, or the chief justice and justices thereof, as the case may be, or one of them, upon public notice, to be prescribed by the rules of said court, to permit the issuance of such bonds and mortgage as desired: Provided, That the amount of stock and bonds issued shall not exceed the actual cash value of said plants and the cost of such extensions or enlargement of plant: And provided further, That the Washington Gas Light Company is hereby authorized to issue such additional amount of capital stock as will provide for the conversion into such stock of its outstanding certificates of indebtedness, which conversion of said certificates is hereby authorized to an amount not exceeding $300,000."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its tenth amendment.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the eleventh amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same amended so that said amendment shall stand as section 6, and the Senate agree to the same.

JAMES McMILLAN,
CHARLES J. FAULKNER,
J. H. GALLINGER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

REASSESSMENT OF WATER-MAIN TAXES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President be requested to return to the House the bill (H. R. 3279) to authorize the reassessment of water-main taxes, and for other purposes.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 9188) authorizing the appointment of a nonpartisan commission to collate information and to consider and recommend legislation to meet the problems presented by labor, agriculture, and capital was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

REGULATION OF BOND ISSUES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1341) to prohibit the further issuance of interest-bearing bonds without the consent of Congress.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like at this time to get unanimous consent in reference to a vote. The Senator from Iowa knows about how along he will speak. About how much time will the Senator from Iowa occupy?

Mr. ALLISON. It is impossible, I will say in answer to the Senator, for me to know precisely how much time I shall occupy. I will be as brief as possible. I think there will be no trouble in reaching a vote.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator himself has no objection I would suggest that we have a unanimous agreement to stop general discussion at 4 o'clock, and then continue under the five-minute rule until 5 o'clock, if the Senate so desires, but to take a vote as soon after 4 o'clock as there is no desire to continue discussion under the five-minute rule, and to take the final vote on the bill and all amendments thereto not later than 5 o'clock.

Mr. TELLER. I think the Senator from North Carolina had better let the order stand, which is that we shall come to a vote some time to-day.

Mr. BUTLER. I suggest to the Senator from Colorado, if he will pardon me, that, as all are aware, a great many Senators would like to attend to some social duties this evening, and it will be very hard to hold a quorum here.

Mr. TELLER. We are very likely to get through with the bill early. I shall object to fixing a time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado objects. The Senator from Iowa will proceed.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I will repeat that the power to borrow money rests in Congress under the Constitution, and therefore the bill is simply a declaration on its face, which has the intent and purpose only of repealing the existing power in our statutes to borrow money. Therefore it appeared to be necessary for the Senator from Utah [Mr. BROWN] to hold in his observations and argue that there is no power under existing laws to borrow money for any purpose. When on yesterday I interrupted him with a view to express an opinion as respects the powers contained in the law of 1875, he responded to me very properly that statutes could not be construed by the hazy and misty memories of those who participated in their enactment, but that we must take the laws as they are found upon the statute books and interpret them in their letter and spirit.

I believe and have believed since the statute of 1875 was put upon our statute books that it carried with it, by its own force and vigor, the power to borrow money to execute its purposes. The Senator from Utah [Mr. BROWN] yesterday argued at some length that the plain import of that statute is that when a United States note under it was redeemed in the Treasury it was then to be destroyed and canceled, and that there was under it no power to borrow to reissue, and that therefore this power to borrow money exhausted itself for that and other reasons on the 1st of January, 1879.

When we look at the contemporary circumstances that surround the passage of that law we can readily see and know that the plain import of the language of the statute taken as a whole was meant and intended to provide that only those greenback notes over and above $300,000,000 should be canceled and retired, and that $300,000,000 and no more should be allowed to continue in circulation as bank notes were continued in circulation, redeemed, and reissued by the Government of the United States.

It will be remembered that we had a contest, long and serious, respecting these notes before the resumption act of 1875. In April, 1866, we passed a law through the two Houses that the Secretary of the Treasury could withdraw and retire and cancel $10,000,000 of these notes within six months, and that he should thereafter retire and cancel $4,000,000 per month of the notes until they were all canceled and destroyed. That law was on our statute book for two years, and under it there were canceled $44,000,000 of greenbacks, the total issue authorized by law during all the period of the war being $400,000,000, with an emergency act authorizing the issue of $50,000,000 more. During all that period the greenback circulation of the war was limited to $400,000,000. In December, 1865, after the war closed, in the House of Representatives, Democrats and Republicans alike, with but 5 dissenting votes, declared it to be wise public policy to retire all those greenbacks, but as time went on the opinions of men changed, and when 1866 came that same Congress limited the retiring of greenback notes to $4,000,000 a month after six months.

In 1868, when there were $356,000,000 of these notes in circulation, Congress passed a joint resolution, as I remember, prohibiting the further retiring of a single dollar of the greenbacks then in circulation, and, therefore, from 1868 to 1875, with an exception to which I shall allude, the destruction or retirement of greenback circulation was inhibited by the joint resolution of 1868.

In 1873, during the panic which occurred in that year, the then Secretary of the Treasury construed the law which authorized the issue of $400,000,000 to permit and enable him to reissue up to the amount of $400,000,000; and the Secretary of the Treasury, under the stress of that panic, issued greenbacks to the extent of $27,000,000. So when the statute of 1875 came into play the limit of the greenback notes was $383,000,000 in round numbers. It is not important to my purpose, but I am reminded that both Houses of Congress afterwards passed provisions looking to the justification of that issue by the Secretary of the Treasury.

There is another bit of history that should be remembered in connection with this law of 1875, and that is that in December, 1861, the banks of the United States suspended specie payments, and from 1861 to 1879, a period of eighteen years, there was a suspension of specie payments in the United States. I merely allude to this, for it is useless for us to stand here and talk about the double standard, the gold standard, or the silver standard between those years. There was no standard in the United States, except for a brief period, between 1861 and 1879 but a paper standard, fluctuating day by day and hour by hour as measured in gold, and gold was sold upon the marts of our great cities at a premium during all that period; the premium at first being small, I agree, at least being small as we approached the year 1879. It is well known to those who are familiar with that period, and to most of us here, that during all that time, especially after the close of the war, there was a condition of unrest and distrust, followed at times by panic, by people not knowing how to transact business, for they could not tell, owing to the rise of gold or its fall, whether they would make profits or losses. Therefore the great business interests of this country had knocked at the doors of Congress over and over again and asked that Congress should in some way provide for the convertibility of the irredeemable paper of the United States into coin. We had the greenback agitation running through four or five years, some insisting upon an indefinite issue, and others insisting that the greenbacks which were already authorized and had been issued should continue in circulation.

Mr. President, if you will look at the fluctuations of this money during all these years you will see that in 1862 it fluctuated from 101½ to 134, in 1863 from 122 to 172, in 1864 from 151 to 285, in 1865 from 128 to 234, and so on until in 1869, long after the close of the war, the fluctuations were from 119½ to 162½ in a single year, a fluctuation of over 40 per cent in a single year in the currency of our country, which measured all values, controlled all purchases and all sales of property, and measured the wages of labor. So it is not singular that during these years, continuing up to 1875, the fluctuations ranged from what I have stated to 9, 10, 15, and 20 per cent.

When we convened in 1874, after the elections of that year, when the Democratic party for the first time since 1861 had secured a majority of the House of Representatives, there was a pressure of public opinion upon the Congress of the United States to deal with this question in some form. There were then, as there are now, men in both political parties who believed that the greenbacks should be obliterated from our circulation; that the United States itself should be free from any responsibility respecting the circulating money of the country. These divers opinions found their way into a caucus of the Republican party in 1874, in December, and that caucus, consisting of eleven Senators, prepared a bill which became a law on the 14th day of January, 1875. I wish to take note of the provisions of that law for a moment. The first section of it directed the Secretary of the Treasury to proceed immediately to the coinage of fractional silver—for what purpose? For the purpose of placing in circulation fractional silver coins in lieu of the fractional paper money which was then in circulation, and no other. Not only the silver dollars of the United States had found their pathway out of this country, but the 10-cent pieces, the 25-cent pieces, and the half dollars had taken wing and flown to more remote places where they could find circulation. So when this law was passed the first section was designed to deal with the minor paper money which was then in circulation, and we provided for a substitution of fractional silver for the paper money then in circulation, there being no fractional silver in circulation when this law was passed.

The second section related to the charge for coinage. Section 3 provided—

That section 5177 of the Revised Statutes, limiting the aggregate amount of circulating notes of national banking associations, be, and is hereby, repealed.

What was that for? There had been by prior statute a limitation of $354,000,000 upon the aggregate circulation of national banks. That was repealed in order that there might be an addition to the paper circulation; and for what purpose? It is shown further on in the act, where it is provided that—

Whenever, and so often, as circulating notes shall be issued to any such banking association, so increasing its capital or circulating notes, or so newly organized as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of Secretary of the Treasury to redeem the legal-tender United States notes in excess only of $300,000,000, to the amount of 80 per cent of the sum of national-bank notes so issued to any such banking association.

That is to say, as fast as $100 in national-bank notes were issued $80 of greenbacks might be retired, until the sum of $300,000,000 was reached.

Mr. GEORGE. What is the date of that act?

Mr. ALLISON. The act of January 14, 1875, which is called the resumption act. Then comes the remaining provision:

And on and after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem, in coin, the United States legal-tender notes then outstanding, on their presentation for redemption at the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States in the city of New York, in sums of not less than $50.

In the face of the surrounding circumstances at that time, is it to be supposed for a moment that this law was intended by those who made it to be construed into a provision whereby the entire greenback circulation should be destroyed and canceled and retired? When, however, this law appeared upon the statute books, and when this process authorized by the act itself was going on, it became a moot question, I agree—and I am not surprised that the Senator from Utah has been misled by it—among the people who wished to destroy the greenback currency whether, as applied to the Government, the word "redeem," in the latter part of this statute, did not mean to pay off, and require the Government to borrow money in order to redeem and pay off every dollar of the greenback currency. In order that there might be no question about the construction of that law, later, in 1878, there was a statute passed, which was alluded to by the Senator from Utah yesterday. The only purpose and intent and effect of that statute was to limit the retirement of greenback notes to $346,000,000, and to require specifically that they should be again paid out.

Mr. President, when you take the whole of this statute you will see that its purpose was to require the Secretary of the Treasury to provide for the redemption of these notes, first using the surplus revenue, and then selling as many bonds as he chose to sell for that purpose, of course in the expectation that no unnecessary debt would be created for the redemption of these notes.

The then Secretary of the Treasury, the honorable Senator from Ohio, whose duty it was to execute this law, so managed that great office during that period as that the redemption of these notes on the 1st day of January, 1879, became a pleasing pastime, and the business men and the industrial people of this country, its wage earners and producers, knew nothing of the change. The Secretary of the Treasury borrowed $95,500,000 as a preliminary step to the execution of the law, and a surplus revenue was also provided. Did the Secretary of the Treasury or any of his successors ever for a moment dream that when these greenbacks were paid into the Treasury they must be retired and canceled, even though money had to be borrowed for that purpose? That law was uniformly construed as I construe it, as meaning that down to $300,000,000, and afterwards $346,000,000, these greenback notes were to continue a circulating money as bank notes are circulating money, to be redeemed and reissued in the ordinary course of business.

Mr. STEWART. May I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. ALLISON. I can not refuse the Senator.

Mr. STEWART. Was it ever contemplated at the time spoken of by the Senator from Iowa that those notes should be redeemed only in gold?

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will have patience I will deal with that question frankly; but I am dealing with another question now.

Since 1879 what I have stated has been the course of the Secretary of the Treasury. During that time—I do not remember just when—those who believe as the Senator believes brought a suit in one of the courts of New England to test this law and the amendment to it, claiming that when greenbacks were redeemed they could not be paid out again by the Secretary of the Treasury, and if he did so pay them out it was a new issue of greenbacks, which was unauthorized by law and was in violation of the Constitution of the United States. That case went up to the Supreme Court. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] will remember the details of it. I believe it was upon that case that every member of the Supreme Court of the United States united in the opinion that it was a question for Congress to decide as to the emergency and the time of dealing with the notes of the United States.

Mr. BROWN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. BROWN. That decision was limited solely to the legal tenders. No word is to be found in the decision as to the legality of the bonds.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly; I understand that.

Mr. BROWN. It is reported in 110 United States Reports.

Mr. ALLISON. I did not quote it for that purpose. I only mentioned it for the purpose of showing that it was never the intent of this original statute, or of any subsequent statute, or of anybody in the United States, to dispute the intent and purpose and manifest meaning of this law, which was, first, that the greenbacks should be reissued; and, secondly, that they should be redeemed in coin. Look at the language:

The Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem in coin.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish the Senator would be kind enough to read that clause of the section in answer to the claim made yesterday that after one redemption there can be no other redemption. The language is:

And on and after—

That word "after" was thoroughly construed, and thoroughly debated, and held to extend to all time.

And on and after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem in coin the United States legal-tender notes then outstanding on their presentation for redemption at the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States in the city of New York, in sums of not less than $50.

That was construed at the time by all the best lawyers in the Senate and by the court as well as a continuous provision—"after"—not until doomsday; not for five years, not for ten years, not for any period, but for all time.

Mr. ALLISON. On and after that time.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. "And the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem."

What did Congress do to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to execute that imperative duty imposed upon him? They said to him first that he could use the revenues, and next that he could use the credit of the Government. What is that? It is to borrow money; and the experience of the last eighteen years prior to that time had taught the American people that the credit of the Government was a precious boon to them, and that it ought not to be lightly interfered with or lightly trampled under foot.

What was that credit? It was that the laborer who toiled in his shop on one day should not be required on the next day to take a less sum in purchasing power for his day's wages than he had agreed to take the day before; it was to create a stable measure of value as to all property, all credit, all debt, and all measure of the wages of labor. So you see when you come to analyze the act of 1875 it is one of the marking points in the period of the progress of our country. It was put into play years after its date. This was to give ample preparation not only to the Treasury but to the people of the United States to gradually reach the point of convertibility which was anticipated by that action.

Mr. President, I have characterized this as a great boon. Was it or was it not? Are these great interests which I have described such as that we can deal with them here as we deal with the balls upon a billiard table? That law took effect upon the 1st of January, 1879, and, without fear of successful contradiction in this place or any place, I can maintain, but need only state, that from that time forward until 1892 we had a period of unprecedented prosperity in the United States, whether that prosperity is measured in the accumulation of wealth, whether it is measured in the wages of labor, whether it is measured in the value of property, or whether it is measured in the surplus profits of earnings which came to all those who toiled.

I listened the other day to the speech of the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY], in which he portrayed the growth and development of our country from 1880 to 1890. I have had occasion more than once to make that investigation, and it applies to the great Northwest region in which I dwell. It is shown by the census of 1890 that the five States carved out of the Northwest Territory and the seven States which were created from the Louisiana purchase west of the Mississippi River, being twelve States in all, in 1890 had two-fifths of the population of the United States and more than two-fifths of the sixty-four thousand million dollars of wealth in the United States. Twenty-five thousand millions of it were aggregated in the twelve States I have named, against eleven States upon the Atlantic Seaboard, including the great States of Pennsylvania, Maryland, New York, and the whole of New England.

So whatever may have been the mutations and changes as to the effect of this great act of 1875, it must be admitted that at least for the period I have described it did not in any way deter or impair the power of the citizens of the United States to largely increase their wealth.

Without going into a discussion of the question, I think it must be agreed that in order to have prosperity in our country whatever measures our values or measures our property or measures the wages of labor must have a reasonable stability. It is not possible, I agree, to have an exact measure, but it must have that reasonable stability whereby during short periods one class of men shall not be robbed for the benefit of another.

Therefore, from what I have already said, it must be apparent, it seems to me, to every Senator that it would be a most unwise and unjust thing to all the people of the United States for us to run the slightest risk of a relapse into the condition under which we labored between 1861 and 1879. In other words, no part of the people of the United States, it seems to me, can be benefited by relapsing into an unstable and fluctuating, and it may be a depreciating currency, nonmetallic, and that we should take no risk whatever in that direction.

Mr. President, it must be remembered that we are taking this question as it exists in 1896. We are not dealing, as we all think we ought to, with this financial question by and large. There is no proposition here for free coinage of silver; there is no proposition here for the enlargement of our currency and giving it flexibility; there is no proposition here dealing with this general subject. Is it wise for us in the closing hours of the session, even by our votes, to say that we are willing to deal with this question in a spasmodic or in a partial manner?

I have heard it said that this taking away of the authority which is given by law to the Secretary of the Treasury is a mere bagatelle. What is it? We have now in circulation as many greenbacks, less the loss in shrinkage, as we had in 1879 on the 1st of January. We have, in addition to that, in round numbers, $130,000,000 of Treasury notes. I do not claim that they come within the purview of the law of 1875. Therefore I need not be interrogated upon that point. We have the same number of greenbacks; but we have weighting down those greenbacks—although the act of 1875 does not apply to them—$130,000,000 of Treasury notes, which are a full legal tender. We have in addition to that three hundred and sixty-odd millions, I believe—I have not the tables before me—of silver certificates, each of which has behind it, I agree, a silver dollar, but which constitute a redemption fund, each dollar for itself. What have we—and I address that to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] and to those who propose to vote with him—what have we to maintain the redemption of the $346,000,000 of greenbacks?

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator yield to me for an answer?

Mr. ALLISON. I am not asking for an answer now.

Mr. BUTLER. I am anxious to answer the Senator's question.

Mr. ALLISON. I intend to answer it myself.

Mr. BUTLER. I may not want to rely on the Senator's answer.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall be glad to hear the Senator after I have done. I do not want to occupy much time, and shall be glad to yield to him when I finish my statement.

Mr. BUTLER. I hope the Senator will make a good answer.

Mr. ALLISON. I may not make a good answer, but I will make the best I can.

I have here a statement issued by the Treasury Department on June 1, which shows the situation of the Treasury. This statement shows that there is in the Treasury $108,345,233.91 in gold coin, $100,000,000 of which, the Secretary says, is devoted and applicable to redemption purposes.

What else have we? I am now speaking on the assumption that silver should be paid out. We have now in the Treasury $18,864,000 of free silver, that is, silver belonging to the Treasury. That constitutes our redemption fund, and nothing less and nothing more. I heard it said by some one here the other day that we have seigniorage on silver to the extent of $55,000,000, which might be coined and thus used. If it could be coined and thus used, it would be a bagatelle. But how can it be coined and used? Not by this law. It can not be thus coined and used until Congress, by an affirmative statute, authorizes such coinage and use.

Mr. TELLER. We have done that.

Mr. ALLISON. We have?

Mr. TELLER. We passed an act of that kind which the Executive vetoed.

Mr. ALLISON. Oh!

Mr. TELLER. I think the Senator from Iowa voted to sustain the veto.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course the Senator from Colorado wishes to be perfectly fair. I voted against the proposed law because it authorized, among other things, as I plainly showed in this Chamber, not only an equivalent amount in certificates or notes, but it authorized on its face twice the amount, and I was not willing to give $55,000,000 in addition of fiat money for the sake of having $178,000,000 of other money coined.

Mr. TELLER. I think the Executive, who hunted for some excuses, did not make that one of them.

Mr. ALLISON. Perhaps he did not. It only shows how the Executive fails to see a good point now and then. We may have passed such a bill, but as the Senator from Colorado says, it was vetoed, and it did not pass over the veto. Therefore it is not a law now.

How is the silver to be coined? It is to be coined in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Treasury has no seigniorage until it is coined. What is seigniorage? It is the thing that arises out of coinage. It can not exist until the dollars are coined under existing law. I know we could provide a law whereby we could rescue, as it were, or rejuvenate probably $50,000,000, but not $55,000,000, because a portion of it has been coined since that time.

Mr. STEWART. Let me ask the Senator from Iowa a question. Does the Senator contend that there is no power in the Secretary of the Treasury to coin the silver in the Treasury?

Mr. ALLISON. Per contra, I have just stated that he can coin every ounce of silver in the Treasury, and as he coins it the seigniorage arises.

Now, how would he coin it? We have, with the existing mints, as has been shown here over and over again, the ability to coin between forty and fifty million dollars of silver per annum, which is the ultimate coining capacity of the mints, and if we are to build new mints it will take at least a year to do it. Allowing that $50,000,000 of silver can be coined, there would be a residuum fund of probably twelve to fifteen million dollars arising out of it, and nothing more. So here we are playing with the great question of the convertibility of all our paper money upon the idea that if we choose we shall find, without this power, a sufficient amount of money to redeem the greenbacks, which by law and by solemn obligation, as sacred as any obligation we have, we are bound to redeem, when the holder of one of the greenbacks presents it.

We might take some hazard as respects this matter if there were a great overpowering emergency; we might take some hazard if we had a full Treasury, as we did have for many long years after this law came into play; but here we are with a deficit for the current year amounting, in round numbers, probably to thirty-three or thirty-four million dollars, swelling each month, because, as I saw in a newspaper this morning, supposed to be reliable, the receipts during the month of May just passed were less than the receipts in any May for five years. Yet I heard another Senator say the other day that there is a large amount of money in the Treasury. So there is; but does it redeem greenbacks? Can you redeem greenbacks with a greenback? The money in the Treasury, over and above the reserve of $100,000,000, is the same kind of money, practically, that is to be redeemed.

So we are here now running the hazard not of the silver standard of money, but of going back within thirty days, if it were possible to enact this bill into law, to an inconvertible paper-money standard, irredeemable, with nothing behind it except the credit of the Government, because if you take away the prop that sustains the house you destroy the house itself. Are we ready for that? The prop which sustains the greenback currency is the credit of the nation and the reserve, and the power to create it, which we gave in 1875. It is proposed now to take away the only prop that is left after the reserve of $100,000,000 is gone, because confessedly—and it is made the subject of criticism on both sides of this Chamber—those who have voted appropriations this year have voted a considerable sum beyond the current receipts of the Treasury. If we pass this bill we shall have put gyves upon our wrists and shall have tied ourselves in such way that we will be likely within a short space of time to go to inconvertible paper money.

I have talked longer than I intended upon the subject, but I wish to say a few words more in relation to the matter.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator pardon me? He has finished the answer to his own question?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. Therefore, if he will pardon me, before he proceeds I should like to correct his answer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. ALLISON. I yield for a few moments.

Mr. BUTLER. I think I can answer in a few moments. It would be very easy to reply to the Senator's statement in detail, but the bill was drawn especially in order to prevent the necessity of doing that. Has the Senator from Iowa read the bill? It was drawn to prevent wasting time over splitting hairs, over detail and catch phrases and various sophistries which the men who support the gold standard use on all occasions. We can not argue with these gold advocates, because they dodge facts and arguments and at once jump back to their pet phrases. What is the language of the bill?

The issuance of interest-bearing bonds of the United States for any purpose whatever, without further authority of Congress, is hereby prohibited.

The Senator's argument all falls flat when he simply looks at the bill. It is true we have no free-coinage measure on the statute books, which I regret more than does the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. BUTLER. It is true we have not such a bill now pending with a possibility of passage, which I regret more than does the Senator from Iowa. It is true we need some method to increase the currency, which we have not, which I regret more than does the Senator from Iowa. But the pending bill was drawn to prevent those Senators who uphold the gold standard from dodging the real issue and basic question that lies at the bottom of the whole financial troubles of the country and the hard times that oppress——

Mr. ALLISON. I do not yield to the Senator from North Carolina for any observation of that character. Let us understand that in the beginning.

Mr. BUTLER. Unless the Senator considers that the patriotism, the desire to uphold the credit and power of this Government, rests with the President of the United States, and unless he has more confidence in the President than he has in himself and others on this floor, he can not oppose the bill. There is not a country in Europe that claims any credit for solvency or respectability where it would be necessary to pass such a bill as this, because no such monstrous power has ever been given even their kings to borrow money and pile up debt without limit.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

Mr. BUTLER. There can not be raised a single dollar by the Crown of Spain without the authority of the legislative power. The Crown of Great Britain lost his head for attempting to usurp such power.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I decline to yield further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa declines to yield further.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from North Carolina talks in a circle.

Mr. BUTLER. Not at all.

Mr. ALLISON. I said in the very beginning of the discussion that there is no power anywhere except in Congress to authorize the issuance of bonds. I have argued in vain if I have not shown that the point here is the convertibility of the greenback notes into coin and not into other fiat money; I have stated that all the money can be made applicable to the redemption and reissue of those notes, and therefore the answer of the Senator from North Carolina is no answer.

Of course we all agree that you can not authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to borrow money in any other way than by law. There is such a law now. The Senator's proposition is to take that power from the Secretary. Why? Because he thinks that by that indirection he will force this country not to the silver standard, but to an irredeemable paper-money standard, having neither silver nor gold behind it. He supposes still further that he will force the people of the United States who disagree with him, by indirect methods and not by bold movements, to carry out what he believes ought to be carried through the two Houses and approved by the Executive—a law authorizing the free coinage of silver at 16 to 1 by the United States alone.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Iowa can not wish to do me injustice. He puts words into my mouth without any authority.

Mr. ALLISON. I will only ask the Senator from North Carolina to tell me whether he does not favor the free coinage of silver at 16 to 1, and whether he does not believe that what he proposes here will be a step in that direction? If he does not believe it he is playing with idle balls.

Mr. BUTLER. I believe that if the pending bill is passed before any more gold is borrowed to support the gold standard, the President will call Congress together and Congress will decide the question which the Senator is now trying to dodge. Congress will decide whether or not we shall borrow gold; whether or not we shall have free coinage; whether or not we shall have an increase of the standard money of the country by some other method, and this body is the one to decide it. That is bold; that is honest; and that is the honest way in which I want to do it. The Senator's method, I must say, in justice to truth, is indirection, because he wishes to dodge the question and leave the power in the Executive.

Mr. ALLISON. I have endeavored to show, first, that the power to borrow money under the law of 1875 is an essential power. I have undertaken to show, and I think I have shown, that if it is taken away we shall go back again to inconvertible paper money. Now I am told indirectly that because I have so stated I am dodging the real question at issue here.

I do not expect to weary the Senate by arguing the silver question, nor do I expect to deal with the historical part of it. I merely wish to say that when the law was passed we had neither silver nor gold. We had a gold standard, it is true, created by the act of 1873, but that act was as inoperative then as a statute that could not be made operative before 1879. When the statute of 1873 was passed we were upon an inconvertible paper system, with neither gold nor silver in our country, except a small amount to pay duties on imports and interest upon the public debt. On the Pacific Coast the gold standard prevailed, and there greenbacks were at a discount, instead of gold being at a premium. There all contracts were made in gold coin alone. Provisions for such contracts in the laws and statutes of some of those States have not been repealed to this day, I believe. But with the exception of the Pacific Coast we had at that time no metallic standard of money. We had a fluctuating and, it is true, an appreciating paper standard, but we had neither silver nor gold.

I wish to say, with respect to the question which we have in hand, that it will be decided, I have no doubt, in a greater or less degree in the future, but it will never be decided until it is decided right. I have always believed, and I believe now, that the United States can not by itself open its mints to the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 without becoming a monometallic silver nation. I believe that it should be done by means of international arrangements with other commercial nations. So believing, I have voted always, and so long as I thus believe, and until some Senator can convince me that I am wrong, I shall continue to vote against the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 by the United States alone. When the law of 1875 was passed, I repeat, we had the gold standard, but we had neither silver nor gold. So long as the coins are at a parity with each other, as they are now, the greenback notes are redeemable in either, and they are so held, I believe.

Without arguing the belief I entertain upon this subject, and without, in any sense, intending to unite or in any way to join the two questions, I believe that it is the height of unwisdom for us to deal partially with this question. When the question as to the free coinage of silver by the United States alone and the opening of our mints to its free coinage at a ratio of 16 to 1 is before the Senate, I expect, I will say in answer to my friend, to vote as I have hitherto voted.

Mr. STEWART obtained the floor.

Mr. BUTLER. Before the Senator from Iowa sits down I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to ask a question.

Mr. ALLISON. I have agreed to yield to the Senator from North Carolina, who seems to have a speech of mine in his hand.

Mr. BUTLER. Inasmuch as the distinguished Senator from Iowa——

Mr. CHANDLER. Who has the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood that the Senator from Iowa had closed his remarks, and recognized the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART].

Mr. ALLISON. I was about closing my remarks when the Senator from North Carolina asked me to yield for a question before sitting down, and I will be glad to do that, although I do not crave the opportunity.

Mr. BUTLER. That is very evident.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Nevada as entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEWART. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina to ask a question.

Mr. BUTLER. As the Senator from Nevada yields a moment, I wish to enter my protest against the statement made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] that all of the purpose and scheme on the part of Populists and others to whom he refers in this connection is to run this Government to irredeemable fiat money, whatever he means by that—something horrible, he says.

Mr. ALLISON. I did not say that was the purpose. I said that was the effect.

Mr. BUTLER. I so understood the Senator. He says it is the effect. Does not the Senator himself fear that it means free coinage, for does not the Senator know that during the coming summer, as soon as Congress adjourns, the gold reserve jumping down every morning, being only $108,000,000 this morning, more bonds will be issued to sustain the system which he is advocating and supporting? He knows it, and he is willing to see it done.

Now, he knows this in connection with it, that if the bill which I have offered becomes a law, instead of the President issuing bonds, he will call Congress together if the emergency arises and Congress, this body, will sit in judgment and decide whether or not those bonds shall be issued or whether the free coinage of silver shall increase the circulating medium or some other method.

Does the Senator object to the legislative branch of the Government deciding this question? That is what he fears. It is not paper money. He fears the judgment of the American people in Congress assembled. He thinks that the gold ring have a cinch on the President of the United States and he wants to see that they keep it. He wants to see that the next President keeps it. He wants to see that the man whom the Republican party will put up, if he should be elected, will keep it, and they now pretend to be trying to make Eastern men scared of your candidate [turning to Senator SHERMAN] from Ohio, to fool the Senator from Colorado, and to fool people in the South and West. They know that McKinley belongs to the gold ring as much as Cleveland does, but they are trying to fool the free-silver men in the Republican party—trying to make them believe that McKinley is for silver, trying to make them believe that the gold ring is not satisfied with him. That game worked a few years ago, but it will not work now. The Eastern goldbugs are pretending to be afraid of McKinley's goldbuggery. They say they will bolt if McKinley does not satisfy them on this point. They have known for years where McKinley stood. He is the special candidate picked out by the gold ring. My dear friend, that game was smart a few years ago, but the American people have waked up. It will not work. What the Senator from Iowa and those who stand with him fear is that this dangerous and terrible bond-issuing power will be vested in the people and their representatives to decide what shall be done, and that is all that he fears, and I challenge him to stand up and say before his God and his conscience that he fears anything else.

Mr. CHANDLER and Mr. STEWART addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. STEWART. I have not given up the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from Nevada to yield the floor.

Mr. STEWART. I did not yield the floor at all.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Nevada held the floor.

Mr. STEWART. I yielded for a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood that the Senator from Nevada yielded the floor. There can be no farming out of the floor of the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. I yield to the Senator from Nevada. There is time enough.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire yields to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, we have made some progress to-day. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] has relieved us from all the laboring part of our argument. He has conceded and stated that the greenbacks and Treasury notes are redeemable in silver coin as well as gold.

Mr. ALLISON. As long as silver is kept at a parity with gold.

Mr. STEWART. So long as they are at a parity? Can the Senator find the word "parity" in the language of the law? What does he mean by that? The statute says "coin of standard value" and nothing else. "So long as they are at parity." What does the statute of 1875 say about parity? It says that the Secretary may purchase coin to redeem the greenbacks outstanding on the 1st day of January, 1879—then outstanding. It does not say silver coin or gold coin, but coin, and the question as to what was meant by "coin" has been very well settled by about a three-fourths vote in the two Houses of Congress in the passage of the Matthews resolution in 1878.

I think my friend the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] voted for that resolution. He voted for it. The present Secretary of the Treasury voted for it, and there can be no question about the language. That being taken for granted; that being the law, and nobody can question it, it solves the whole practical difficulty, because if the Secretary of the Treasury will exercise the option to pay in silver no gold gambler will come to get the silver. Every one of our silver certificates stays out. They do duty as money. Nobody takes them to the Treasury to get silver. They are the best money we have. You go into any bank, and three-fourths of the money you get is in the shape of silver certificates. The greenbacks and Treasury notes are redeemable in the same way, and they would be just as good money and just as safe if the Secretary would exercise his option to pay in silver as well as gold. That is the only trouble.

Now, there is of silver coin in the Treasury $18,000,000, and of silver certificates $10,000,000, making $28,000,000, in round numbers, of silver coin in the Treasury, because these silver certificates can be exchanged at the option of the holder for coin. If the Government owns them it can go to the other counter and obtain coin for them. We have $28,000,000 of coin. That is silver. Then it is made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to coin the silver for the purpose of redeeming the Treasury notes issued under the act of 1890. He has not done that. He has used a large amount of gold, I do not remember the amount, bought with bonds, to redeem the Treasury notes issued under the act of 1890, when the law says in so many words that he shall provide for the redemption of those notes by coining the silver purchased under the provisions of the act of 1890. So if he proceeds to coin the silver he would have an ample amount. He ought to have done it long ago. He could have had it all coined now if he had done his duty, because the whole of it should be coined.

The Senator from Iowa says only $40,000,000 of silver can be coined in a year. I undertake to say that an expenditure of ten or fifteen thousand dollars will double the capacity, and so far as coining is concerned, as I said the other day, if you will pay to any private party the charge that is paid to the Government by the owners of bullion to have it coined, what is deducted from their bullion for preparing it for coinage, you will have $500,000,000 a year coined.

A public institution, self-sustaining, would enable private parties to make at least 50 per cent profit, if not 75 per cent, because there is a great deal of machinery about the mint. So there is no difficulty about the coinage if there was any disposition to coin it. We have, then, $108,000,000 of gold, $30,000,000 of silver, $50,000,000 of seigniorage, $130,000,000 of coin besides bullion that should be coined—ample provision, more than would be called for.

Let the Secretary of the Treasury say that the Treasury notes and greenbacks would hereafter be redeemed in silver. They would go into circulation immediately. Those notes would be as good money as the silver certificate which circulates. They do not now circulate; they are either tied up in the Treasury or are in the banks to be prepared for a raid at any time. Over $100,000,000 of these legal tenders are tied up in the Treasury.

There are $270,000,000, in round numbers, of money in the Treasury, with $55,000,000 more of silver bullion, which it is the duty of the Secretary to coin, making, in round numbers, $325,000,000, the larger portion of which ought to be in circulation. It is tied up, and we are threatened with another bond issue. We are threatened by the Administration, or rather Wall street says we are going to have more bonds. And for what purpose? To buy up more currency and impound in the Treasury this unhealthy surplus, a larger surplus than when parties were running upon the question and the issue was to relieve the Treasury of the surplus which was collected in taxes. Now we have a surplus collected by bond dealing, a surplus taken out of the circulating medium, and a further threat to take out more; and it is claimed that Congress can not pass this law resuming its function to regulate the borrowing of money without bankrupting the Treasury. Is it possible that the gold and silver will be drawn out before Congress can meet? We know very well that $28,000,000 of silver is a sufficient bar to protect the Treasury.

Germany, with only $150,000,000 of silver in the Empire, is able to protect all her gold by her practice of paying silver when gold is asked for export. France protects her gold from export by the exercise of her option to pay in silver. If the United States would exercise her option as other nations do her credit would be as good as theirs. It is because the United States undertakes to do an impossibility, because the United States opens her Treasury to speculators, because the Administration combines with stock jobbers to drain the Treasury, to wreck the credit of the Government, that our credit is impaired.

There is enough silver in the Treasury now to maintain the credit of the Government through all time. They will not take the $28,000,000, and besides silver is coming daily into the Treasury. One-half of the revenue, I am informed, is paid in silver certificates, which means silver coin, and there is no limit to the amount of silver that will come in during the year, and it can be used for redemption purposes. There will be an ample redemption fund in silver coin pouring into the Treasury daily, coming in the way of revenue, and that is the kind of redemption first mentioned.

The statute of 1875 says that the Secretary of the Treasury shall use the revenue that comes in to redeem these greenbacks. When that is insufficient he may sell bonds. Everybody knows the revenue now is ample. There is a great surplus, and he can use all the revenue that comes in from taxes for the purpose of redeeming the Treasury notes. There are more silver certificates constantly coming into the Treasury in payment of taxes than there are greenbacks presented for redemption in gold. The outstanding Treasury notes would be as good money and as free from uses for fraudulent purposes as the silver certificates if the Secretary would do his duty. In the face of what the Secretary has done, in the face of the bond deal of February, 1895, in the face of the charges made in the public press, in the face of the conviction on the part of the people that something is wrong, in the face of this manipulation of the Treasury Department, in the face of the fact that the Senate has passed a resolution to investigate those transactions, shall we leave the Administration in power to continue the speculation upon the nation's credit—to continue, in other words, to wreck the nation's credit and impair the moral standing of the Administration? Everybody knows it has been badly impaired. Everybody knows what we now demand is that in the absence of Congress there shall be no more scandals.

It is said by the Senator from Ohio that this bill will not become a law, and that if it passed the other House it would not be approved by the President. Let the other House take its responsibility if the other House wants to assume it. If the other House is desirous of sanctioning this stock jobbing, if it is anxious to sanction the bond deal of 1895 and the bond deal of this year, if it is anxious to sanction the disregard of the law, if it is anxious to sanction the robbery of the Treasury to pay gold when the Government owes no gold—if the other House is anxious to do that, send it this bill and let it take the responsibility. If the Republican party indorses the Cleveland Administration, if the Republican party indorses these bond deals, let it be done by their votes. Let the people of the United States know who is responsible, who are engaged in this practice of wrecking the public credit, who are in it, who support it, who are backing it. If these bond deals, I say, have the backing of the Republican party, let the votes tell; and if the Republican party in the other House want to back Cleveland and Carlisle and Pierpont Morgan and encourage them to make further deals, let them refuse to pass this bill when it reaches them. But let the Senate act, a majority of which is opposed to these deals, a majority of which is opposed to wrecking the public Treasury, opposed to stock jobbers and gold gamblers raiding the Treasury and bringing disgrace upon the country, opposed to buying up currency and impounding it in the Treasury. That has been shown by several votes. Let it be shown by the votes to-day, and let those who are in favor of it take the responsibility.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, it was not worth while for me to make so much effort to get the floor to make the few brief remarks that I desire to submit. I rose to deprecate the spirit and the manner of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] which he has brought into this debate. The remarks which he made the other day I do not find reported in the RECORD. I suppose they are kept for revision. But if they are printed as they were uttered they will contain what I conceive to be undignified and unbecoming threats against those who differ from him in opinion. If I am not mistaken, the Senator talked about revolution and bloodshed. He was willing that the views which he entertains upon public questions should prevail without revolution and without bloodshed if they could thus prevail, but, if necessary, the Senator very clearly intimated the disposition of himself and of those with whom he is associated in the party known as the Populist party to resort to any means to accomplish the purposes which they have in view.

Mr. BUTLER. Now, Mr. President, I should like——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. CHANDLER. I would rather the Senator would reply after I finish.

Mr. BUTLER. But I would rather, if the Senator will be just, that he would not misrepresent me further, because I am sure he does not intend to do it purposely. The Senator says there was a clear inference from my remarks that if the People's Party could not have its way, the purpose of the People's Party was to resort to bloodshed. He states what I think he can not find another Senator on the floor to sustain him in saying, for no others will say, I think, that they drew such conclusions from my remarks, or that any such inferences could fairly or justly be drawn from them.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I allow the Senator from North Carolina to make the disclaimer before I go on, and I proceed to say that I think those words will be found in his remarks. I think the Senator said that he was willing, that he hoped—perhaps that is the way he put it—that these evils with which humanity and society are afflicted might be removed without revolution and without bloodshed.

Mr. BUTLER. That is about the language I used. I used the word "hope."

Mr. CHANDLER. I chose to assume, for the purposes of these remarks, that there was an implied threat in that kind of language.

Mr. BUTLER. Then the Senator is the only one who can——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield?

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not yield any more.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire declines to yield.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is a question which I leave to the Senate. I undertake to say that the language of the Senator then, the language of other Senators on some occasions, and the language of other members of the Populist party, are calculated not for the calm discussion of public questions, but are calculated to produce the revolution and the bloodshed which they say they hope to avoid and which they say they hope will not be found necessary, in order that the objects which the People's Party desire to secure may be accomplished.

Mr. President, the spirit and the language of the Senator found quick response in the Southern country. I have the Philadelphia Inquirer of Monday morning, June 1, in my hand, and it contains the following telegram:

TALLAHASSEE, FLA., May 31.

At a Populist picnic near Lairds Mill, Washington County, yesterday, Henry Dangley shot James Powers through the stomach, after having had his arm nearly severed with an ax in the hands of his assailant.

The wives of the two men are sisters. The women became engaged in a quarrel, one championing gold and the other free silver. The men also differed on financial questions and took up the quarrel.

Powers infuriated Dangley, who rushed at him with a knife. Powers seized an ax and sunk the blade so deep into Dangley's arm at the shoulder that the member hung only by shreds. Dangley retreated to his wagon, where his wife seized a Winchester and hurriedly handed it to her husband.

He took the weapon in one arm and resting the barrel over the wheel of the cart fired several shots at Powers. Finally one bullet struck Powers in the stomach and he fell to the ground. It is thought he can not recover.

Dangley was placed in the cart and driven to Lairds Mill, where his wound was dressed. On the way he lost so much blood that his life is also despaired of.

That, Mr. President, comes from only one Southern Populist picnic since the Senator from North Carolina expressed the hope that all the great benefits to society which he and his party desired might be accomplished without revolution and without bloodshed.

I hold in my hand a copy of a newspaper published at Raleigh, N. C., the issue of May 28, 1896, the Caucasian, "published every Thursday by the Caucasian Publishing Company, Marion Butler, president." I find on the third page of this sheet a very full "Account of the National Congress"; "Some record of what the people's representatives are trying to do in the Senate."

In the Senate Senator Butler's bill to prevent the further issue of bonds without the consent of Congress was the main feature of interest.

Mr. President, what follows is so bad, is so violent and so abusive and so unjust to the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], that I do not dare to take the responsibility of putting it in the RECORD. I hand it to the Senator, so that he can see what kind of language his newspaper is engaged in printing in connection with Senators upon this floor with whom he is in the habit of meeting in friendly intercourse and in constant daily debate.

I rose only to suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that if he expects to make proselytes for the views which he entertains it will be necessary to approach the subject in a different spirit and with different utterances from those which he puts forth on this floor and publishes in his Caucasian newspaper in the State of North Carolina.

Mr. President, this is about all I had to say, except to express the hope that this bill may not pass. I am afraid that there is a small majority in its favor, but I hope that the sober sense of the Senate will assert itself, and that we will not upon the eve of final adjournment repeal the only law upon the statute book which enables the President and the Secretary of the Treasury to protect the national credit and the public honor during the six months which will intervene before Congress again meets.

Mr. President, everyone knows that Congress has been unable to pass any bill for the relief of the public Treasury, or to avert the public calamity which may result from a depleted Treasury. The House of Representatives has passed a bill, but nothing has been done with it in the Senate. Our Populist friends, who stand between the two parties here, and, I regret to say, a few vainglorious Republican Senators, have interposed to prevent any legislation which would relieve the public Treasury at this crisis in our affairs. Now, as we can not pass any affirmative legislation, why not for heaven's sake leave upon the statute book the little remnant of authority there is in the President and Secretary of the Treasury to take care of the national credit and the national honor during the coming half year?

Mr. President, it is only a question of interest on bonds. Not even my violent friend from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] nor my stalwart friend from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] contends that the President or the Secretary of the Treasury has laid dishonest hands upon one dollar of money that has been borrowed. They do not steal it. It goes into the Treasury. There is not one dollar embezzled; it is a mere question, as I said, how much interest we shall pay upon the bonds which are issued. However much we may differ from our President and our Secretary of the Treasury, as we do on many questions, as Republicans on this side of the Chamber differ fundamentally upon many questions, yet we give to them the credit of possessing absolute personal integrity. No one has ever ventured to say that the Secretary of the Treasury ever had a dishonest dollar in his life; and certainly no one will undertake to make any impeachment of the personal integrity of the present President of the United States.

Mr. President, they are not the President and the Secretary of the Treasury of my choice, but while we are to be absent at our homes, there they will stand representing the power as well as the credit and the honor of the United States. In my judgment they are to be trusted with that power; and we ought to leave with them every particle of power which the statutes of this country to-day give them to enable them to see to it that the national credit and the national honor receive no detriment during the recess of Congress.

I am happy to say that two-thirds or three-quarters of the Republicans upon this side of the Chamber propose to vote that to this extent, of leaving the laws as they now are, they have confidence in the Democratic President of the United States; and I ask Senators upon the other side of the Chamber who participated in the election of President Cleveland, every one of them, who is of the same politics as that of John G. Carlisle, to sink all animosity against the President of their choice and the Secretary of the Treasury of their choice and to join with us at least in one patriotic vote, where all Senators shall rise above party and say to the people of this country and to the people of the whole world that at least the law as it now stands upon the statute book, and which enables these executive officers to protect the honor and the credit of the United States, shall not be stricken down by our votes.

Mr. President, it is of no use to say that this bill will not pass the House of Representatives, and therefore we might as well pass it as not. There are Senators here to-day, I regret to say, who will vote for this bill and send it to the House of Representatives who would not take the responsibility of voting for it if they believed it would become a law, and I do no more than justice to my friend from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] now sitting before me when I say that if he had the responsibility of taking away absolutely from the Secretary of the Treasury all the power to borrow money he would not do it merely to make a platform for the People's Party, but would himself refrain from voting to put this law upon the statute book, which strikes down all power upon the part of the Secretary of the Treasury to borrow money to protect the credit of the United States.

Mr. President, realize how we should feel if we were in Europe to-day. There is not a Senator here, whatever he may say in private conversation or whatever he may be led to say upon the floor of this Senate occasionally in debate against the President of the United States, who, if he were abroad and were to hear his American President maligned, would not rise in his defense and denounce with fiery indignation any criticism which might be made upon his nation's President.

Mr. President, it is a strange thing for me to be defending your President [Mr. FAULKNER in the chair] when two-thirds of his own party on this floor are afraid to trust him with the existing power upon the statute books of the United States to borrow money—not one cent of which either he or his Secretary of the Treasury will ever be charged with misappropriating—to borrow money to protect the honor of the United States during the period when the custody of that honor passes out of our hands because we go to our homes for six months.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I rise at this time not for the purpose of discussing this question, but to make a statement personal in its nature.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator from South Dakota yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I want to say first that the action of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] in taking an irresponsible newspaper squib about some local and unfortunate if not exaggerated affair in Florida and bringing it into this discussion as a dignified argument or as worthy of consideration is resorting to a kind of unsenatorial method that puts him on a plane where he can not with good grace criticise the methods of any other Senator which may not meet his fastidious taste. Suppose I should rise here every morning after there had been a fight in a Republican town, or in any kind of Republican caucus, meeting, or gathering, where the distribution of Republican patronage and spoils or campaign funds was the trouble, and should call attention to it as a forcible argument on the floor of the Senate against that party, I should not think that I was doing myself or my cause any credit. I should think that it was not dignified. I should think it was unbecoming.

Mr. President, aside from that, I wish now to say a word with reference to the paragraph in my own newspaper, the Caucasian, to which the Senator from New Hampshire referred.

Mr. President, I do not go behind the backs of Senators here to express myself. I say what I think, and in as mild and courteous language as I think the occasion demands or justifies or will permit, and say it on the floor of the Senate. I do it boldly; I do it candidly; I do it as a right and as a duty. I do not think I have ever taken occasion to attack any man in my paper with language which I would not use on the floor of the Senate. The Senator did not mean to intimate that, I hope, by his reference to my paper, but what he did say by implication makes it necessary for me to make this statement, since he left that impresssion upon the minds of Senators possibly——

Mr. CHANDLER. May I ask the Senator if he is willing to read upon the floor of the Senate the language that was used in the Senator's paper about Senator HILL and Senator SHERMAN and put it in the RECORD?

Mr. BUTLER. I will say—and that is what I rose to say—that the language used, of which the Senator complains, is language which I would not myself have used on the floor of the Senate or in the newspaper, and I regret, I say frankly, that it was used. But it is not in an editorial; it is not in the Washington communications; it is in what is called in this paper, and known among its readers, as an abstract of Congressional proceedings, which is made sometimes by one man on the paper and sometimes by another, and the man who does it has often taken occasion to make comments. He quotes from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD each week and takes what he considers to be the salient points, and he has often commented upon the parts he clips. I, of course, never read these extracts of Congressional proceedings, nor has my attention ever been called before to any comments interspersing these clippings from the RECORD of which I or anyone else could complain. Therefore I have never given any attention to this department of the paper, and have had no occasion to give any instructions with reference to it. I have just now read the paragraph referred to for the first time, and wish to say here and now that I do not approve of the language used with reference to the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from New York, however much I oppose their policies and methods, and shall take occasion to say so by next mail to the resident manager of the paper.

One word further, Mr. President. I do not think the Senator from New Hampshire was fair in taking an isolated statement, made in my speech a few days ago, without the connection, and attempting to misrepresent it—I will not say attempting, but that was the result—by connecting it with that newspaper clipping. The Senator well knows, and every Senator here knows, that the connection in which I used that statement was this: I called attention to the record on the pages of history, to the empires which have fallen and to what caused them to fall; the dangers to the body politic are now threatened, and history shows what the result has been when certain conditions existed and proceeded unchecked to their logical and direful conclusion. Then I called attention to the fact that those evils existed here, and that if they are not checked by legislative means or at the ballot box—that if we can learn anything from history, if we can learn anything from experience, the same thing will happen here that has happened there, and it was then that I said that I hoped and prayed that such a result would never come here, but that these evils would be remedied by peaceful and legal means.

I submit that that was a patriotic utterance, and it is one that I am not ashamed of; it is one that I am proud of, and from the bottom of my soul am sorry for the man who can not and does not entertain the same sentiments.

Charles I lost his head, and the cause, as well as the result, is a historical fact that is not wholly inappropriate to consider at this time; but if he could have issued bonds ad libitum without the authority or protest of the English Parliament and the English people, he would not have been disturbed about ship money and might have saved his head at the expense of English liberty. England has already passed the danger point that we stand on now. No crowned head of England can borrow money without limit. It must be done with the permission of the legislative branch of the Government and for a specific purpose. This is no threat; but it is the cold facts of history and a solemn warning for us at this time.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, last week one of the newspapers in this city in publishing the platforms of the various State conventions published the following with regard to the convention in South Dakota:

> Previous to choosing delegates a resolution was adopted requiring all nominees to go upon the floor and declare for McKinley and sound money, and not only to vote, but to work to accomplish this end.

As I am one of the delegates to the St. Louis convention from my State, I concluded to challenge this statement, not because it appeared in the newspaper press, for it has gone the rounds of the newspapers for the past month, but because there was placed in the RECORD on the 6th of last month an editorial from a South Dakota newspaper reiterating this statement with many adjectives. I therefore have decided to state the facts to the Senate with regard to the matter.

The assertion is that having for years on all proper occasions, as a member of this body, voted for the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, for the purpose of procuring a seat in the St. Louis convention I abandoned my position upon that subject and was willing to announce that I was ready to go to St. Louis and work for McKinley and sound money. I do not care to go into a definition of "sound money," but I simply wish to say to my fellow-Senators here that the statement that any delegate was required in the South Dakota convention to pledge his support to the gold standard or to any sort of financial plank or platform whatever is absolutely and unqualifiedly false and without any possible foundation for it whatever and made by designing persons for a purpose.

The convention in South Dakota on the 25th of March was a Republican convention. The chairmen, both temporary and permanent, were elected by acclamation; the platform was adopted by acclamation, and the chairman of the committee on resolutions was an ardent advocate of the free coinage of silver. The platform simply said that inasmuch as the Republicans of South Dakota were divided upon the financial question we would refer that subject to the St. Louis convention. There was no test of strength—no division—on the subject whatever. I was elected a delegate by acclamation, and so were the other delegates elected by acclamation; and there was no controversy, no issue, and no test vote whatever taken upon this or any other question.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that it is no more than fair and just to myself that I should have read at the Secretary's desk a letter which I wrote and which was published in February, 1894. I at that time was a candidate for reelection to the Senate of the United States. The people of my State had never taken a test vote on the question of the free coinage of silver, but it was well known that I had always voted and acted with those who advocated the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. Some of the newspapers which advocated the gold standard in my State attacked me, and I wrote the editor of one of these papers the letter which I will ask the Secretary to read, as it gives briefly, in a measure, my views at that time and ever since and my views at the present time upon the subject of silver.

I want to say further, Mr. President, that there is no position, much less the position of delegate to the St. Louis convention, however high and honorable the position of delegate may be, in the gift of the people of South Dakota or anyone else, that would lead me to sacrifice my convictions upon this subject. This letter will disclose that I took that position in the face of a campaign for reelection to this body.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Secretary will read as requested. The Chair hears no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

FROM SENATOR PETTIGREW.

Senator PETTIGREW thinks the attitude of the Blade is entirely wrong on the silver question and has favored us with a letter under date of January 25 in which he sets forth his views and the arguments on which they are based. As this is a public question in which all our readers are interested, some on one side and some on the other, and as his words will be read just now with especial interest, we herewith publish all of the letter which treats of that subject, deeming it a service both to him and the public. It reads as follows:

"I object to nothing that you have published except the statement that I am catering to the Populist vote in my attitude on silver. That is not the fact. I am catering to my own conscience and to what I honestly believe is for the interests of the people I represent, and to nothing else. I had rather be right on this question than be Senator. I consider it the greatest and most important question of the age, a question of civilization. I have given this question care and thought, and while I am in favor of an honest dollar, I consider the single gold standard the most dishonest dollar ever conceived by man. It is a dollar which grows in value all the time. The unearned increment which comes with every credit, resulting from the appreciation of the gold in which it is to be paid, is robbing the producing classes and has produced the present panic. An honest dollar is one that honestly at all times is an honest measure of debts. This must be a dollar which will not depreciate or appreciate. In order that this result may be accomplished the number of dollars must increase with the increase of population. It makes no difference what substance the dollar is composed of so the quantity is limited to the needs of business and the demands of population.

"The value of the unit of money depends upon the number of units, and not upon the stuff of which the units are composed. This is proven by the fact that the silver certificates remain at a par with gold, although they are redeemable in silver dollars, and can not be redeemed in anything else, but the functions they perform, and the fact that the quantity is not sufficient for the needs of business, maintain them at par, although the silver in the dollar is only worth about 50 cents. An honest dollar is a dollar which requires no more of human sacrifice and effort and toil to earn when the debt is due than when the debt was contracted. A gold dollar is therefore dishonest for the reason that it commands each year more of all the products of labor than it did the year before.

"In 1873, when silver was demonetized by this country and several nations of Europe, it took $1.03 to buy the same amount of vegetable food product that can be purchased for 75 cents now; animal food, meats, etc., it took $1.09 to buy what can be purchased for 81 cents now in gold; sugar, coffee, and tea, it took $1.06 to buy what can be purchased for 71 cents now; all mineral products, it took $1.41 to buy what can be purchased for 76 cents now; all textile fabrics, it took $1.03 to buy what can be bought for 59 cents now, and this decline has been steady and practically constant from year to year from that time to this. In other words, a man who owned a farm in 1873 and mortgaged it for $1,000 will have to produce one-third more of all the things which grow upon his farm to pay the debt than he would have had to produce at that time; in fact, the ratio would be greater than this. It would take nearly one-half as much more, and the same would be true of the yearly interest. Take, for instance, the item of wheat alone. To-day wheat is worth about 58 cents in Chicago, then it was worth $1.42.

"The decline in wheat has been greater, I think, than that of very many other products, for the reason that in addition to the appreciation of gold the bounty on the export of wheat resulting to the India merchant by the decline of silver has stimulated exportation from that country, so that, although the world produces no more wheat now than it did in 1873, and has not increased its production of wheat since that time, and the number of consumers of wheat have increased some 80,000,000, still the price has kept going on down, and the India people who produce no more wheat now than they did then ship their wheat and live on other things. In other words, for the last twenty years an ounce of silver would buy a bushel of wheat in India and lay it down in England, and that is true of the situation to-day. However, I am not going to discuss the silver question with you.

"I could not change my position on the silver question if I knew it would result in my defeat. I have refrained from making a speech upon this subject because I know the Republican party of the State of South Dakota are divided with regard to it and I do not care to make it a test of Republicanism or injure Republican success, but if attacked I shall try to meet this issue before the people. I am ready to defend my position anywhere and everywhere."

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think in justice to myself it should be known how this report came to be put into circulation and how the editorial came to be written which was placed in the RECORD. The editorial which was placed in the RECORD on the 6th of last month is from a Democratic newspaper, published in the town where I reside, and the editorial was written by J. Tomlinson, jr. Tomlinson has devoted a great deal of his time to me during the last three or four years, and has published a great many editorials of a personal and abusive nature. It was well known that his prejudice against and his personal dislike of myself is very bitter, and it seems to deprive him of the ability or capacity, if he ever possesses it, of telling the truth. He edits a Democratic newspaper, and is known to be a Republican, and therefore he is a Democrat only for revenue. Under his management and as editor of the leading Democratic newspaper of the State the Democratic party has nearly disappeared, not having elected a single Democratic member of the last legislature and having but 8,000 votes out of 80,000.

I do not care to say anything further with regard to Mr. Tomlinson, but I propose to put in the RECORD that which others have said with regard to this editorial.

I will say further that the Sioux Falls Press, the leading Republican newspaper in the State, offered $10 apiece for every credible person who would corroborate the statement of the Argus-Leader, or the editorial which has been placed in the RECORD. No witness has ever been produced, and the reward has never been claimed, and no person, with or without character, has been found to sustain the fables, fictions, and falsehoods of this pretended Democratic editor.

The Sioux Falls Press, after the editorial appeared which has been put into the RECORD, interviewed several prominent people in regard to the truth or falsity of the facts therein stated, among them Judge C. S. Palmer, who was for years a circuit judge in South Dakota, and who is one of the prominent lawyers of the city. I send the interview of Judge Palmer to the desk and ask the Secretary to read it, and also a statement by Mr. Ravndahl, the editor of the leading Scandinavian newspaper of my State on the same subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Press prints the following interviews, in addition to those of yesterday, regarding the estimate of gentlemen from this city who were in attendance at Huron, concerning the false and nonsensical reports sent out by Tomlinson and Cavalier:

Judge Palmer: "Yes; I have read the Argus' report of the convention yesterday and their published telegrams of to-day. I look at the Argus-Leader's attitude the same now as before the convention. Two distinct purposes seem apparent:

"First. Revenge upon Senator PETTIGREW growing out of the Postmaster Tinsley appointment.

"Second. To sow seeds of discord and, if possible, disrupt the Republican party in the State.

"Not one nor both of these purposes, I think, warrants the strange conclusions published in the Argus-Leader of yesterday. To say 'that Senator PETTIGREW was compelled to get upon the floor and pledge himself to not only vote but work for the adoption of a sound money (or gold) plank at St. Louis' is so glaringly unfair as to be absolutely untrue and sufficient to cast a great cloud of suspicion over the whole report. It is a matter of little importance to me whether Democracy calls the result at Huron a PETTIGREW or anti-PETTIGREW victory. To me it was a Republican victory. That Senator PETTIGREW had bitter political enemies at Huron amongst Republicans, Democrats, and railroad lobbyists is very true; but in my opinion there was never a moment in that convention when all of these forces combined could have defeated the Senator as a delegate to St. Louis. That the old railroad lobby, which was there in force, repeatedly tried to form combinations to do so is well known. The conservative leaders upon both sides were in the saddle at Huron. Concessions were made upon both sides with a view to Republican success, and no concessions were exacted or made upon either side which were not readily assented to for reasons stated. The committee on resolutions came near at one time to reporting a financial plank similar to this one, which declared for the use of both metals as well as the paper dollar; but believing that even this might provoke useless discussion prematurely they finally decided to relegate the whole question to the St. Louis convention, where it belongs.

G. Bie Ravndahl: "The effrontery of that Argus-Leader account of the Huron convention is amazing. I would not have believed it possible that such a thing would be done. The deliberations of the convention were dignified and proper, both in spirit and form. A few irresponsible parties occasionally showed bad taste, but the strong interest of good Republicans in their party's success caused the almost unanimous action of the convention upon nearly every matter of importance before it. No one was humbled. Senator PETTIGREW made a strong, manly statement of his position and received the nomination as delegate at the hands of conservative Republicans and against the desire of a lobby which was composed largely of men who had been defeated by their own people at home. It was a PETTIGREW victory and so conceded by all but a few of the opposition. The Senator had to enlarge the band wagon several times to hold the people who had fought him and who struggled to get on. That report was gross."

Mr. PETTIGREW. I also desire to have the Secretary read an interview with C. A. Jewett, who is the largest wholesale merchant in my State, doing a business of $2,000,000 a year, and an interview with C. P. Bates, who is the city attorney of the city in which I reside, upon the same subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read as follows:

C. A. Jewett: "I told Mr. Tomlinson last night that I never saw such an exhibition of nerve and courage as the speech of Senator PETTIGREW when talking to the convention just before his election. So far as I could discover, and my thought was, the convention was a perfect success for Senator PETTIGREW. I talked with a great many on that subject, both to delegates and those who were not delegates, and I frankly say that I failed to find in a single instance any other view taken of the matter. I think the enemy was routed upon every issue and at every turn. In my judgment, Senator PETTIGREW came away from that convention with more true friends than he ever enjoyed before in the State."

C. P. Bates: "The Argus-Leader statement is entirely misleading and full of false assumptions and misrepresentations. So far as I know, the result of the convention is exactly what the Minnehaha delegates worked for from the time they left Sioux Falls. There was not a man in the Minnehaha delegation who worked against instructions as to the candidate from the time he left this city. During the campaign in Minnehaha County the railroad lobby worked against Senator PETTIGREW. At Huron the same lobby fought the proposition of his going to the St. Louis convention, and the result in both battles was the same. The delegation from Minnehaha County was unanimous in insisting that he must go to St. Louis, whether such was his personal wish or not. Senator PETTIGREW's desires as to resolutions were ultimately carried out by the committee upon resolutions and ratified by the convention. They left him standing squarely upon the same platform upon which he has consistently stood for four years. He was not placed in a false position regarding the money question at all. The convention, by a unanimous vote, left it to the judgment of the St. Louis convention, and this was the position taken by his friends. The victory was complete, certain, and decisive. It struck the lobbyists their second crushing blow."

Mr. PETTIGREW. I also desire to have the Secretary read an interview with H. H. Keith on the same matter. He is a prominent lawyer in the city where I reside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Secretary will read as requested. The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read as follows:

H. H. Keith: "I have read the Argus-Leader's report of the convention, and also its labored attempt in last night's issue to prove the correctness of its report. If the Argus-Leader was conscious of having made a correct and truthful report, it ought not to have been necessary for it to take so much trouble to prove its assertions true. The purported telegrams from the delegates elected come very far short of sustaining the allegations of the Argus-Leader. To my mind they are a complete refutation of its version of the convention. Senator PETTIGREW and his friends accomplished everything they wanted in the convention. They did not go to the convention for the purpose of waging a fight on anyone, but to take an active part in shaping the policy of the convention for the good of the Republican party of the State. Senator PETTIGREW's friends insisted that he should go as a delegate to the national convention. They made no opposition to instructions for McKinley; in fact, they were as enthusiastic for him as any delegates in the convention.

"Senator PETTIGREW and his friends were opposed to having the convention declare for a gold or silver platform, but thought it wise to leave the financial question to be settled by the national convention. Senator PETTIGREW addressed the committee on resolutions, as did other members of our delegation, and the resolution adopted by the committee was entirely satisfactory to the Senator and his friends, and they so expressed themselves to the committee before it decided to adopt them. The resolutions speak for themselves, but there is not a word of instructions in them in reference to the financial question. Every delegate to the national convention, with the exception of one or two, will work in perfect harmony with Senator PETTIGREW at the national convention, and I speak advisedly on this question. It seems hardly necessary to refute a Democratic version of a Republican convention, or even reports sent to Republican newspapers instigated by a Democrat. All I care to say further is, we got everything we asked for, and the convention adjourned with the best of feeling on the part of the delegates."

Mr. PETTIGREW. There are a great many other interviews in the same line, and it is unnecessary to place them in the RECORD. The editorial to which these interviews refer was written, as I said before, by J. Tomlinson, jr., editor of the Sioux Falls Argus. He secured an appointment as a representative of the press associations, and attended the convention in my State, apparently for the purpose of sending out these false reports, and he is the author of all the telegrams which were published by the Associated Press. He is the writer and instigator of the entire story, untrue in every particular from the beginning.

I do not care to say anything about Mr. Tomlinson except that his reputation for truth and veracity in the community where he resides is bad, and I do not believe he could sustain it in a court of law. He is unworthy of the notice I have given him, unworthy of my anger or contempt, and I feel that I owe my fellow-Senators an apology for having directed your attention to him even for one brief moment.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, at this hour I do not intend to enter into a general discussion of the silver question. The bill before the Senate is not connected with that question at all, or at least not necessarily. The question before the Senate is whether the American Congress will abdicate its power to determine when, how, and under what conditions the Government shall borrow money.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] has assumed that the Republicans of this body are in favor of putting that power in the hands of the Executive and leaving it there. I deny the right of the Senator from New Hampshire to speak for the Republicans of this country. It will be enough for him to speak for the Republicans of New Hampshire.

Mr. CHANDLER. May I ask whether the Senator from Colorado undertakes to speak for the Republicans of the country?

Mr. TELLER. I am going to speak for myself.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will accept the rebuke of the Senator and shall not undertake to speak except for the Republicans of New Hampshire, and I hope the Senator from Colorado will not undertake to speak except for the Republicans of Colorado, and then we are even.

Mr. TELLER. The Republicans of the country at the last election expressed themselves on the question of the increase of the public debt in time of peace. In one State represented in the other House 19 conventions that nominated members declared against the issue of bonds. I believe there were 19 members from that State who voted in favor of a bond issue. In my judgment the American people are not in favor of increasing the public debt in time of peace, and in my opinion the people who dissent from propositions to issue bonds are quite as honest and quite as tenacious of the public credit and the public honor as any gentleman anywhere who cries out for the lodgment of the most important function of government in the hands of the Executive, unrestrained and unhindered.

During the whole debate that has taken place in this Chamber over the pending bill the opponents of the bill have taken the position simply, and will admit no alternative, that the representatives of the States and the representatives of the people are not to be trusted to maintain the credit of the American Government. I dissent from that view. My education has been of a different character. I believe that the American people can be trusted at all times to maintain the honor and the integrity and the credit of the nation, and when the representatives of the States in this Chamber and the representatives of the people in the other can not be trusted to do that there might as well be an abandonment of this Government of ours and the pretense that it rests upon the consent of the governed.

It is to me a most astonishing spectacle that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], who has spent almost a lifetime in the public service, and who has been honorably mentioned in connection with great offices in addition to those which he has held, should in substance address the Senate and appeal to the Senate not to pass the bill, because if we do Congress, when called upon in an emergency, will not respond in a way to maintain the public credit. Then the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] follows in the same strain and congratulates himself and the country that at least three-fourths of the representatives in this body of the party to which he belongs insist that the legislative department is incompetent and untrustworthy to deal with this subject.

It is not at all a question of free coinage, nor is it a question whether the public will recognize as valid and legal the bonds which have been issued within the last two years. I do not myself intend to enter into any discussion as to the validity of the bond issues. It may be a controverted question. There is one thing I know, and that is that the American people intend, without respect to their belief upon the question of silver or gold, that every bond which shall be issued by the Government of the United States under the current pretense of law shall be paid according to the letter and the spirit of the bond. It is because there is a claim—and a claim, too, that may be made, I think, with great force—that the bonds when issued are obligations upon us which we are bound to pay that we desire to put upon the statute book a law which will determine when and how and where and under what conditions the Government of the United States shall incur indebtedness and increase its debt in time of peace.

I am willing myself to trust the American people. I have never seen an hour since I have been in this body when there has not been a majority of it ready and willing to incur any and all indebtedness that was necessary and requisite to the maintenance of the public credit, and the discharge properly of the public obligations. It is a part of the stock in trade of the people who are arrogating to themselves now, first, superior financial knowledge, and then superior financial integrity, to charge that everybody who does not agree with them is dishonest. We have heard it in this Chamber, we have heard it in the other, and we have heard it through the press; and yet those of us who here contend for what we claim is a decent system of finance have upon all occasions been found as active, as earnest, and as intelligent in maintaining the public credit and the public honor as these self-satisfied Pharisees who claim that they alone possess the honesty and the ability to deal with this question.

The question is not one that requires a great deal of examination or discussion, and at this hour I do not intend to go into any general argument in relation to it. The authority for the issue of bonds, if found at all, must be found under the act of 1875, in my judgment. If this act does convey to the President of the United States the full authority which it is asserted it does, and which I am not now denying—if it was intended to lodge that power with the Executive, it was under circumstances absolutely dissimilar to those now presented to us that the power was lodged with the President. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] himself, who has spoken of his connection with the act of 1875, could not have contemplated at any time that such a condition of affairs would exist as prevails now. When it was determined by the American people through their representatives that the Government would redeem the greenbacks in coin, it was not anticipated that the greenback would be used as an agency for the accumulation of money for export, whether it might be gold or silver. It was supposed that in the course of business affairs occasionally a man holding a greenback or a paper note would want gold or silver, the money of the world, and the Government undertook, as every just government should, to provide for a proper exchange for the paper money of the money recognized as the world's money, which I repeat was gold and silver, and in that day a decided preference for silver over gold existed.

The act took effect four years after its passage. I was not connected with this body when the act was passed. I was a member when it went into operation, as I had been for some time previous. We had provided in that act for what we thought would be the ordinary demands of business and trade. We had left it with the executive department to determine how much should be accumulated. There had been nothing said about the amount, and the Secretary of the Treasury fixed the sum in the neighborhood of $100,000,000. I will say that there was a good deal of controversy in the public press and some in this Chamber and some in the other body as to whether $90,000,000 or thereabouts was enough. It was asserted by some that the people would make a rush for the gold and that it would be all at once taken out. In the first year there was $11,000,000 of greenbacks presented to the Treasury for redemption or exchange, and in the succeeding eleven years and six months there was $28,000,000 in round numbers and a few odd hundred thousand dollars exchanged. It is apparent from this fact that this exchange of greenbacks for gold was a legitimate transaction, not for export but for use. Occasionally a man might have desired gold to lay away; occasionally he might have obligations that required him to produce gold to pay his debts; and in the eleven years and six months $28,000,000 alone was exchanged. That brings us up to 1890, and in the succeeding two years there was $15,000,000 more. There was in thirteen years and six months $43,000,000 of greenbacks exchanged for gold. We had maintained up to that time from $100,000,000 to $150,000,000 of gold in the Treasury to make sure that the men who wanted the gold could get it.

Since 1892, when the $43,000,000 had been exchanged, how much gold has been exchanged from the Treasury for greenbacks? From July 1, 1892, to December, 1895—and I have not followed it beyond that, because I have taken the Secretary's report for it—we had exchanged $360,266,000 in gold for either greenbacks or Treasury notes. During that time we had exported $305,000,000, leaving about $55,000,000 that was withdrawn from the Treasury that did not go abroad. What became of that I do not know. I presume some of it has been lodged in safe deposits, some of it has been made probably a special deposit in banks, largely growing out of the fact that the Treasury Department and the Government itself as an entity has been engaged during the last three years in declaring to the public that there were grave doubts whether the Government had either the honesty or the ability to continue this system.

It would be interesting to go into the reason why $305,000,000 have been withdrawn from the Treasury and exported. There is no time to-night. The gold people will tell us and do tell us that it has arisen from the fact that the silver question was especially alive and especially being discussed. In 1876 the silver question was here. In 1876 I first came into this Chamber, and amongst the first things that I heard discussed during the following winter was the silver question. In 1877 and 1878 it was as live a question as it has ever been in this body and in the other, and the public were discussing it everywhere. It has been a live question ever since.

In 1893 we changed Administrations. For myself I did not believe then, and I am free to say now, that I doubt whether it was wise that we made the change. It is asserted by those who represent the views that I do, in part at least, that the whole disarrangement of our finances and the withdrawal of gold from the Treasury, running from comparatively nothing to the rate of $100,000,000 a year, has grown entirely out of the discredit thrown upon the Government by a change of Administration. Mr. President, there never was a greater mistake than those make who believe that to be the case. The same condition, in my judgment, would exist to-day if Mr. Harrison had been reelected. I will add that a change of Administration must, in some degree, disturb and disorder business; and if Mr. McKinley, with all the promises that he and his friends are making, shall be inaugurated on March 4, 1897, there will be some disturbance then growing out of a change of Administration.

The other day, in looking over the financial reports of the city of New York issued by the great financial papers, I found that there had been a disturbance in the money market, and then I found the statement made by leading financiers that that had been largely the result of the almost certainty that McKinley was going to be nominated as the next candidate of the Republican party. It is easy enough to get up a fright and to disturb business. But the three hundred and odd million dollars that have gone out of this country, to which I have called attention, have not gone out of the country because of any fright; it was not because they were afraid of the party that is in power, nor is it because they are afraid of the party that is coming into power.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado a question.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator says that the financial journals spoke of some fright existing in consequence of the prospect of Mr. McKinley becoming President. Does the Senator mean to be understood that the bondholders are becoming frightened because Mr. McKinley, if President, would favor bimetallism, the restoration of silver, or anything of that kind?

Mr. TELLER. I do not think there is anything in the statement that the public were frightened because of Mr. McKinley's candidacy. It was only a statement that the financial papers made to excuse the disordered condition of the finances of the country. It would be very interesting if I could bring here and read to the Senate—I follow them with some closeness myself—the monthly and daily circulars that are issued. To-day one cause is given as the reason why prosperity has not come. Sometimes it is a storm in the West; sometimes it is a speech that some one has made on the silver question; and sometimes it is something else. Childish and foolish and weak are the excuses which have been made for two years now by those who promised the country prosperity, and I mean to say that the statement in regard to Mr. McKinley was but an excuse.

Mr. President, I do not think that the gold people need to have any fears of Mr. McKinley. I do not think that they have any fears of him, either. When you see the declaration that is made by his friends and when you study his record I do not think there need be any distrust on their part as to his attitude on the money question.

I did not mean that as an indication that it was a truthful statement, but simply to show that all the difficulties which exist must be attributed to something. Probably no one had made a silver speech within a few days, and they could not attribute it to that, and so they said: "Well, it is the looming up of the McKinley candidacy which has now disturbed the finances of the country."

Mr. President, if our finances are in such a deplorable condition as to show that there is something wrong about the system, that is not the cause. We are a debtor nation. We have by our system of finance destroyed the price of our products out of which we are compelled to pay our debts abroad. Their value is one-half what it was a few years ago. Seventy-five per cent of all our exports are the products of farms and fields. We double them in quantity, and when we have doubled them in quantity we find we have halved them in value.

If since 1873 the products that we have sent to Europe had brought the gold prices of 1873 the American people would not owe a dollar to Europe. That statement was made in one of the financial papers of London last summer, and it is undoubtedly true. The exports of gold are legitimate and proper, because we are in debt and because we have not products enough that we can send abroad to meet the demands that are made upon us. The conditions have changed since 1875. If we thought then that we could afford to sell bonds and keep on hand gold to exchange for greenbacks whenever any citizen desired such exchange, we must see that to-day the conditions are so different that it is not justifiable that we should continue the same system. We must either now adopt some other system or we must undoubtedly continue to sell bonds.

Mr. JONES of Nevada. Or go into bankruptcy.

Mr. TELLER. Or go into bankruptcy, as suggested. Mr. President, I do not know but that we shall go into bankruptcy. Certainly there will be no prosperity brought to this country by the sale of bonds. It is true we may borrow some money abroad. We borrowed some with the first issue of bonds and we borrowed some on the second, and I am told by those who ought to know that in ninety days all the bonds that we sold on the second issue were in New York. Whenever the price rises a little above what was paid for them here they come to this country, and that process will be continued to the end of time.

Mr. President, we shall have to adopt some other system. The President of the United States has a system. He says that to retire the greenbacks and relieve the Treasury will do it; that if we retire the greenbacks and the Treasury notes the Treasury will no longer have raids made on it by the exporters of gold. The great American sentiment is against that policy. That is a contraction of currency of more than one-third of all we have in circulation. That is impossible, Mr. President. It is impossible unless we devise some method of putting in its place other money. I do not know how we can do it except by bringing into use the gold and silver that we have in such abundance.

Mr. President, we are producing to-day, I think I may say without question, as much gold as any other nation in the world, and more silver. We could, by a wise system of legislation, make every ounce of gold that comes out of our mines, and every ounce of silver, equal in purchasing power at a ratio we may establish. The Senator from Iowa in front of me [Mr. ALLISON] says he does not think we can. He does not think that we can open our mints now. The Senator from Iowa did not think ¶n 1878, when the House sent us a free-coinage bill, that we could open our mints, when silver was only 7 or 8 per cent below par, when the divergence between the bullion in the silver dollar and the bullion in the gold dollar was less, as I recollect, than 8 per cent. The Senator said then, "You can not do it," and the American Senate followed his lead, and there never has been a legislative act, in my judgment, by any nation on the face of the earth that has been fraught with more evil as that act. Had we accepted the bill as it came to us from the House we would have stopped the fall of silver, and silver would have retained its place as the money metal of commerce, as the favorite money metal of the world.

The Senator, as much as I cherish and respect him, can not ask me, in view of what I regard as one of the greatest legislative blunders of the present age or any other, to follow him upon his mere suggestion that in his judgment it can not be done. The history of the world is against him. The logic of the position is against him. The philosophy is against him. We can go to free coinage and maintain the parity of the two metals, as Mr. Gibbs said, when asked by the English commission. It was said, "Can Great Britain handle this question alone and maintain the parity of the two metals?" He replied, "Any great nation can do it."

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] yesterday gave us his opinion. I respect the Senator from Illinois for things he has studied and knows. He said: "I do not believe you can maintain the parity. I do not believe the divergence between silver and gold is the result of legislation, but, on the contrary, it is overproduction." The English commission, composed of 12 men, and it will not be invidious if I say that every one of them was the peer of any man here on this subject, declared with a universal voice that the depreciation of silver was not overproduction, but it was the disuse of it by legislative enactment, and that alone.

The $200,000,000 that is now put out upon the world, according to the statement of the Senator from Illinois, is less in proportion to the demands of commerce and trade that the world is now demanding than the gold that was put out by California, Australia, and the Ural mines. It is one of the laws of commerce and trade that with the output of more gold and more silver there is a greater demand for it, and there has never been an hour in the history of the world when the silver and gold reached up to the demands of commerce and trade. It has not done so yet. It will not do it. If it doubles in amount use will be found for it in the stimulated activities. Ah, Mr. President, had we not better try it? Can we not try it? Is the condition of the people of this country so good, is it so desirable and so satisfactory that we can not afford to take any chances or try any experiments?

Mr. PALMER. May I ask the Senator from Colorado a single question?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. Does the Senator regard it as an experiment?

Mr. TELLER. I do not.

Mr. PALMER. The Senator spoke of trying the experiment.

Mr. TELLER. But I say if it is an experiment we had better try it. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] this morning, whom I do not see now in his seat, repeated the objections to free coinage which he has urged here for the last twenty years in my hearing. He told us of the great French economist, Mr. Cernuchi, whom he had the honor of inviting to his table—and it was an honor, for he was a great thinker and a great political economist—that he had declared when here that we could not afford, as a nation, to "go it" alone. It is true, Mr. President, that he did so declare at that time. But years afterwards and years ago in the most pronounced manner possible he declared that the American people were rich enough and strong enough, and if they would only take hold of this question they could handle it alone. The Senator from Vermont forgot to tell us that. It is only a half truth that you hear on this subject.

We hear of a 50-cent dollar. Mr. President, any man who gets up here and uses that argument insults the intelligence of the Senate and he insults the intelligence of the American people. There is not a 50-cent dollar anywhere on the face of God's earth to-day. There is no depreciation in a silver dollar anywhere compared with commodities. Take Mexico. Take the Mexican silver dollar that exchanges here at the rate of 54 cents for your gold. Is it a 50-cent dollar in Mexico? Take the Japanese yen. Is it a 50-cent yen in Japan? Not at all. Everybody knows better. The Mexican dollar in every market where it is treated as money, and that is on more than one-half of the face of the earth, and that, too, in the hands of three-fourths of the people of the globe——

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. TELLER. Not now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado declines to yield.

Mr. TELLER. Three-fourths of the people of the globe are using it, and not as a 50-cent dollar, but as a 100-cent dollar. It will buy in Japan, it will buy in China, it will buy in India, it will buy in the Straits Settlements, it will buy in Mexico, and it will buy here as much of human products as it would ever buy. Yet the Senator from Illinois spent the most of his time in talking about the dishonesty of the 50-cent dollar. He never saw a 50-cent dollar.

Mr. President, if you will go to Mexico to-day you will find the Mexican dollar will purchase as much property there as it would thirty years ago; if you go to Japan you will find that the Japanese yen, equivalent to the Mexican dollar in the amount of silver it contains, will purchase as many commodities as it would ever purchase. It is in this country when measured with gold, and gold alone, that you can say that the depreciation exists. You have a 200-cent dollar. That is what is the difficulty here. You have a dollar when measured by commodities which measures more than twice what it measured when I came into this body, more than twice what it measured when we passed the Bland-Allison Act. It measures 21 per cent more of farm products than it did when you repealed the Sherman law. That is the trouble with this country, and that is the trouble with your dollar.

I do not intend to detain the Senate at this time with a discussion of this question. I am moved to say these things because I regard the statements which have been made on this floor by those who are contending that we are too weak to have a financial system of our own as lacking in patriotism and, I will say, not meaning to be offensive, as an insult to my intelligence, as it is to that of every other thoughtful man. We are big enough and rich enough and strong enough to have a financial system of our own; and I myself do not believe there would be any experiment or any loss. But if there were, what becomes of the patriotism of the country, and what becomes of your confidence in the people, who are supposed to be the fountain of all power and authority, if you dare not trust them, if you dare not let the American people have their say upon this question—not only upon the question whether the bonds shall he sold, but also upon the question whether we shall make use of silver as our fathers made use of it, and as it is being made use of in a great portion of the earth; in fact, the greater portion of it to-day as primary money?

Mr. CULLOM. Would it interrupt the Senator if I should read a paragraph from a newspaper and ask a question for information from the Senator from Colorado? Because I think he can explain it, and I am sure I can not. What I wish to read is in reference to the Mexican dollar, of which the Senator has just spoken. The quotation is as follows:

To the Editor:

I saw in the Record recently a letter from W. W. containing some financial queries, the first being in regard to what part of Mexico one can get two Mexican dollars for one American dollar. In any large city near the Mexican border or in Mexico money can be changed, but not quite two dollars for one. If both coins contained an equal amount of silver the ratio would be 2 to 1, but the Mexican dollar contains the most silver; one United States dollar being worth $1.88 in Mexican money.

At Monterey, Nuevo Leon, Mexico, I cashed a $50 Chicago draft, receiving $94 Mexican money; at Durango, Mexico, I was paid at the Wells-Fargo Express office, for $100 wired from Chicago, 188 Mexican silver dollars (no light load in that warm climate).

What I desire to inquire, in perfect good faith, is (because I do not understand the reason for it), if the Mexican dollar has as much silver in it as the American dollar, or more, how it happens that we can get almost two Mexican dollars for one American dollar?

Mr. TELLER. The Senator ought not to have any great difficulty in that.

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to have it explained.

Mr. TELLER. One can go to Japan and do the same thing with the Japanese yen. The reason simply is that we are on the gold basis, and everything in the world which is measured with gold is worth practically but half what it was a few years ago. In other words, where the gold standard prevails there has been a shrinking and shriveling of values. You can go to Great Britain to-day, which is on the gold standard, and you can buy land in that country for one-fifth of what you would have had to pay for it thirty years ago. You can go to the rich State of Illinois, which the Senator represents, and within 125 miles of the city of Chicago you can buy the best land that the sun ever shone upon for 40 per cent less than it could have been bought for twenty years ago. You may go to the State of Ohio, in the neighborhood of the great city of Cincinnati—I am not speaking now at random—and you will find that you can buy land there now for half what you could have bought it for less than twenty years ago.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President——

Mr. TELLER. In one moment I will yield to the Senator.

Take Illinois. The city of Chicago has trebled her population since the time that I have been familiar with the Rock River Valley, and yet land in the Rock River Valley, or 125 miles from it, will not bring as much now as it would have brought eighteen or twenty years ago. Why should that be? Illinois has a good government; Illinois has a good climate; Illinois has had prosperity, and has filled up her great city with thousands and thousands of men who are demanding the products of farmers; and yet the products of farmers are lower now than they were twenty years ago, and the farms themselves in any portion of that great State will bring but little more than half of what they would have brought then.

Mr. CULLOM. I only wanted to say that, while I am not familiar with the prices of land in all parts of the State, I think in the central portion the land is substantially holding its own, and has been during recent years.

Mr. TELLER. "Substantially holding its own," when you have quadrupled your population. The price of land ought to have doubled.

Mr. CULLOM. That may be so, but the Senator knows very well there are other reasons besides the question whether or not we are on a gold basis which have materially affected the prices of all things in this country, land included.

Mr. TELLER. I deny that there is any particularly powerful agency which has depreciated land in this country in the sections of which I am speaking. I will admit that the railroads which reach Chicago and the great prairies did depreciate somewhat the value of land in New York; I will admit that the competition has put down the prices of farm products in New York; but that is not true of the great prairie West. In that section they have nothing beyond them in the way of competition. What I said of Illinois is true of Kansas; it is true of Nebraska; it is true of Minnesota. The only places where the value of land has appreciated are in the vicinity of cities and towns where it has a prospective value with reference to either being cut up into small farms or that it shall be occupied as town lots.

Mr. President, the Senator wants to know why you can get $2 down in Mexico for one American dollar. It is because you can bring back that American dollar and you can purchase twice as much with it now as you could purchase twenty years ago. The only exception there is to the ability to purchase twice as much is labor. There is an exception there. I will admit that you can not purchase twice as much labor. The labor organizations have held up the price of labor; but does not everybody know that that can not be continued; that ultimately the price of labor must drop with that of the products of labor?

In every gold country without exception the condition prevails which prevails here; that is to say, we are worse off to-day than we were formerly. We have grown poorer. I suppose there never was an hour in the history of this country when there was so much discontent; when there was so much complaint; I may say, when there was so much distress.

The other day I received a letter from one of the great, rich States of the West, asking me, as a member of the Judiciary Committee, to do something with the bankruptcy bill; and the writer, whom I do not know, but from the character of his letter I have no doubt he is a truthful man, said:

> We need a bankruptcy law; our homes are being taken from us under mortgage claims; and when they have taken our all, they leave us in debt.

That was from a State for which nature has done as much as for any State in the Union, both as to climate and as to soil.

A few days since an intelligent medical man from the State of Nebraska said to me:

> In the neighborhood in which I am practicing my profession there is not, to my knowledge, 5 per cent of the whole farming community that are not in absolute distress; not entirely, I will admit, owing to the financial question, but largely owing to that.

Mr. President, there is nobody here, save the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY], who will rise and assert that the present financial condition of the United States is a satisfactory one. "Oh, we have held our own," the Senator from Illinois says; but we ought to have done more. They have done more than that in Mexico; they have done more than that in Japan; they have done more than that in China. Progress is the rule in China; progress is the rule in Japan; progress is the rule in Mexico and Central America, and retrogression, depreciation, and fall in values is the rule in this country and in every other gold-standard land.

I only wish to say a word or two more, and that in reply to a suggestion made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. BROWN]. The Senator from Utah, in a very ingenious, but not ingenuous, speech, undertook to make it appear that I, with others, had been found voting against a silver proposition in this Chamber. He, representing a community interested in silver, found himself training under the leadership of the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] and the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]. He was following them in their mad zeal to accomplish something for silver. The people of Utah are a people of intelligence, and that kind of talk will fool nobody in Utah; it certainly will fool nobody in Colorado. If the Senator is proud of his silver leaders and wants to train with the senior Senator from Ohio and the senior Senator from Vermont, he will hardly establish a character in the great Northwest of being zealous for silver.

So far as I am concerned, I believe the silver question to be the paramount question before the American people. I believe, as I believe that I am alive, that it is the duty of every man here and everywhere else to settle this question, and to settle it so that there shall be a return to the use of both metals on an equality to be established by law. I do not believe that you will ever have prosperity until that is done. I do not believe the unfortunate condition now existing will be reversed and set aside until you make that the paramount question of all questions in legislative life and in legislative fields.

I know that the Senator from Connecticut not long since told us here that, as to those of us who had said we put the financial question in front of the protective system, the people of our States would not sustain us in that view. Mr. President, the people of four of the States whose representatives took action here have been heard from. There has been no condemnatory voice from those States. The people of the great Northwest understand that this is the great question that is being presented for their consideration. I want to say to the Senator from Connecticut that the people of my State have been attached to the protective system as the people of his State have not been. We have given Republican victories and Republican officials when his State, the center of manufacturing as it is, has given other votes; and yet we know that the protective system as applied to our section of the country has not been of local benefit. We, however, have been protectionists, as I have said before in this Chamber, because we believed that the greatest good to the greatest number should be the rule, because we believed that if we brought prosperity into Connecticut we should bring prosperity into Texas and Colorado. I so believe now; but we must have a system of finance not local, not applying to one section, but applying to all.

I am not advocating the use of silver as money because it is created or dug out of the earth in my State, but because, in my judgment, the use of silver will promote the interests of those people who are now crying out against it, and who are telling us, as they were a few days since, that the silver question had been relegated to the rear, and that nothing more would be heard of it.

Mr. President, I said here two months ago that the silver question was a lively corpse. It is more than lively. Two or three months ago great effort was made to control the great political parties and to put them in harmony on the money question. The bankers and the bankers' conventions told the people, "You must see to it that both political organizations, Democrats and Republicans, declare for the gold standard." We were told that a large sum of money had been raised to accomplish that desirable end. There was no secret about it. It was proclaimed from the house tops that that was to be done and that it was being done, and we have had the proof in various sections of the country that it was being done. Yet, notwithstanding that, Republican States, States in the Union, States of equal intelligence with any other, have been declaring for free silver, and the great Democratic party is now, I believe, practically ready to inscribe on its banner free coinage.

The people of the United States have learned that the question of free coinage is one that comes home to them. They know that the money question is one which touches every man's interest. They know that there is no legislation which can be enacted, that there is no legislation which ever has been enacted, that comes so close home, to the men on the farm and in the shop and in the mill and in the mine, as the financial question, and they know that a mistake upon that question is a mistake which goes deeper and outrages them more than any other mistake that can be made in legislation; and they are taking hold of it.

We had an election in Oregon yesterday. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] has been an intelligent and pronounced advocate of free coinage for many years by my side. He is a candidate for reelection. All the powers of the gold field and the gold standard have been arrayed against him. The great press of his State has been bought up. And yet, if we are not misinformed to-day, he has made a triumphant success in his candidacy, and he has been indorsed by the people as he never was indorsed before. The Representative who ran as a silver man is elected. The Representative who defeated a silver man in the House for the nomination and who ran as a gold man or a straddler, if not an avowed gold man, is reported to be defeated.
